Recurring again to the letter published with the Constitution by order of the Convention, we find the statement that our fathers found it difficult to draw with precision the line between those rights which must be surrendered and those which might be reserved, which difficulty was increased by a difference among the several States as to their situation, extent, habits, and particular interests. But the great desire to secure the ends set forth in the preamble controlled all objections, and because it was found to be impracticable to secure all rights of independent sovereignty to each State and yet provide for the interest and safety of all, every State represented then and there surrendered some of the attributes of sovereignty and delegated to the General Government certain powers which, in the absence of that grant would remain in or be, in the language of the tenth amendment, "reserved to the States respectively or to the people." Among these attributes of sovereignty so surrendered by each State, and thereby delegated to the Federal Government, was the right to enter into any treaty, alliance, or confederation, coin money, keep troops or ships of war in time of peace, enter into any agreement or compact with another State, or with a foreign Power, or engage in war, unless actually invaded or in such imminent danger as forbade delay, thus surrendering on the part of each such attributes of sovereignty as might in their separate exercise endanger the whole. It was but natural for each to ask the question, "If we surrender the right to preserve, either by arms or treaty, our own State dignity and equality, how can we preserve our republican form of government of which we are already in possession?"

The answer was inserted into the Constitution as a clause binding upon the General Government and intended to compensate the States respectively for a surrender of the attributes of sovereignty in that respect; and such clause simply declares that the United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union—what each already possessed—a republican form of government. That guarantee was not to operate simply for a day, nor cease to be binding at the will of a party, but holds in all its fullness to-day firmly as when first extended by the General Government to the original States. In that clause the United States guarantied the separate existence of Virginia under her then form of government, with such changes and modifications as her people might from time to time ordain and establish not inconsistent with the Constitution of the United States nor contrary to her duty under the same. And, sir, I maintain that when the war ceased and the people of Virginia readjusted their disturbed machinery of State government and came again into harmony with the General Government, under the same constitution, once recognized by Congress as republican in form, that very moment Virginia could claim the guarantee, and the United States could not in good faith withhold or refuse it. In this view each of what are now termed military districts, and which are to be by this bill merged in one grand military empire, are sovereign States, with their several governments guaranteed by the United States, and their "dignity, equality, and rights" guaranteed by the very party which this day proposes, by the madness of fanatical legislation, to strike down and abrogate those same governments in order to perpetuate its own unconstitutional power by southern negro rule in each of those ten States.

But, sir, not only does this bill abrogate executive power and usurp executive functions, but in express terms denies to the judicial branch or department the exercise of the powers granted to it by the people in their Constitution. It provides in its first section that the governments in said States, respectively, shall not be recognized as valid or legal State governments by the judicial power or authority of the United States—thus prohibiting the judiciary from hearing and determining any question involving the existence of any of those States, while in the Constitution it is provided that "the judicial power shall extend to all cases in law and equity arising under this Constitution," as also "to controversies between two or more States." Should a controversy arise between the authorities of Virginia and North Carolina the Constitution makes it the duty of the judiciary to determine the question, and by decree or judgment end the controversy, while this bill prohibits such action and assumes to rest in one man, and he a military officer, the right to decide the question and enforce his decision by the armies of the nation, while both the executive and judicial departments are powerless to enforce the Constitution unless at imminent risk of a collision with the Army acting under congressional authority and in violation of the Constitution.

But, sir, as men never act but from the prompting of motive, what is the motive prompting this denial of judicial examinations? Is it not because our friends on the other side of the House feel convinced that the result of judicial examination and decision would be a vindication of civil governments in those States? Why, sir, the very denial of the right of such investigation is an admission that its results, if permitted, would be fatal to their revolutionary legislation. And, sir, as an illustration of the progressiveness of Radicalism let it be remembered that this same court thus unconstitutionally circumscribed in its action is composed of eight members, of whom a majority are members of the Republican party, and that the father of American Radicalism, Salmon P. Chase, is its presiding judge. But though a Radical, he is a lawyer, and might be supposed to manifest some regard for the Constitution under which alone he holds his high position. But, further, I may be pardoned for referring to a rumor, whether well-founded or not, still very generally accredited, to the effect that in a case now pending in that court involving the constitutionality of these reconstruction acts a majority of the court incline to the opinion, and will so decide, that these acts are void, and that as a consequence each of those southern States are in possession of all their "rights, dignity, and equality" under the Constitution. Is it to forestall the court in the promulgation of this anticipated unwelcome decision that this denial of its right to decide the question is incorporated in this bill?

Sir, I think I have fairly shown that this proposed enactment, in more than one respect, subverts the fundamental law of our Republic. Do gentlemen reflect that an abrogation of that fundamental law is a surrender, or rather a destruction, of the form of government created by that law? As without some of the reserved attributes of sovereignty there can be no State, so without the Constitution there can be no union of States. The maintenance of one is essential to the existence of the other. And do gentlemen further reflect that a willful violation of one portion of our Constitution is equally criminal as a forcible abrogation of the instrument entire? Is it not always by slow and almost imperceptible movement that the march of tyranny and usurpation commences? Is it not true to-day, as in days past, that the first effort at usurpation is to conceal its purpose under some special plea of public utility? Is not necessity still the plea of the tyrant? But, sir, as public forbearance has until recently been untiring and public patience unwavering, I fear our Radical friends have concluded that the people were tacitly indorsing, instead of silently tolerating, their usurpations and infractions of the Constitution. Imagining themselves secure in power and beyond the reach of responsibility, they have exhibited that madness which precedes destruction. It is but history repeating itself and verifying the predictions of Webster when he said:

"If the infernal fanatics and abolitionists ever get the power in their hands they will override the Constitution, set the Supreme Court at defiance, change and make laws to suit themselves, lay violent hands on those who differ with them in their opinions or dare question their infallibility, and finally bankrupt the country and deluge it with blood."

How fully the history of the past few years of our country, and especially the past few months of our legislative history, justifies the prediction of the immortal Webster. There is now, in my judgment, but one pathway of safety for the people, but one remaining hope of salvation to our country from impending ruin. That hope is a speedy uprising of the people, constitutionally, in their sovereign power, rebuking the madness of fanaticism, and hurling from power those who betray the high trust reposed in them under the laws of our country. And, sir, I feel assured this hope is not doomed to disappointment; for while the necessity is great and the danger imminent, the pathway is plain and the people patriotic. Groaning as they are under a debt of untold millions, they will not tolerate this tinkering with the Constitution nor remain blind to the iniquities of the party in power. In July last, upon one of the preceding acts in this same series of so-called reconstruction measures, I put upon record here my predictions of a speedy reaction in the public mind and a prompt repudiation in public action of the acts and doings of the present Congress; and how signally has that condemnation been already pronounced in the very States where a few years ago the party holding a majority on this floor to-day revelled in the plenitude of unquestioned power.

And, Mr. Speaker, it is not the spasmodic action of a moment, not the mere temporary unrest of a period, that underlies or causes this popular uprising. It is the full, deep determination of the patriotic citizens of the United States to withdraw power from those who abuse it, withhold trust from those who betray it, and in their sovereignty return to the policy of their fathers, and to secure the existence of States in coequal dignity under a Constitution uniform, equal, and just to all.

One more consideration, sir, and I will close. It has been intimated by those of the majority that we oppose this bill because we distrust the General of the armies. Sir, for one, I distrust any man who may be clothed with the extraordinary powers contemplated in this bill. No man in this broad land of ours can be safely intrusted with unconstitutional power. Under our form of government Presidents, courts, legislative bodies, generals, all are alike subordinate to the Constitution, which overreaches, controls, directs, guides, and limits all. Were it so possible for the immortal spirit of Washington to return to earth and reanimate his still remains I would not willingly yield to him, pure as he was, patriotic as he was known to be, the powers contemplated in this unrighteous act. Ah, sir, he would not accept it—but in answer to proffered power would reply, "Get thee behind me; I, too, am a citizen; go learn of your fathers, gather their lessons of wisdom, comprehend and obey their teaching as set forth in the Constitution, and all will be well."

SPEECH OF HON. W. E. NIBLACK,

OF INDIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 16, 1868.

The House having under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 439) additional and supplementary to an act entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed March 2, 1867—

Mr. NIBLACK said:

MR. SPEAKER: I shall not, I hope, occupy the time allotted to me on the bill now under consideration reported from the Committee on Reconstruction. I felt, after first examining it and looking into its provisions, that it ought to be discussed fully and thoroughly. Gentlemen who have preceded me, however, on this side of the House have nearly exhausted all the points involved in the measure, and I feel I should be guilty of repetition if I undertook to go over the whole ground again.

This question of reconstruction was first brought before the House in its present aspect nearly one year ago. I then spoke on the general subject, and it is unnecessary for me to repeat the positions I then assumed in regard to it. I may be permitted, however, to remark that subsequent reflection and examination of the subject have convinced me I did not even go far enough on that occasion in opposition to this policy of Congress, because I could not then realize what enormities were in store for us under this pretext of reconstruction.

The question of loyalty or disloyalty, the question of rebellion, the question of the civil war which so long divided and distracted the country, is in no way involved in the discussion of the principles of this bill. It is only a question of power and expediency on the part of Congress. No one has yet seriously assumed the position that Congress has to-day any more power than it had ten years ago. If a measure of this kind could not be passed before the war I insist it cannot be passed by us now, so that all the talk about loyalty and disloyalty is outside of the real issues involved in this controversy.

But, sir, I was about remarking that the further consideration of this question of reconstruction, as it is called, has convinced me of the fact that a great deal, that nearly everything done in relation to it is outside of the Constitution, and has been mere naked usurpation. I acquiesced in much that the President did on the subject because of the supposed necessity of the case and because of the spirit in which it was done, and not because I supposed it was justified by the letter of the Constitution. Since Congress has taken hold of the subject it is in more interminable confusion than when the President had hold of it. There is no well-defined policy upon it. We have practically torn down the governments which existed in these States as reorganized since the war, and yet we have never had the courage to remove those governments out of the way and to set up others in their places. We have gone on, half recognizing and half protesting against their existence.

The act of 2d of March, 1867, was the first act passed on the subject. That act recognized these as provisional governments, reserving only the declaration that they should be subject to the paramount power of Congress. If they are provisional governments, so long as they are permitted to exist, so long as they are permitted to exercise the powers of States, I submit they are just as valid and binding as any other State governments, and it is as much a violation of sound principle to tear them down, unless others are immediately supplied in their place equally acceptable to the people affected by them, as to tear down the government of any other State of this Union.

The first act passed on the subject, and to which I have referred, was, however, in many respects incongruous and obscure in its provisions, as was conceded by the hasty manner in which it was amended by the present Congress, which convened soon after that act was passed. The same want of policy, the same want of precision and completeness, I submit, run through all the acts passed subsequently to that and amendatory of it. This bill, which professes to go to the very root of the difficulty, yet evades or seemingly attempts to evade the real issue impliedly raised by it, and I say this in the hearing of the distinguished gentleman [Mr. BINGHAM] who reported it, who opened the debate on it, and who will, I presume, close it.

If the governments in the rebellious States are illegal, then I beg to inquire what is the effect upon them of the first section of this bill? It says they shall not be recognized as "valid or legal State governments" by the executive or judicial power or authority of the United States. Does that go back to the first reorganization of these States under the President's proclamation, or does it only declare them illegal after the passage of this act? There is an obscurity in this language which, I submit to the gentleman who reported it, will have to be again supplied by some amendatory act.

Mr. BINGHAM. Will the gentleman allow me to suggest one word?

Mr. NIBLACK. Certainly.

Mr. BINGHAM. It is simply this: we consider it settled by all the traditions of the Republic and by solemn judicial decisions that no department of this Government could, at any time after the rebellion, recognize any one of these governments about which the gentleman is now speaking, which were set up on the termination of the rebellion, or attempted to be set up as valid until Congress did so recognize them. Therefore the provision of the first section is for the very purpose of concluding the executive and judicial departments of the Government in accordance with former decisions. That is exactly what we are about.

Mr. NIBLACK. It is a well recognized principle of international law that in the absence of a regular government—that is, a government de jure—a government de facto is allowed to supply the place of such regular government.

Mr. BINGHAM. The principles of international law, I beg to say to the gentleman, do not apply to the interior policy of a government or sovereignty.

Mr. NIBLACK. Then I inquire by what law, if not international law, the gentleman claims these States are conquered provinces and not States of the Union?

Mr. BINGHAM. I do not claim that they are conquered provinces at all. A nation never conquered its own territory.

Mr. NIBLACK. So I have always contended; but if they are not conquered provinces they must be States, and if they are States then you have no authority under the Constitution or any principle recognized under our form of government by which we can rule these States by any such form of legislation as this. If they are still States of this Union then they have the undisputed right to regulate all such matters as pertain to their internal and State matters, without any interference or paramount control by Congress.

Mr. BINGHAM. Allow me to ask a question? The Government of the United States has a right to demand that a republican form of government shall be maintained in each State by the voluntary act of the people thereof, as required by the Constitution. Now, I ask the gentleman whether he is ready to say, if perchance to-morrow all the people of the State of Ohio choose by common consent, in convention assembled, to declare their State organization dissolved, that they will have henceforth no Legislature, and accordingly all their legislative officers resign, all their judicial officers and executive officers resign, the Government of the United States has not the right to take notice of it and by act of Congress extend absolute undivided jurisdiction over every rood of that territory, and protect the lives of every citizen therein? I respectfully ask an answer of the gentleman.

Mr. NIBLACK. Mr. Speaker, I have the floor, and cannot yield for anything like an argument.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. NIBLACK] must be protected in his right to the floor.

Mr. BINGHAM. I desire an answer to my question, if it be agreeable to the gentleman to give it.

Mr. NIBLACK. I admit that if a State government should abdicate its authority, if it ever dare to do so, it might become the duty of Congress to enforce in some way a reorganization of its government, but not through the military power, but by civil officers and civil agencies, called into existence for the special purpose and clothed with certain definite powers. In such an event Congress could certainly go no further than to reorganize the already existing State government, and would have no power to set up a new government for the people of the State. This thing of taking possession of the State governments through military agencies is inconsistent with our form of government and with the principles recognized by our Constitution. It places the military power above the civil authority, which is clearly in violation of the letter and spirit of that instrument. Sir, the military power is but a police power in aid of the civil administration of the Government; and whatever we do in regard to any State government, either under the guarantee clause or under the necessities of the case as they may seem to arise, we must do by civil agencies and not by the military authority as provided for in this bill. The exercise of military authority in matters of civil administration is in conflict with all our early lessons on the subject of a republican and constitutional government.

Mr. BINGHAM. Will the gentleman allow me once more to make a suggestion?

Mr. NIBLACK. Go on.

Mr. BINGHAM. I desire to treat the gentleman with all respect. There is no gentleman in this House for whom I entertain greater respect.

Mr. NIBLACK. Well, then, make your suggestion.

Mr. BINGHAM. I beg leave to suggest to the gentleman that there is no such thing as republican government in any State of the Union except by the cooperation and voluntary act of the people resident therein; and if the people of a State will not act in the matter the Government of the United States cannot make a republican government in that State, because that is elective, and elective by the people of the State, but it can govern the State, either by arms or by laws, until the people thereof do their duty and establish a republican State government.

Mr. NIBLACK. That is just what I am arguing. The gentleman concedes that a republican government must be the work of the people to be governed by it; I agree to that; but then I deny the power he claims in Congress to coerce the people of a State in the manner proposed by this bill.

But I beg the gentleman's attention still further, for there are some other suggestions I desire to make that I hope he will see proper to answer in his closing argument on this bill. When I was interrupted by the gentleman I was inquiring what is to be the effect of the first section of the bill on the existing State governments—if it is to be construed to go back to and relate to all that has been done by those governments since the close of the war? Think for a moment of the effect it must have on the people of those States and on the very organization of society itself within those States. Why, sir, they have been marrying and giving in marriage for three years in those States; debts have been created; contracts have been entered into; property has been purchased and sold by loyal as well as by disloyal men, by people of all classes; deeds and other legal instruments executed; all the functions of municipal government have been carried on by the people of those States under laws created by these provisional governments, or whatever kind of governments you please to call them, erected and organized since the war. If you tear those governments down by this bill, I beg to inquire what is to take their places? A mere military order cannot take the place of municipal law. If these State governments are to be thus summarily abolished, I beg to submit that it is our duty first to make provision by act of Congress for governing these people and carrying on their local and domestic affairs under some code of written laws. Do not leave them, I beseech of you, to the caprice of any military commander or of any other officer, however exalted he may be.

Why, sir, if we have the power to pass this bill the powers of Congress have in times past been greatly underrated. Ten years ago no one would have believed that such a power would ever have been claimed in the Congress of the United States or tolerated by it for a single moment; and yet it is argued, and seriously argued, by men representing a large majority of this House, and I suppose it will be so voted, that Congress has the power to do all this, and much more, if found expedient. It is, sir, most extraordinary to me. I confess that when I think about it, when I look into this question and consider it with that seriousness which it is entitled to be considered at the hands of every member of this House, and of every intelligent citizen of the United States, I am unable to realize that this is the last half of the nineteenth century. It seems that we have been living for more than seventy-five years under a Government founded upon a written Constitution, and yet have been unable to understand and appreciate its powers and functions until this late period of its existence.

Sir, it does seem to me that some strange infatuation must have seized upon the minds of gentlemen, and especially upon the mind of so intelligent a gentleman as the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM,] before he can be led to believe all that he has said upon this great and momentous question.

I say this with all respect for the gentleman, and he knows that I entertain the very highest respect for him personally. He has been for a time our leader upon this side of the House. [Laughter.] At the close of the last Congress we had sore need of a leader, because the distinguished gentleman who had been our representative upon the Judiciary Committee of that Congress was no longer a member of Congress; and at the commencement of this Congress we were sadly in need of some able gentleman to take charge of us on this side of the House. And when the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] came over here last spring and took a seat with us no one was more delighted than I was. [Laughter.]

Sir, we sympathized with his efforts to assert the constitutional rights of the people of the southern States in the earlier part of the first session of this Congress; and in that celebrated controversy which took place between him and the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] we on this side of the House cheered him lustily, not so much, perhaps, for what he said as because he said it, and because he was on our side and we felt it to be our duty to stand by him, right or wrong. [Great laughter.] Now, in view of all these facts, we on this side cannot do otherwise than feel an interest in all the gentleman says and does. The eyes of this side of the House, if not of the world, are upon the gentleman, and we carefully watch all his utterances. Hence the importance to us of the positions he assumes and of the arguments which he advances in this great discussion. Sir, he has returned to his first love, and we have no longer any claims upon him. We part sadly, but still we must part. [Laughter.]

HO. OF REPS.

Reconstruction—Mr. Niblack.

I beg leave to call the attention of the gentleman to one other position which he has taken. If I remember correctly, he asserted in his opening argument on this question that it was preposterous to insist that the people of the southern States, of these disorganized States, had any power to ratify the constitutional amendment abolishing slavery or any other amendment to the Constitution. He said they were disorganized States, and were not entitled to any voice upon any amendment to the Constitution, simply because they had not the power to act as organized States of the Union.

Mr. BINGHAM. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. NIBLACK. I would gladly do so if my time can be extended; but I have but little time left now.

Mr. BINGHAM. I am sure no objection will be made to extending the time of the gentleman.

Mr. NIBLACK. If that can be done I will have no objection to yield.

Mr. BINGHAM. I move that the gentleman's time be extended.

No objection was made.

Mr. NIBLACK. I now yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BINGHAM. I may be unfortunate in not being understood. But I venture to say that the gentleman will find no such expression of opinion in any utterance of mine as that the people of the southern States have no power to ratify a constitutional amendment. My point is simply this: that they are not States for municipal purposes, and have no political voice or power in the Union while they remain disorganized for that or for any other purpose; yet, while that is true, they may organize their governments territorially, without any enabling acts of Congress, and may ratify the pending constitutional amendment. And, in accordance with one of the most solemn and well-considered opinions ever rendered in America, that ratification becomes valid by relation whenever Congress recognizes their reorganization as valid State governments.

Mr. NIBLACK. The gentleman certainly said with great earnestness that these States had no authority to vote upon this question of the ratification of the pending amendment to the Constitution in their present disorganized condition. That, I understand, was the position assumed by the gentleman; and I think if he will refer to his speech he will find that I am justified in making that quotation from his argument. And, indeed, his explanation, after all, amounts to a repetition of that assertion.

Now, I ask the gentleman—and I do not ask him to answer me now; he can do so when he comes to close the discussion on this bill—what greater validity had the government of Tennessee as a State government immediately before her admission into the Union than has the government of any other of these disorganized States?

It was reorganized under a proclamation issued by executive authority without any enabling act, without any act of the legislative authority—by executive power alone, under a scheme of reconstruction inaugurated and carried forward by Mr. Lincoln in his lifetime. The State, however, elected representatives to the Thirty-Ninth Congress, who presented themselves for admission. An act was subsequently passed readmitting Tennessee into the Union or declaring the State restored to her relations to the Union, and allowing her to be again represented on this floor and in the other end of the Capitol as before the war.

Mr. BINGHAM. The gentleman voted for that.

Mr. NIBLACK. I did not. I did not think the State needed any readmission, and hence voted against it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, one of the reasons assigned for acknowledging Tennessee to be restored to her former relations to the General Government was that she had ratified the constitutional amendment. If I am not mistaken that bill was drafted by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] himself. At all events I know that he was its leading advocate on this floor. I ask that that act, including the preamble, be read by the Clerk.

Mr. BINGHAM. The preamble is no part of the act.

Mr. NIBLACK. It gives the reasons of the act and is explanatory of it.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Joint resolution restoring Tennessee to her relation to the Union:

"Whereas in the year 1861 the government of the State of Tennessee was seized upon and taken possession of by persons in hostility to the United States, and the inhabitants of said State, in pursuance of an act of Congress, were declared to be in a state of insurrection against the United States; and whereas said State government can only be restored to its former political relations in the Union by the consent of the law-making power of the United States; and whereas the people of said State did on the 22d day of February, 1865, by a large popular vote adopt and ratify a constitution of government whereby slavery was abolished, and all ordinances and laws of secession and debts contracted under the same were declared void; and whereas a State government has been organized under said constitution, which has ratified the amendment to the Constitution of the United States abolishing slavery, also the amendment proposed by the Thirty-Ninth Congress, and has done other acts proclaiming and denoting loyalty; Therefore,

"Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the State of Tennessee is hereby restored to her former proper, practical relations to the Union, and is again entitled to be represented by Senators and Representatives in Congress.

"Approved July 24, 1866."

Mr. NIBLACK. Mr. Speaker, I have had this act read to the House for the purpose of confirming my assertion that all that Congress has done on this subject has been mere patchwork, mere mosaic, mere temporizing, without any well defined principle or policy. Then it was conceded that Tennessee had the power to ratify the amendment, and it being claimed that she had done so haste was made to proclaim her restored to her place in the Union, so as to encourage other States to do likewise and to be also restored. Now, however, the same men claim that these lately rebellious States have no such power of ratification at all, and nothing whatever to do with it. Were ever men more inconsistent and less mindful of their pledges? When the Thirty-Ninth Congress first assembled no pretense was made that these reorganized southern State governments were not governments for most purposes—at least for local State purposes. Though many questions were raised as to the manner in which those States had been reorganized, yet that they were reorganized very few, if anybody, denied. At the time the amendment to the Constitution of the United States was proposed by the Thirty-Ninth Congress it seemed to be generally conceded that those governments were competent to ratify that constitutional amendment, or that, at all events, it should be submitted to them for their action one way or the other; and the manner in which this amendment should be received by those State governments was by a sort of common consent, I believe, of the majority here to be regarded as a test of the loyalty or disloyalty of their people.

The impression was sent out pretty generally that if the States lately in rebellion would accept that constitutional amendment they should at once be restored to their constitutional relations to the General Government. To be sure, the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] and some others protested against this construction. But the popular construction—the construction on which the campaign of 1866 was fought—was that whenever those States should adopt that amendment they should be entitled to complete restoration. The legislation since adopted by Congress is conceded by most of its friends to be harsh and exceptional in its character, but the usual apology for it is that those States have refused to ratify the constitutional amendment when submitted to them, and that therefore it became the duty of Congress to adopt some more harsh and extreme measure.

Sir, if these States had no power to ratify this last proposed amendment to the Constitution why the mockery of submitting it to them? Why ask them to do it; and, more than all, why punish the people of those States for not doing it? It is, I submit, all an after-thought; a mere pretense, and a lame and impotent one at that, for this cruel, unprecedented and revolutionary legislation which has since followed.

But the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] intimates that these disorganized States ought to have gone through with the formality of a ratification of this amendment and to have left it to Congress to vitalize and approve their action. Sir, if that was the true mode of procedure, why did not Congress point it out in advance? Why leave it a matter of construction, of doubt, and uncertainty? Why this wriggling and uncertainty upon a great and paramount question? Congress declared that when three fourths of the Legislatures of all the States should ratify the proposed amendment it should become a part of the Constitution. Nothing was then said as to the incapacity of the Legislature of any State to ratify it. Nothing was then said about the necessity of further action of Congress upon it; nothing about that vitalizing process of which the gentleman speaks.

Mr. Speaker, I assert, but I do it with sadness and mortification, that this constant shifting and evasion, this continuous flying from one pretext to another for failing to do a plain duty, and the better to conceal what we are really trying to accomplish, is most discreditably to Congress and unworthy a great people like ours. Whatever we may do here, and especially in matters that pertain to the integrity and very life of the Government, ought to be boldly, squarely, and frankly done.

But it is insisted that under that clause in the Constitution which provides that the United States shall guaranty to each State a republican form of government, known sometimes as the guarantee clause, Congress may do what is contemplated by this bill. I will not now attempt to discuss the power of Congress under that clause at any length. This has already been done, and done thoroughly, by my colleague [Mr. KERR] and others who have preceded me in this debate. This provision, in my judgment, clearly presupposes that each one of the old States had a republican form of government when the Federal Constitution was adopted. Also, that each new State would have a government republican in form before and at the time of its admission into the Union. Its object certainly was only to preserve these governments from subversion and destruction—to guaranty their continued existence, subject of course to the power of the people of the States to amend them from time to time if they chose, without destroying their republican form. It was certainly never contemplated that under this clause Congress, or indeed all the departments of the Government combined, could overthrow the existing government in any State so long as it remains republican in form. To assert that the power to guaranty the existence of anything includes and confers the right to destroy it is too preposterous for argument. The assertion of such a proposition in the present emergency of the country is well nigh usurpation itself. I will not, however, pursue this branch of the argument farther now.

But, sir, conceding that Congress has all the power claimed for it in this bill, and in all the acts to which it is amendatory, is it expedient to exercise this power in such a way? I maintain that it is never expedient in this country in a time of profound peace to place the civil in subordination to the military power; to override by congressional action the will of the people in their local and domestic affairs; to overthrow legally existing and republican State governments by military force and to even disorganize society itself. The bill we are considering proposes to do all these—indeed, more than all these—for when these things are accomplished it proposes to govern the people of the States affected by it by merely arbitrary and flagrantly usurped power.

Sir, in a great emergency like this, with a great Government disorganized, with every important interest imperiled, when we are just entering on a new era in our history, I do insist that it becomes the representatives of the American people to act in this matter, not with passion, not with feelings of hatred, not with feelings of revenge, but upon some elevated and well-defined line of policy clearly authorized by our common Constitution, and which will stand the test of criticism in future ages.

Mr. Speaker, when I obtained the floor I did not expect to detain the House half so long as I have done. The interruptions of the gentleman from Ohio have induced me to occupy more time than I intended.

I sought the floor merely to protest, as I have heretofore done, against this whole scheme of congressional reconstruction, from first to last, and to denounce its revolutionary character and tendencies. I yield to no one in my anxiety to see all the States again restored to their former relations to the General Government. To accomplish this is our first great duty. But, sir, when this shall be done, I desire to see it well done. I want to see it done in a way that will not require standing armies within the borders of these reconstructed States to keep the peace within them. We cannot afford to do hasty, revolutionary, and experimental things in so delicate and so important a matter. Caution to that extent at least ought to be inspired by common prudence and a common danger.

Reconstruction.

SPEECH OF HON. R. D. HUBBARD,
OF CONNECTICUT,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
January 17, 1868.

The House having under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 439) additional and supplementary to an act entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed March 2, 1867—

Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut, said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I notice that whenever the attention of honorable gentlemen on the other side of the House is challenged to the constitutional questions arising under this bill we are met with sneers and taunts and grimaces. To all these I have no answer to make except one of silent contempt. I shall, therefore, make no apology to the House for giving the remarks I am about to offer a constitutional direction, because the bill under consideration reaches down into the lowest foundations of law and free government. No human government can be truly and permanently free that is not a constitutional government. Outside of this there is, on the one hand, absolute despotism, or else, on the other, popular chaos, crime, and anarchy.

Now, sir, whenever the Constitution or any portion of it is battered down, no matter whether by the shock of rebel States in arms, or by overriding popular commotion, or by audacious usurpation on the part of any one or all of the coordinate branches of the Government, all the securities of freedom are destroyed; we are then in the midst of revolution, and when we come to revolution it matters but little whether the instrumentalities employed are the brute force of sword and bayonet or the brute numbers of an accidental majority in Congress. Now, sir, I start out on the discussion with this proposition, that the bill before the House is a measure of revolutionary usurpation, and I will add, in my deliberate judgment, a measure of flagrant, defiant usurpation. I do not intend to stand upon this mere generality. I shall challenge the attention of this House to the proof of it. Nor shall I need go far to find my witnesses. They are present in court and on the stand. I refer to the language of the first section of the bill in proof of the position I have just taken—"the so-called civil governments in said States, respectively, shall not be recognized as valid or legal State governments either by the executive or judicial power or authority of the United States." This, sir, is a most pregnant clause. It is full, crowded, and overflowing with untold and immeasurable mischief to the Constitution and Government.

Why, I demand, is this clause incorporated in this bill? Why has this Congress attempted to hurl this audacious and impudent prohibition at the Supreme Court of the United States? Why have you attempted in the opening section of the bill to strike dumb the learned judges on the bench of that august and venerable tribunal? The reason is obvious, it is confessed. You know—you find in the law of your own minds and consciences the conviction and assurance that when this measure shall come before the Supreme Court that court will pronounce it unconstitutional and void. To that end you attempt to gag the Supreme Court. That great tribunal, intended, as Alexander Hamilton declared, "as an intermediate body between the people and the Legislature, to keep the latter within the limits assigned to that authority"—that great tribunal of the Constitution stands in your path. It is an "impediment" in the way of your revolutionary schemes. You must "go through it." By a bill which has already passed the House you have presumed to require six out of eight judges to pass on the question of the constitutionality of your acts. In so doing you have assumed supreme dominion over the Supreme Court. You have sapped it of all its marrow and life as a free, constitutional, coordinate branch of the Government. You have established yourselves—the accidental majority in Congress—as the supreme, irresponsible despot of the Government.

Have you not done enough already? What further mischief remains? Why, sir, in addition to all this, in addition to emasculating—aye, sir, emasculating—the judiciary, you now propose by the bill before the House to provide that not even by the unanimous voice of the judges shall the Supreme Court undertake ever to pass upon the validity of this bill. You propose to deprive the judicial mannikins who of your mere grace and mercy sit on their judicial seats of the power of passing on the political felony you are about to commit upon ten States of the Federal Union. This is the power you propose to usurp over an independent and coordinate branch of the General Government. When this act shall have passed the mere shell of the Supreme Court will be left, nothing more; the mere husks of the judiciary, nothing else; the mere gowns of the judges, nothing besides. Make clean work, I beseech you; send your military satraps into the chamber where that grave tribunal sits and disperse the judges; they are a useless expense, an "obstruction." Why cumber they the benches of justice?

Now, let me suggest to the better judgment of the House whether it would not be more manly, more decent, and decorous to simply pass the other sections of this bill, and then let it be challenged, if need be, by the Supreme Court. If it cannot stand the constitutional scrutiny of that tribunal, in God's name let it fall. If it can, then the majority of this House will have had their own will and way in the premises.

The learned gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM,] for all whose qualities and acquirements I have great admiration, except his politics and his law, has seen fit to say that the Supreme Court of the United States has already determined, in the case of Luther vs. Borden, that when the legislative department passes upon the question of the rights and existence of a State the judicial power is absolutely concluded by the determination of Congress. If this be so why thrust a gag into the mouths of the judges? If the law has already been so decided why put this insulting prohibition on the supreme judicial tribunal? But I deny that any such decision has been made. If Mr. Justice Taney had announced such a doctrine as that then I might possibly agree with the eloquent gentleman from Ohio that there was some resemblance between our late Chief Justice and the miserable Jeffreys, who was obliged to seek refuge from the indignation of London in the fortress of the Tower. If such a decision had fallen from the Supreme Court I would appeal, sir, from such a decision, not to the people—for I do not agree with the gentleman from Ohio that the Supreme Court is the creature of the people, and may be pulled down and built up with every changing popular election—I would appeal to the Supreme Court itself, as the creature of the Constitution, to reconsider and reverse a judgment of such intolerable and manifest injustice and error.

Now, sir, if, as the gentleman from Ohio claims, and as this bill most assuredly assumes, Congress may pass conclusively and finally upon the question of the existence of a State, what follows? This, obviously, and nothing less than this: Congress may, in its discretion, abolish the State which I have the honor to represent—one of the glorious thirteen which achieved our independence and formed the Constitution. The great giant of the West, which, I may be pardoned for saying, sometimes exercises in the House a giant's strength for questionable purposes—the great giant of the West, holding the majority in this House, might abolish all the eastern or the middle States, and, according to the doctrine laid down by the gentleman from Ohio, there would be no remedy except that which might be found in party revolutions. Now, sir, I do not acknowledge that my right as a Representative on this floor is dependent for its existence upon the breath of the nostrils of gentlemen on the other side. I deny the power of the majority in this House to expel my State from the Federal Union. She is not the creature of this Congress. Rather, sir, she is one of the sovereign creators of Congress.

If I thought the existence of my State as a member of the Federal Union—if I thought my seat on the floor of this House were dependent upon the will of this Congress I would willingly retire from its presence; I would turn my back on the Capitol; I would abandon my habitation in the valley of the Connecticut and plant my household gods on the polar side of the St. Lawrence under the shadow of the British monarchy, where I might find the securities of liberty regulated in some sort at least by constitutional law. Yet this bill assumes as its fundamental principle and postulate that the majority in Congress has the right at its pleasure to blot out any one or more of our State governments, to exclude from Congress their representatives, and that in the presence of such a monstrous, such a gigantic wrong, every other department of the Government must stand dumb and paralyzed.

Reconstruction—Mr. Hubbard.

In view of such a provision in this bill I will say, not that this Congress is infamous, but that this bill is more than infamous.

Now, sir, I hold that every State in this Government is indestructible, except upon a dissolution of the Union; that its right to representation in Congress, subject to the right of Congress to judge of the qualifications of its members, is as absolute and indefeasible under the Constitution as the natural and inalienable right of man to liberty, life, and property. There is no law under the Constitution for the murder of States at the will of a political majority in Congress; and when such an act is attempted it becomes the solemn duty of every other branch of the Government and of every citizen of the Republic to resist it, peaceably if it may be, forcibly if it must.

Sir, this power of State destruction which is claimed under this bill is the power of force and robbery which rules barbarian hordes—

"That they should take who have the power,
And they should keep who can."

Under this rule States go down and rise again with changing political parties; the minority is crushed beneath the despotism of the majority. The stars ride in their courses because uniformity, order, and law reign in the heavens; but the devil himself could not inaugurate on earth a more complete pandemonium of anarchy, chaos, and old night than this bill would bring in if the principle of the first section were accepted as the organic law of the land.

Now, sir, let me come to another subject which arises under this bill. I submit, in the second place, this is a measure of revolutionary usurpation, because it attempts to strike down the executive department of the Government. I do not stop to read that clause of the Constitution which provides that the President shall be the Commander-in-Chief of the Army; it has already been many times read in course of the debate. My excellent friend from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] seems to gather the power to abolish the office of the Commander-in-Chief from the constitutional authority of Congress to "declare war," from its authority to "raise and support armies," from its authority to "make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces." Sir, every one of these powers may doubtless be exercised by Congress, but no one of them can be so exercised as to infringe in the slightest manner on that other provision which ordains that the President shall be the Commander-in-Chief of the armies of the United States. Now what is implied in this phrase "Commander-in-Chief?" I wish to ask the attention of the House for a moment to this question. I answer, in the first place, every officer in the Army, not excepting General Grant, is the military subordinate of the President, and, if his subordinate, then of consequence subject to his command. In the next place, as Commander-in-Chief he has the authority to direct and employ all the forces and instrumentalities of war, and to this end to appoint officers and assign them to their commands.

The learned gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOWEN] insists that all that is meant by the term "Commander-in-Chief" is that the President is to see that the laws are executed, and that to this end he is to see that General Grant perform the duties devolved upon him by this bill. But suppose the President should come to the conclusion that the General fails to execute the law, may the President remove him? Who so stupid as not to know, or so disingenuous as not to confess, that the foremost object and purpose of the bill is to prevent the President from exercising any authority whatever either over the General of the Army or over the southern States? How, then—will the gentleman explain—is the President Commander-in-Chief? How is he to see that the laws are executed when his own subordinates are authorized by act of Congress to disregard and defy his authority? Suppose, under this bill General Grant should order Sheridan to Louisiana. Suppose the President should find a better use for him in the Indian country and should order him thither, who is he to obey? The General of the Army or the Commander-in-Chief? or may he elect for himself whom he will serve? I ask any man who recognizes the President as Commander-in-Chief whether ten thousand Grants could in such a case lawfully stand between the President and the execution of his order?

Sir, it is vain to deny it; this bill shears the President of the United States of his constitutional office in ten States of this Union. The bill does not intend the President shall touch the execution of the law in those States. It is to be passed for the very purpose of depriving him of that prerogative. The express aim and object of the bill is to depose him from his office as Commander-in-Chief, to lay him aside among the dead files of the War office, under the eye of the impudent intruder who now disgraces by his effrontery both himself and the War Department. If this office can be abolished in ten States, as by this bill it is, then it can be abolished in thirty-seven States. If you can abolish it in thirty-seven, then you can abolish the Constitution.

For the reasons I have given, therefore, I protest against this bill. I protest against the power of Congress to create General Grant or any one else military emperor of ten States in the Federal Union. And as some notices have been served upon us from the other side of the House I beg leave to give notice in return that if General Grant shall take upon himself the usurped powers conferred by this odious law and executes them in a manner sufficiently relentless and despotic to satisfy his political masters, he will have taken a load upon his shoulders that will break his back in the next presidential election. I care not what may be his military reputation and services; he who, after having fought for the integrity of the Constitution, shall lend himself to a scheme for the overthrow of the Constitution and the subjugation of ten States to martial law and negro dominion will, in my humble judgment, have forfeited the gratitude of his country and the luster of a great name in history. Let these modern Mark Antonys, who are offering this military crown to their modern Cæsar remember the verdict which history has passed both on the Roman Cæsar and his selfish and profligate tool. It is but a single step from the Capitol to the Tarpeian rock.

I have heard it said during this debate that a political convention of the party with which I act, during the course of the late war pronounced it a failure. To that declaration I did not then subscribe. But I do not hesitate now to say that if the execrable principles of this bill are to become the law of the land, if the scheme which is now on foot is to be successfully and permanently consummated, I hesitate not to say, though I did not believe it then, that the war has proved a failure—a dead and utter failure. For what purpose, let me ask, was the late war with the rebellion carried on? For what purpose did you shake the continent with the heavy tread of a million of men in arms? For what purpose were the flood-gates of the Treasury thrown wide open? For what purpose did a million of the people's money flow out with every setting sun? For what, I ask? Simply to determine this rule of constitutional law that the Union was indissoluble and that no State could secede from it; and for the purpose of vindicating that single principle of constitutional law a half million of men, counting the integrity of the Constitution as of more value than treasure, life, or limb, forsaking all things else—father and mother, wife and child—offered up their lives upon the fiery altar of war. Sir, that constitutional principle has been written into our organic code with a sword for a pen and blood for ink; and yet what do these reconstruction measures propose? They propose this: That to-day—when not a hostile bayonet is upturned, not a hostile foot in stirrup in the whole South, when the rebellion has been ended for more than two years—we should blot out of the Union the very States to retain which in all their "dignity, equality, and rights" was, as Congress declared in 1861, the sole purpose of the war.

Nay, more; these measures propose more. They set the nation in the attitude of war again—war against the vanquished. They put the Federal Government to the exercise of war powers—the employment of war machinery. They suppress the writ of habeas corpus, which by the Constitution can be suppressed only in time of invasion or rebellion. They establish martial law, which can only be established within the lines of belligerent military forces and in time of war. They abolish trial by jury, the inextinguishable right of the citizen in all cases and at all times except when martial law is legally established. They quarter standing armies upon the whole South. They appoint a supreme military dictator over ten States. They silence the voice of law in the clamor of arms. They subject life, limb, liberty, and property to the caprice of the sword. Nor is this the worst. The makers of the law demand its enforcement, not in mercy but in wrath. Now, I need not say it is a settled rule that a public statute in derogation of the right of the citizen is to be construed with benignity. Yet notice has already been given by the chairman of the Military Committee that the House is to be asked on Monday next "to improve"—that, I believe, is the word—"to improve the Army of the United States" by removing General Hancock from his command—the only man who has attempted to exercise benignantly the powers conferred by the reconstruction acts—the only commander who has attempted to exercise his military discretion in the interests of the citizen and on the side of liberty and law.

Now, sir, let me ask what is the purpose of this bill? It blots out, as I have said, the political institutions of ten States of the Federal Union; and why? For the simple purpose of Africanizing them. Why Africanize them? Because by that instrumentality you can Republicanize them.

Mr. PETERS obtained the floor.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut. I hope that I may have the privilege of publishing a sentence or two in conclusion of my remarks.

Mr. BINGHAM. I hope the gentleman will be allowed to deliver them.

Mr. PETERS. I have no objection.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask that by unanimous consent the gentleman from Connecticut be allowed to proceed.

No objection was made.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut. For what purpose, I inquire again, is this bill to be passed? For what purpose is the writ of habeas corpus abolished in the South? For what purpose is civil law destroyed? For what purpose are eight millions of people made over to the rule of the sword and bayonet? For what purpose is martial law to be made supreme over ten of the States of this Union? For the simple purpose, I answer again, of overwhelming the white race in the South and the rising reactionary movement in the North in a black mass of negro barbarism and ignorance. If the friends of this bill were put upon the inquiry of the confessional they would be obliged to admit it. To accomplish this end the bill is to be hurried through, with a latitude of debate, however, highly honorable, I admit, to the gentleman who reported it; but, nevertheless, the bill is to be hurried through. Other legislation must give way. The work is to be done in season for the coming presidential election.

I beg leave to say, in conclusion, Mr. Speaker, that this is a scheme which can never prevail. The assassination of ten States will never "trammel up the consequence." The judgment of this people is just; their instincts are generous. They love liberty; they hate oppression. They revere the Constitution, and whoever shall attempt in this way to upturn the deep foundations of the organic law of the land and turn us over to negro dominion, congressional despotism, and martial law will be ground to powder between the upper and the nether millstones of popular indignation. If, at the beginning of the war, the purposes now apparent had been avowed, if the programme now written down in this House had been disclosed to the people, a corporal's guard could not have been mustered to the ranks of your armies. Those grand levies of the people who flocked to the defense of the country at the sound of the first rebel gun would have dropped the bayonet and returned the sword to the rust of its scabbard. Every battle would have been a Bull Run; nay, worse than that, a Big Bethel, a Drury's Bluff.

Powers of Supreme Court.

SPEECH OF HON. THOMAS WILLIAMS, OF PENNSYLVANIA,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
January 13, 1868,

On the bill declaring what shall constitute a quorum of the Supreme Court, and to regulate the jurisdiction thereof.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. The object of the amendment reported by the committee to the Senate bill is to preserve this Government in its original spirit, and protect its people in the enjoyment of the rights intended to be secured to them by its fundamental law, by protecting that law as well against the encroachments of the States as from the ambition or infirmities of its accredited expounders, acting through the more insidious and alarming process of judicial construction, which is so often but another name for judicial legislation.

The purpose of the amendment just offered by me, which is no other than a copy of the bill that, under a feeling of profound alarm for the tranquillity of the nation and the preservation of the just balances of the Constitution, was introduced by me into the last Congress, and again renewed and referred upon the inauguration of the present one, is to make that protection sure by exacting the highest security that the authority of Congress can demand and the nature of the circumstances will admit.

To this end it provides that not less than a full bench shall sit in judgment upon the will of the people as declared through their Representatives, and that nothing short of the consentaneous agreement of the favored few, holding their places by appointment of the Executive, shall nullify that will, by breaking the scepter of the law-giver, and striking his ordinances dead at his feet.

The amendment of the committee, while it accepts and incorporates the principle enunciated in my bill, and so far challenges my approval, reduces the security provided for by it by compromising on a two-third vote, which, under the present constitution of the Supreme Court, would add one voice only to the number now required to undo the work of Congress, and give, perhaps, a new law to the people; and in this, I think, falls short of the necessities of the case and the high requirements of public duty.

The difference, then, is only one of measure or degree—a mere question of more or less—between the highest possible security and an inferior or lower one. And here, I think, it may be affirmed with confidence that the legislator, holding, as he does, a public trust, and not dealing upon his own account or for his own private interests alone, has no absolute discretion, no choice, indeed, but to take the higher and superior. Assuming the need of a guarantee for the public safety, he cannot, in my judgment, demand too much; his only question is what is within the range of the possible. When the great interests—perhaps the life—of a nation are involved, I take it to be his clear duty to waive no security, but to "Make assurance double sure,

And take a bend of fate."

The point once admitted, as it is here, that we may require any more than a majority, the whole question is surrendered. If we may exact two thirds it is transparent that we may exact the whole. And who shall say, if we may do this, that the lowest security which the country shall enjoy shall be less than the unanimity of the jury box? If that is practicable, why not insist upon it?

To these questions there can be no answer except that it is unreasonable, or inexpedient and unnecessary. But is this so? Let us examine.

It is not certainly unreasonable to insist that if the judgments of perhaps two hundred representative men, of the élite of the nation, drawn mainly from the legal profession, and embodying a large portion of its wisdom and experience, are to be overruled by a little conclave of some seven or eight not chosen by the people at all, and no wiser or better than themselves, the oracle whose nod is claimed to be equal to the stamp of fate shall give out no discordant utterances. The wisdom of that common law which was claimed by our ancestors as their birth-right has ordained that the life, and liberty, and property, even of the humblest citizen, shall not be taken away without the unanimous verdict of a jury of his peers. Who shall say that the life of a great State, the liberties of a great people, are not entitled to the same protection, and that four or five men out of a body so constituted—nay, even a bare majority of those four or five—shall determine in the last resort, and without any appeal whatever, the extent of its own charter of freedom, in defiance of the sense of the millions who, under all the forms of the Constitution, have declared their sovereign will?

I did not regard it as unlikely that the proposition, which I had the honor to introduce nearly a year ago, would startle the profession at first sight as an alarming innovation, and I am not sure that this expectation has been entirely disappointed. It could scarcely in the nature of things be otherwise. Lawyers, who run in grooves, and are educated into a superstitious reverence for precedents, and so often—I may say so proverbially—fail as statesmen, because they lack the bold, original, and progressive spirit of a Mansfield, are always averse to untried ways, and always ready to denounce the idea of reform or change, whenever it goes to matter of substance and beyond any mere question of form, as a pernicious novelty. Men of this sort will say, perhaps, that there is no case where unanimity of sentiment has ever been demanded at the hands of any tribunal on a question as to the meaning or effect of a covenant or a law, and taking their position there, maintain that the thing is improper only because there is no precedent to warrant it.

And yet if the law, as claimed by its professors, is only reason and the very perfection of it, and if what is not reason is not law, it will be found, on the application of this test, that there is nothing in the requirement of unanimity to conflict with that idea. Whatever weight considerations of mere convenience may be entitled to in ordinary cases upon questions of merely private right between man and man, it cannot certainly be affirmed that there is anything unreasonable in the proposition that unanimity of opinion shall be required where the tribunal is a small one, and it is sought to overthrow the judgment of the millions, speaking through another and greater organ, on a matter that concerns the well-being of the whole, and perhaps the very existence of the State. The lawyer who cherishes the old and favorite hypothesis, that what we every day realize to be the most uncertain of all things is always absolutely certain, cannot very consistently complain that the meager priesthood, which ministers at the shrine of an oracle that claims to be infallible, should be expected to give out no divided responses, and scatter no ambiguous voices among the worshippers, but, on the contrary, on all vital questions at least, should blend all its outgivings into one sublime chorus of universal harmony. In matters of faith, where the idea of infallibility is the rule, such consentaneity is indispensable. If the successors of the fisherman, along with the triple crown had worn a triple head, the prestige of infallibility must soon have disappeared. With seven or eight heads the faith must necessarily have perished under any other rule than that which is proposed to be enacted here.

It is only necessary to remind the lawyer himself that there is an analogy to this in that time-honored institution, the trial by jury, which, although generally referred to the great charter of English liberty, antedates the records of our race, and is imbedded in all our constitutions as the palladium of all our rights—the one great preëminent defense of private and public liberty. It was not enough that the person and property of the citizen should be walled round by the protection of his peers. Even that security was treated as inadequate without the unanimity that constitutes its excellence. It was still possible that seven men out of twelve might be warped by prejudice, misled by ignorance, imposed on by cunning, corrupted by money, or seduced or overawed by power. The life and liberty and property of the citizen were not to be trusted to the keeping of the majority, or taken away except by the unanimous accord of all his judges, passing in criminal cases as well upon the law as upon the facts. It is the glory of England, as it is the boast of America, that not one of the great natural rights, whose protection is the only legitimate object of all government, shall be disturbed, even in the smallest particular, without the unanimous judgment of a larger bench than that which claims to pass, by a divided vote, upon the fundamental law of a great nation, and in effect to nullify that law, or to make it speak in accordance with its own imperial behests. Who, then, shall say that there is in this amendment anything unreasonable or unprecedented, or any departure from the analogies of our Constitution; or that a nation may not borrow in its extremity, for the preservation of its life, the securities it has already thrown around the humblest individual and the lowliest home?

If there is anything that is transcendently and indefensibly unreasonable, it is in the idea that it should be competent for even any seven or eight men, however exalted, and with like passions and infirmities as ourselves, either to legislate away by construction the great charter of our liberties, or to set aside the decrees of the high council of the nation, embodying, as it always does, a large share of the intelligence and all of the majesty of a great people, and in effect to bind everybody but itself. That is an anomaly necessitated, perhaps, by the fact of a written Constitution, but still an anomaly that may well startle us, in view of the possibilities that are so strongly suggested by the present condition of the nation, wherein its highest judicial tribunal is invoked and depended upon, as a powerful, nay, a resistless auxiliary in the war waged by the Executive against the power that is intrusted under the Constitution with the making of its laws. There was a time when it was seriously doubted whether there was any authority in the States or the United States that could declare an act of the law-making power to be invalid because it conflicted with the constitutions of either. That question has been settled affirmatively on grounds that may be, perhaps, conceded to be unanswerable, and which I will not, at all events, attempt to controvert. It was apparently the logical and necessary result of an antagonism between a superior law and an inferior one, which could not be reconciled without the surrender of one or other of them. If the fundamental, and of course the higher law was not to prevail in such a strife, the Constitution became valueless as a limitation, which it was intended to be. It was not without reason, however, as we have occasion from very recent experience to know, that the jealous and watchful and sagacious Jefferson referred again and again to the power claimed for that tribunal, as involving the establishment of a judicial oligarchy in the land.

We look in vain to the country from which our institutions are derived for any example of such a power as this over its constitution and laws. The royal negative, it is true, may suspend the action of the legislative body, although in point of fact that prerogative has slept for near two hundred years, but it settles nothing in regard to the powers of that arm of the Government, and only stays its operation until the might of public opinion comes back to bend even royalty itself before it. No British court, even the most ancient and venerable, with all its historic prestige and all its array of learning, has ever ventured to set limits to the authority of the law-giver. The appeal is not there from Parliament to the courts, but practically from the courts themselves to Parliament, as the highest of them all. And welland faithfully has that great depository of the unwritten laws and customs of England, which constitute the safeguard of the liberties of its people, observed and performed that responsible and exalted trust. In the custody of the courts they would have sickened and died under the withering influence of royal favor. The history of that nation proves abundantly that in all the struggles between prerogative and privilege the supplest instruments of tyranny have been the judges. But to the honor of the Legislature be it said, that no decision has ever been made by them which violated the instincts of the Saxon race, by breaking down its landmarks, or traversing its great maxims of liberty, by impinging upon the natural rights of the subject, that has not been eventually reversed by the Commons of England in Parliament assembled. And thus, without a written constitution, with no guides but those high instincts, those hoary and venerable customs, and those hallowed traditions of the past, which, handed down, as they have been, from sire to son from prehistoric times, make up the body of their common or customary law, the liberties of Englishmen, so wisely reserved for their own keeping, have been perpetuated from generation to generation, not only unimpaired but enlarged, improved, developed, and strengthened by the flow of centuries. They have not learned the royal lesson of the last presidential campaign, which is still rehearsed and reiterated even here, that the danger of tyranny is from the many, or, in other words, from themselves, and that they required the vetoes of a king, or the supervisory power of a court, to instruct them as to their rights, and protect them from themselves. There have been none among their representatives so deficient in self-respect as to abase themselves in the presence of any court; none so unappreciative of their own high trusts, or so forgetful of their official dignity, as to insist, or even to concede, that there was more wisdom, and learning, and virtue concentrated in any body of seven, or eight, or even twelve men in Westminster Hall, selected by the Crown, than was to be found in the multitude of counselors that represent the people of a great empire. The Parliament of England is the guardian of the liberties of England, and cannot betray those liberties without surrendering its own. And so, too, with our Constitution and all of value that it contains. When it ceases to be safe in the hands of all the people, who have a common inheritance in its provisions, it is idle to hope that it can be locked up securely under the custody of any seven or eight men outside, as so many doctors of the Sanhedrim, with the high prerogative of reading and interpreting it to the people, as the imperfect judgment or the mere caprice of a majority of them may determine. The statesman who holds that we cannot safely trust ourselves, and that our only security is in such a guardianship, surrenders the idea of self-government as a visionary and impracticable thing, and confesses that a political State cannot exist without a master. That is an ancient superstition. Wise men of old and some of modern times have entertained it. The world has generally been governed under it, often by a hierarchy. It was supposed for a long time to have been exploded here. It is now revived under the auspices of the Democratic party—once so hostile to this régime—in the idea that a sort of hieratic college—a priesthood of a new religion—a little oligarchy of lawyers—is the only safe depository of the supreme power of the State. The difference is only between an oligarchy and a monarchy—between eight sacerdotal masters—a sort of conclave of superannuated cardinals—in wigs and gowns, and a single royal one in purple. Without disparagement to either of these high professions, and certainly with none to that to which nearly forty years of my own life have been devoted, and which is now sought by some to be enthroned at this Capitol as the absolute master of the State, I must be excused for thinking that, however flattering may be the offer of the crown to us, many people would, perhaps, prefer the purple, with all its attendant splendors, to the sable regalia of either the priest or the pedagogue.

If it has been found, however, that the liberties of Englishmen could not be safely trusted to their courts, how much less likely is it that ours, as a people, can be confided securely to the same hands here. It may be truly said of the judiciary of the mother-land, that since the era of the great Revolution, for a period now of near two hundred years, there have been no tribunals among men that have been more exempt from the frailties of humanity, and have more nearly approximated to the ideal of unerring wisdom and perfect justice; and it is to the fact that the highest honors of the profession are only accessible to the highest excellence, that there are no loftier rewards to tempt ambition, even the most restless and insatiable, and that there is a homogeneity among its people which frees it from the adulteration of foreign and inferior ethnic elements, that it is indebted for these exalted qualities. No favoritism rules in the selection of its judges. The leader in the forum steps by an admitted right of succession into the first vacancy on the bench. It is scarcely within the power of the Crown itself to disregard this rule in its appointments. To pass by the trained athletes, and single out even the greatest of the parliamentary leaders for such a place, would shock the moral sense of the whole realm. Not so, unfortunately, with us.

There is, perhaps, scarce a Congressman or Cabinet officer, who has been long enough in public life to unlearn all of law that he ever knew, whose modesty would prevent him from seeking or accepting the mantle that has fallen from the shoulders of a Marshall or a Story. It is not to the leaders of the bar in this country that the honors of the profession are awarded, as their undisputed right; and they are, perhaps, not sought by them, for the reason that the rewards are not commensurate with the earnings of the higher class of professional men. And therefore it is that the bar is in most cases superior to the bench, as it cannot be where the usage prevails of selecting the judges from the ablest of its members; and therefore it is, too, that the spectacle of a divided court is, of late years especially, so common a thing, that unanimity is the exception rather than the rule, and lawyers themselves are startled at the idea of prescribing a condition that to them seems impossible. I take leave to say that it is no more impossible than the harmonious agreement of a jury. It is questions of fact alone that are the most fruitful sources of difference among men. In matters of pure science, as the law is sometimes claimed to be, there is no great room for controversy. High culture and thorough discipline will go far to secure accordance in opinion. The best lawyers will be seldom found to differ where they are agreed upon the facts. It is only the pretenders, the mere sciolists, that convert what ought to be the temple of concord into an arena of perpetual strife, on the bench as well as at the bar. In the long term of thirty-two years, during which Lord Mansfield presided over the Court of King's Bench, there were, if my recollection serves me right, but two cases of division among the judges of that court—one the case of Millar vs. Taylor, upon the great question of literary property, and the other that of Perrin vs. Blake, upon the application of the rule in Shelley's case—and no reversals in the Exchequer Chamber or in the House of Lords, except in those two cases, wherein the dissenting judge was Yates, who was decided to be right in both. Another Yates might save the Constitution here against even the errors of another Mansfield by the adoption of the proposed amendment. And what is there, in view of this striking chapter of judicial history, which is only singled out by way of illustration of the general harmony that prevails in England, to prevent the achievement of the same result with us; and who is there that will consent, until it is accomplished, to trust the welfare and the very existence of this nation to such an arbitrament?

But it is not the want of professional training only that makes the difficulty and the danger here. The judge, with us, is not so much a lawyer as a politician. The chances are that his politics, and not his knowledge of the law, have made him what he is; and the place he has sought and won is, perhaps, but the stepping-stone to a higher one—which he covets more—whenever he shall have recommended himself sufficiently by his conduct there, either to the President or to the party to which he owes his exaltation. Without any of the esprit du corps, the devotion to his proper calling, the high professional pride that always results from high professional training, he sinks the lawyer in the politician, and carries into the temple of Themis, where no divided worship is admissible, all the prejudice of party, and all the spirit of the local and sectional demagogue. It is idle to talk of our courts of justice as merely judicial institutions. Disclaiming ostensibly all jurisdiction over political questions, they are as thoroughly political in their texture and spirit as the two Houses of Congress themselves, over whose atmosphere of mists and storms they are supposed to float, like disembodied spirits, in the celestial light of an unclouded and unbiased reason. Turn to the history of our jurisprudence, State and national, and what do you see but the reflection of the opinions of the party which happens for the time being to have the ascendancy in the courts? Fortunately, perhaps, for the welfare of this nation, before it was well hardened into the consistency of an organized State, the plastic hand of the party that favored the covenant of Union was invoked to put its impress on the work and launch it on its high career. If the old Federalist, however, carried to the bench one set of opinions, the old Republican brought with him another. With the growth of slavery the State rights Democrat, drawing his inspiration mainly from that unhallowed institution, took possession of the State and Federal courts, stealing away, even in the free Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, the chartered rights of the black man, under the miserable juggle that the word "freeman" did not mean a free man, but a white man, and maintaining its power here and in the States until that power culminated and carried the country down into rebellion and ruin, in the monstrous paradox that slavery and not freedom was the law of this Republic, and that four millions of its native inhabitants were but aliens and outlaws, with no rights that a white man was bound to respect.

When the echo of these opinions came back in the roll of the war drum, and the thunders of the artillery that shook this Capitol, the Supreme Court of the United States, startled, as it no doubt was, by the unexpected results of its own work, with one defection only, maintained its faith to the Union by adhering to the Government, affirming its powers of self-conservation, and recognizing the belligerent relations created by the war. It could not well have been otherwise. Its dignity, its power, its very existence, were involved in the preservation of that Union whose integrity was menaced by the revolt. Not so, however, with the party judges of the States. While it was no longer safe to question the power to coerce, wherever a Democratic judge was found, he was almost sure to cast his vote into the southern scale by a denial of the means, while the Republican judges of the loyal States were ever ready to enforce the legislation of the governments, both Federal and State, in aid of the war. Thus in Pennsylvania, when it was proposed to arm the soldier with the suffrage in the field, in order to enable him to protect himself from "a fire in the rear," the constitutionality of the law enacted for that purpose was denied by a Democratic court. If the right of the General Government to compel the military service of its citizens in its darkest hour was sustained even upon the anomalous and extraordinary proceeding of a bill in equity to enjoin the draft, hurried to an argument against all rule before a full bench, in midsummer and out of term, while the rebel armies were thundering at our very gates, and pressing in serried columns upon the fatal field of Gettysburg, by the supreme court of the same State, it was only through a popular election which deposed one Democratic judge, and the defection of another, who preferred his country to his party. If the legal-tender act, which provided in the nation's extremity the sinews of war, and fed and clothed the gallant volunteers who so freely offered their young lives to the sacred cause of liberty, was saved from judicial condemnation in the same court, it was in the same way. And now it may be added, since the danger has apparently passed away, and the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States, lately united and cemented together under a feeling of common danger, have come to feel that the Federal judiciary is saved along with the Union on which it depends, they are found to divide again according to their original political connections and proclivities, upon the validity of the test-oath, the military commissions, and perhaps others of the important measures of self-preservation and defense that contributed so largely to carry us successfully through the war, while it is not to be denied, that if the authority of Congress is not absolutely menaced at this very moment from the same direction, this body at least, if not the whole country, is affected with the deepest alarm by rumors of a combination between the Executive and the courts for the overthrow of the legislative power.

Allow me to remark, however, that in what I have just said in relation to the decisions of the courts I have not intended to inquire who of the judges involved were right and who were wrong, because it is not necessary to the argument, and gentlemen on the other side, to whom it is equally addressed, might differ with me as to that. The object I have in view just here is only to make good the allegation that the decisions of the courts, on constitutional questions especially, are almost invariably governed by the party affiliations of the members, and therefore not so much the judgments of lawyers as of politicians. If the fact be so, it is, of course, and must forever be, in the mutations of party and with the ever-changing kaleidoscope of politics, entirely fatal to the idea of uniformity of decision, and nothing is ever to be settled, as nothing apparently has been settled incontrovertibly heretofore. Assuming it to be true, moreover, there is an end of all argument in support of the judgment of a divided court, if there is not an end of all apology for treating even its unanimous decisions on questions of constitutional law as conclusive upon Congress and the people when they are not even conclusive upon themselves.

It was a grave error, therefore, as I honestly think, on the part of the founders of this Republic, when they departed from the example of our British ancestors in giving place to such an anomaly, instead of reserving the ultimate judgment in all such cases to their own Representatives, or at least preserving their control over the judiciary, by the method of address by two thirds of both Houses, which was provided in the statute of 9 William III, and has been copied by some of the State constitutions, instead of relying only on the inadequate remedy of impeachment, which corrects no error, however vital, and leaves the defaulting judge to shelter himself under the plea that he erred from ignorance only, or without corrupt intent. To meet this difficulty, however, I have had the honor to submit a constitutional amendment to the same effect, in order to maintain the just authority of the law-making power, by bringing the Federal judiciary within the reasonable control of Congress, with such qualifications as will guard it sufficiently against abuse, which I propose to bring to the notice of the House at some more favorable opportunity.

Assuming, however, that the power of review is properly lodged with the Supreme Court, the question is whether the limitation proposed would be a proper one. That it is so is, I think, demonstrable from well-settled principles, and as a logical result of the decisions of the court itself.

It is admitted on all hands that questions of this sort are of great delicacy, and ought not to be even heard, except in the presence of a full bench. This is the rule in Pennsylvania, and perhaps everywhere else, and the practice of the Supreme Court of the United States is shown by the Reports to be in strict accordance with it. (6 Wheaton.) There can be no possible objection, therefore, to so much of the bill as merely imparts the sanction of law to what is already recognized as a rule of the court.

But the rulings of the courts do not stop short with the concession of the principle, that cases of this nature ought not to be heard except before a full bench. It is still further admitted, as well by the Supreme Court of the United States as by the judicial tribunals of all the States, so far as I am acquainted with them, that no act of the law-making power ought to be declared invalid on the ground of conflict with the Constitution, except in a very clear case. (Fletcher vs. Peck, 6 Cranch, 128; Resp. vs. Duquet, 3 Yates, 493; Eakin vs. Robb, 12 S. & R.) In the first named case Judge Marshall says, in delivering the opinion of the court:

"The question whether a law be void for its repugnancy to the Constitution is at all times a question of much delicacy, which ought seldom, if ever, to be decided in the affirmative in a doubtful case. It is not on slight implication or vague conjecture that the Legislature is to be presumed to have transcended its powers and its acts to be considered void. The opposition between the Constitution and the law should be such that the judge feels a clear and strong conviction of their incompatibility with each other."

And this is reason. When we look to the fact that every law enacted by the Congress of the United States must pass the ordeal of a bench of judges in the Judiciary Committee of each House; undergo public discussion and scrutiny on the floors of both; be affirmed by the votes of at least one hundred and twenty men, comprising among them a large number of lawyers of great experience and ability, and many of them at least the peers of the judges of the Supreme Court themselves, and then either approved by the President, or reviewed and reaffirmed upon objections made by a two-third vote, it would have been surprising, indeed, if the court could have held any other language in regard to it. When they say, however, that the case must be a clear one, they affirm by an inevitable logic the principle of my amendment. No case can be said to be a clear one where even one out of eight judges dissents, as no decision is regarded as an unimpeachable authority, even in an ordinary case, where there has been a division on the bench; and none à fortiori ought to be considered in a case of that sort as of any weight or value whatever. It may be that the dissenting judge is, as in the case of Yates, the ablest lawyer of the number, and therefore it is no unusual thing to find, as in that of Curtis in the Dred Scott case, that the dissenting opinion is the more thoroughly considered and satisfactory of the two. It is not mere brute numbers that ought to prevail in the forum of reason, or in other words, of law, which is supposed to be the perfection of it. The vulgar idea of a majority in numbers, which is only properly admissible on grounds of convenience if not necessity, because in the case of conflicting wills it is impossible that both can prevail, (1 Tucker's Black Commentaries, Appendix, 168-172; 9 Dan Abridgt 37-43 1 Story's Commentaries, section 330) has no proper place in the comparison of opinions, which are not to be tested, as Tacitus, I think, expresses it in regard to the great councils of the Germanic tribes, by numeration, but by weight. It follows, however, from the theory of the court itself, that the law, which is but the voice of the people speaking through their Representatives, is entitled to the benefit of every doubt, and ought not to be pronounced unconstitutional where there is any dissent whatever; and so they must decide if they would be consistent with themselves. The effect of this amendment therefore is only to hold them to the logical consequences of a doctrine which has been distinctly, emphatically, and repeatedly enunciated by themselves.

We are so much accustomed in this country to the idea of a majority, as the fundamental one on which all republican government must practically rest, that we are apt to suppose that it has its own foundation in the very nature of things, and that every departure from it must do violence to the spirit of our institutions. Allow me to say that this is a great mistake. The idea is exclusively a social and political one. There is no such thing in nature as the right of superior numbers to govern the inferior. Mr. Burke, whose richly furnished, comprehensive, and philosophic mind was brought by the leading events of his time to the exploration and analysis of the great principles that lie at the foundation of all government, holds this language in his "appeal from the new to the old Whigs":

"We are so little affected by things which are habitual that we consider this idea of a majority as if it were a law of our original nature; but such constructive whole, residing in a part only, is one of the most violent fictions of positive law that has ever been or can be made on the principles of artificial incorporation. Out of civil society nature knows nothing of it; nor are men, even when arranged according to civil order, otherwise than by a very long training, brought at all to submit to it."

"This mode of decision where wills may be so nearly equal, where according to circumstances the smaller number may be the stronger force, and where apparent reason may be all on one side, and on the other little else than impetuous appetite; all this must be the result of a very special convention, confirmed afterward by long habits of obedience, by a sort of discipline in society, and by a strong hand vested with stationary, permanent power to enforce this sort of constructive general will. What organ it that shall declare the corporate mind is so much a matter of positive arrangement that several States, for the validity of several of their acts, have required a proportion of voices much greater than that of a mere majority. Those proportions are so entirely governed by convention that in some cases the minority decides. The laws, in many countries, to condemn require more than a mere majority; less than an equal number to acquit. In our judicial trials we require unanimity either to condemn or absolve. In some incorporations one man speaks for the whole; in others a few. Until the other day in the constitution of Poland unanimity was required to give validity to any act of their great national council or diet. This approaches much more nearly to rude nature than the institutions of any other country. Such, indeed, every commonwealth must be without a positive law to recognize in a certain number the will of the entire body."

Now, a reference to the structure of our own political machine will show, that while the majority principle, which is but the common law, is generally recognized in public affairs as the governing one, it is not by any means the universal rule of our Constitution, and that the framers of our Government have deviated from it largely by way of check or limitation upon the possible and probable abuse of such a power. I have already referred to the trial by jury, where unanimity, which is of its very essence, is the rule. The trial by impeachment, where two-thirds are required to convict, is another case where the majority idea is departed from. Again, in the enactment of our laws, the power of the majority in either House is controlled by the dissent of the other, while both are bridled by the one-man power residing in the President, and a two-third vote of each, although comprising of themselves, by the very terms of the Constitution, the entire legislative power, is required to enable them to act effectively alone; so that it may be truly said that the rule of legislation is a two-third vote. The like majorities are required for the alteration of the fundamental law itself, along with the consent of at least three fourths of all the States. In all these cases the majority rule is not permitted to apply, and that for the transparent reason that the great vital interests of the State and people demand a higher measure of security. So little regard, indeed, is had for this cabalistic number, which is supposed to be so full of preternatural virtue, that a departure may be witnessed even in the opposite direction, in the rule which prevails in nearly all the States in the choice of Presidents and Congressmen, at Federal as well as State elections, that a mere plurality, which is only another name for a minority, may elect to the most important offices.

If the majority principle is the rule in the courts, and generally at the ballot-box, it rests only on the same grounds of convenience that have tolerated and recommended the rule of a plurality. It is a necessity that wherever there is a diversity of opinion the larger number shall prevail if there is to be any decision at all; and therefore it is, that by the rule of the common law, which is the growth of a nation that never recognized the rule of a majority in affairs of state, a power delegated to three or more persons for a public purpose, is exercisable by a majority of the persons named, while a merely private authority cannot be executed by any number less than the whole. (6 Johnson's Report, 38.) The consequence in the latter case is, that it must fail altogether in the event of a difference of opinion, which in affairs of state would be entirely inadmissible, wherever any positive act is to be done. In the ordinary course of judicial proceedings it may be admitted that the rule of unanimity would be, if not absolutely impracticable, as I think it is, a source of endless and infinite embarrassment, and result unquestionably in the great delay, if not the absolute denial, of justice. In the case, however, of a question as to the constitutionality of an act of Congress there is no such exigency. The requirement of unanimity will only give to the law-making power the benefit of the favorable presumption to which no lawyer will dispute that it is entitled, and fortify that presumption with the advantage of any doubt, by treating its own decisions as the rule that is to govern the courts until, at least, they shall have been reversed by the united and concurring voices of the whole of that judiciary which claims to hold a delegated power to sit in judgment upon its authority. There will be no such inconvenience as a failure to decide. When the judges differ they will have already decided that the law is constitutional by failing to agree that it is otherwise, and the law of Congress will prevail, as it ought to do, whenever they cannot be brought to agree that it is wrong.

Having thus shown, as I think, the entire reasonableness and propriety of the change proposed, the next and last question is as to our power to effect it. And here, I think, there is no doubt or difficulty.

In the first place, then, the Constitution provides that—

"The judicial power shall be vested in one Supreme Court and such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish."

There is nothing here, however, as to the number of judges who shall compose it; nothing as to the number who shall be competent to pass upon such questions as may come before it. It is unquestionable that Congress may fix the number of the court at its own discretion, and it has always done so. It is equally clear that it may determine how many of them shall be required to constitute a court for business purposes, and this it has also done by declaring how many shall be necessary to make a quorum. As the law now stands, it requires more than two thirds of that tribunal, as at present organized, for this purpose. The constitutionality of that law has never been doubted by anybody. If it was valid when enacted, it is certainly not made otherwise by the reduction that has since taken place in the number of the judges. If it is still the law, then, by a further reduction of the number, the now existing quorum might become the whole, and upon this argument the constitutionality of so much of the amendment at least as requires a hearing before a full bench is clearly demonstrated.

And now, in the second place, as to the power of Congress to require the concurring opinions of the whole of what it may choose to declare a quorum, upon any decision which they may propose to make against the validity of any of its laws.

It is to be remembered always that the authority of the court is a purely delegated one. It does not follow, therefore, as a conclusion of reason, from the doctrine that a majority of several joint owners may dispose of the joint property, or because a corporate body may act in the same way in relation to a matter which concerns themselves, that the same rule shall apply to a public trust, except perhaps, in cases where it is incapable of execution in any other way. The people are entitled to the benefit of the aggregate wisdom of the bench, in the concurring judgments of all those who compose it. The Supreme Court might have been constituted of a single judge, and ought to, and perhaps would have been so constituted but for the proverbial and generally received hypothesis, that wisdom is to be found rather in "the multitude of counsellors" than in the few—not, however, in view of their ultimate disagreement, but to the end that, by comparison and even the possible shock and conflict of opinions, the truth may be evolved and harmony secured, just as in the system of the universe, it is said by the poet, that "all nature's difference makes all nature's peace." It can hardly be supposed that, in the constitution of a bench of eight or nine judges, it was intended that five only of the number should decide, or expected that a sound conclusion could be reached by any result so near an equipoise. To claim for this larger fraction the power of a constructive whole is not too strongly characterized by Mr. Burke, in the passage already cited, as "one of the most violent fictions of positive law that have ever been or can be made on the principles of artificial incorporation," and "cannot be so made, in a Commonwealth, without a positive law to recognize it." There is no law, however, in the present case except the common law, resting on the reason of the thing, which is only its supposed necessity in ordinary cases; and this, as a mere rule of procedure, not entering into the constitution of the tribunal, and only prescribing a law for its government. If it inhered necessarily in that constitution—if it were of the essence of a court that it should act in all cases by mere majorities—if, in other words, it were strictly definable as a machine whose principle of motion was of that sort only, it might be objected, perhaps, that the Constitution had settled it. But this, I suppose, will hardly be pretended by anybody. In any other aspect of the question, however, it is but a rule of the common law for the regulation and more effective working of these tribunals; in which case there is nothing, of course, to prevent its abrogation by the power that makes and un-makes the law, in accordance with its own sovereign will, which is only the will of the people declaring itself through their representatives. So long as the authority to decide is still left and still exercisable by the courts, at their own discretion, and upon their own judgments, they have no more right to complain that they are all required to agree in order to nullify the law than that they are not now permitted to do the same thing, as a quasi-corporate body, without the concurrence of a majority of such a quorum as it has pleased the Congress of the United States to indicate.

It is not necessary, however, to either of the pending amendments, to borrow the aid of the general principle that Congress may alter and modify the rule of the common law. The power is to be found in the Constitution itself, so far at least as regards the appellate jurisdiction of the court, which is the whole extent of this bill. That jurisdiction which extends to all cases, except those "affecting ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, and those in which a State is a party," is conferred only with the express reservation that it shall be exercised and enjoyed "with such exceptions and under such regulations as the Congress shall make." What is the meaning of this language? The word "regulations" imports no more than rules or laws. That it carries with it any power to change the rule of decision, so as to impose another law upon the court than the action of its own judicial mind, or to do anything further than prescribe the mode of decision, I do not claim. It will not be disputed, at least, that under this provision it may limit the jurisdiction to such cases as it thinks proper, and settle in its own way the whole process of removal to, and treatment in the appellate court. If it shall think proper, then, to accord that jurisdiction only on the condition that none of its own acts shall be overruled on constitutional grounds without the judgment of an undivided court, who shall gainsay its right so to do, when it may even refuse the jurisdiction altogether where the court below may have affirmed the validity of its enactments?

And now, having fully vindicated, as I trust I have done, the principles of the amendment I have had the honor to submit, covering, as it does, as well the modification on which the Judiciary Committee has agreed, and which in default of the higher security will not be unacceptable to me, I must be allowed a word in conclusion on the reasons which have prompted the introduction and agitation at the present moment of a question that seems, in some measure, to have taken the press and country and even the profession by surprise, as a very novel if not a very bold experiment.

It will be said, perhaps, as it has been already more than whispered in some quarters of the Union, that this alarming proposition is only a mere expedient for the time, intended to serve the purposes of the moment, and with a view only to a particular case; just as the important provision of the tenure-of-office law extending its operation to the heads of Departments, which without much active sympathy or support from any quarter, and only by persevering and persistent effort, and after repeated defeats, I was happily enabled to see ingrafted upon this law, against the apparent sense of the Senate and the unyielding opposition of a large portion of the Republican members of this House, has been published to the world through all the organs of public opinion, until it has persuaded everybody here, and the echo of it has come back even from the other side of the Atlantic, as a mere party contrivance to save a particular officer—who was known by me at the time to be himself opposed to it—instead of a great measure of state, prompted by a conviction of the absolute necessity of securing the independence of a set of functionaries who had come to look upon the master of their fortunes as the rightful master of their wills, and intended for all heads of Departments and all time. The impatient urgency with which the pending measure is just now pressed, even in its imperfect shape, after having slept so long undisturbed, may seem to give an air of plausibility to this suggestion. If the fact of its introduction nearly a year ago is not a sufficient answer, I may be allowed to say, at least for myself, that I have never belonged to that timid school of practitioners, which deals only in palliatives, when great public evils which threaten the safety of the State are to be remedied. When I beheld the law obstructed on system, and arrived at the conviction—shared with me by a majority of this House—that the supreme Executive Magistrate of this nation, the officer intrusted under the Constitution with the execution of its laws, instead of performing that duty had disclosed a settled purpose to thwart your measures and defy your will, I was at once prepared to meet that exigency by the complete and obvious and radical measure of relief, which I thought the Constitution had placed in our hands, instead of resorting to any evasive or circuitous process, any mere experiments of doubtful validity or dangerous example, to accomplish the same object. When I saw again the rare chance, the golden opportunity, of correcting a capital error, canonized in some sort by a practice coeval with the Government, in the concession of the absolute power of removal to the President, which had been so fatally used and abused, I was equally ready to take advantage of the feeling of peril engendered by the usurpations of that officer, for the purpose of accomplishing a long desiderated object, which would have been proper at all times, but had never been possible till now. So when the wild vagaries of the courts, the obvious political leanings of the judges in great affairs of State, and the atrocious and abominable doctrines to which the highest of them was not ashamed to give utterance, had stripped them of the awful prestige the more than Druidical sanctity—that had surrounded and covered them from the rude gaze of the people—when the very priesthood of the altar itself had drawn aside the curtain of the sanctuary before the eyes of the nation, in a revelation that surpassed in hideousness and horror all that the poet's conception had imagined of the impostor prophet, when he lifted his veil in the presence of his deluded followers and proclaimed in their ears in thunder tones:

Ye would be fools and victims, and ye are:"

I was equally prepared to improve the occasion, by striking boldly at the dangerous anomaly of a power in this nation that was higher than its Constitution and its laws. The time had not yet come to do this thing, until the red harvest of death had been gathered from the seed thus sown, in so many battle-fields; but revolutions are the opportunities of statesmen, and he is no statesman who hesitates when the way is providentially leveled before him, and he is thus invited to enter upon it; as he, too, is none, who dreads the idle and unmeaning taunt that he is merely legislating for the evil that is imminent, just as though it were not the business of the statesman to meet the danger that is exigent. In quiet times the chances for reform are rare. The measure now proposed was a proper one at all times. The present condition of the country only demonstrates, through an imminent peril, its absolute necessity.

SPEECH OF HON. S. S. MARSHALL, OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
January 9, 1868.

The House having under consideration Senate amendment to House bill No. 369, to prevent frauds in the collection of the tax on distilled spirits—

Mr. MARSHALL said:

Mr. SPEAKER: The few remarks which I shall submit upon this occasion have been suggested by the debate that has arisen this afternoon on the proposition before the House, and I shall not detain the House for any great length of time. It was not my purpose, when this question was brought before the House, to say anything whatever upon it, for with the details and particular merits of the proposition pending I do not pretend to be very familiar. But as the debate has taken a latitude that does not properly belong to the question immediately before the House I wish to avail myself of the opportunity to suggest some things that ought, as I think, to be brought to the attention of the country. I have no direct or peculiar information in regard to the enormous and outrageous frauds that are being perpetrated upon the Government and upon the overtaxed and oppressed people of this country. There can be no doubt that these frauds have for some years been increasing so rapidly, and have now become so enormous, as to be perfectly appalling, and to threaten not only the ruin of the people, but the very existence of our Government.

It is an unquestionable fact that thievery and robbery of the people by public officials all over the land have within the last few years become a science. It is engaged in extensively in all parts of the country, and it has grown to be such an enormous evil that it now threatens to bring starvation to the people and bankruptcy to the Government. Many of the facts are notorious, but it seems impossible to bring any of these great thieves and malefactors to justice. The fact is the public sense has become demoralized. The public wink at crimes when they are so enormous that the pockets of the criminals are filled with gold or greenbacks. We can punish little petty thieves in our courts of justice, men who steal a pig or horse, or something of that kind, but the thief who robs the Treasury of thousands or millions goes at large with impunity, and too often becomes an honored member of society. There ought to be—there must be, Mr. Speaker—somewhere a remedy for this. A large portion of our public officials seem to have adopted as an axiom that "A little thieving is a dangerous art,

But thieving largely is a noble part;
'Tis vile to rob a hen-roost of a hen,
But stealing largely makes us gentlemen."

And it is the adopting of this maxim which has brought half of this country almost to destitution, while in the other half the people are raising their hands in vain to Heaven for bread.

Ruin and devastation have spread all over the land. An over-burdened people are appealing now to this Congress for redress. If we can in any manner give it to them it is our sacred duty to do so.

But while this is so it is unfair and unjust on the part of my colleague, [Mr. LOGAN,] or of any other member upon this floor, to deal in wholesale denunciations of any public official without bringing forward facts to show that those charges are well founded. Charges have been made here by my colleague [Mr. LOGAN] against the President of the United States and against the Secretary of the Treasury which, if true and sustained by evidence, ought to send them down through all time as more infamous than any men who ever held office in this or in any other country.

Now, admitting that many public officials all over the land, as charged by my colleague, are engaged in this wholesale robbery, yet I am not willing to condemn any man, high or low, upon broad specifications of this kind, unsustained by one single fact or one particle of evidence. I understand my colleague [Mr. LOGAN] to say that the Secretary of the Treasury has knowingly appointed these thieves and robbers to office, and that the President has done the same, or has winked at enormous crimes of this character. He also charges that the Secretary of the Treasury has issued instructions that prove him to be a fool or a scoundrel.

These are grave charges; if true, these men should be infamous. But if they are not sustained by facts which can be stated here, what ought to be said, what must be said, of honorable men upon this floor who make charges of this kind against men in high official positions without having one particle of proof to sustain them?

Mr. LOGAN. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment right here?

Mr. MARSHALL. If my colleague will be brief I will do so with pleasure.

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly. My statement, which I will repeat, was this: that the principal frauds which were committed were committed under Treasury regulations; that if the law was carried out it would be a protection against fraud to a much greater extent than are the Treasury regulations; that those regulations were of such a character that they did absolutely authorize or protect fraud, from the manner in which they were issued. There were so many of them—

Mr. MARSHALL. I cannot yield further.

Mr. LOGAN. I will make my statement very brief.

Mr. MARSHALL. I cannot yield.

Mr. LOGAN. Let me state about the second matter.

Mr. MARSHALL. If I had plenty of time, or the House would agree to extend it, I would yield to my colleague with great pleasure. But I am indebted for the short time that I am now entitled to the floor entirely to the courtesy of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. VAN WYCK,] and I shall probably not have time to make the remarks that have suggested themselves to me as appropriate on this occasion. I do not wish to do my colleague or any one else any injustice. His statement is on the record here, and if I do him any injustice he can correct me hereafter.

I understood him to state, in regard to these Treasury regulations, that they were intended to aid in the perpetration of frauds. If that is so it is not the duty of my colleague to bring before the House the instructions to which he refers, in order that we may judge whether or not the Secretary of the Treasury has been a party to these frauds upon the country?

Now, it is a very easy matter to deal in general charges of this kind. To what extent has the Secretary of the Treasury or the President appointed thieves and robbers to office? Or when have they, if appointed, been called to the attention of the President or Secretary, and they been asked to exert their power to remove? Name the man, the occasion, the circumstance; and if they have been guilty of offences of this kind let them be condemned by the country, by history, and by the world.

Sir, no man's reputation is safe if a member upon this floor deems that he is authorized to get up here and deal in wholesale defamation of public officers without bringing forward one particle of proof or a single fact against any one of them. If my colleague [Mr. LOGAN] will reflect a moment he must see that such a course is unjust—one which cannot be sustained for a moment upon any principle of justice or fair dealing among men.

Mr. LOGAN. Does the gentleman desire me to state a case? I can do so.

Mr. MARSHALL. I would yield to the gentleman if it did not come out of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, [Mr. WINDOW.] It must come out of the gentleman's time.

Mr. MARSHALL. If my colleague can state a case, let him, when he has the floor, (and he has much better opportunities of obtaining it than I have,) bring forward his charges; let him prove them; it is his duty to do so if he has facts upon which to base them; and then let the facts go before the country. If there is no other mode of punishment let the country at least know that these high officials are conniving at or participating in these enormous frauds. I will be the last man in the House to attempt to shield them if they are guilty of these enormities. But I say here that I do not believe such to be the fact. I certainly do not believe that the President or the Secretary of the Treasury has knowingly aided in the perpetration of these frauds. Why, sir, what do they know personally of the men appointed to official position throughout this broad land? Neither the President nor the Secretary of the Treasury knows personally one man in a thousand of those appointed. The appointees are recommended by members of Congress—by my colleague [Mr. LOGAN] and gentlemen on that side of the House to a much greater extent than by any on this side. The men holding the public offices of the country under presidential appointment are men appointed either by Mr. Lincoln or Mr. Johnson with the approbation of the Senate of the United States. It is a notorious fact that no member of the Democratic party proper can pass the ordeal of the Senate for any appointment. The appointments throughout the country have been made from men within the Republican party. So far as my colleague's speech was intended to have a partisan bearing let me say that he must know that the Democratic party proper has had no part or lot in the collection of the revenues of the Government. Secretary McCulloch stated on oath before the Judiciary Committee that nineteen out of twenty of the officials in his Department were not only not Democrats but Radicals, supporters of the policy of Congress; and Mr. Rollins, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, admitted to be a strong Radical, was present when the testimony was given and assented to the statement. So it is all over the country.

The effort of my colleague to give this matter a partisan turn must be met, and may be rightfully met, in this way: in all Governments frauds occasionally occur. Now and then, under every Administration, a scoundrel gets into office. Even under good old Democratic Administrations there occasionally got into office some man who perpetrated frauds upon the Government; but they were promptly turned out when the fact was discovered. It was not till the advent of the Republican party to power that robbery of the people became a fine art [laughter] and was indulged in all over the country. A distinguished Republican Senator from New Hampshire (Mr. Hale) has testified in the Senate, and a distinguished Republican Representative from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] has testified in this House that more of the money of the people was stolen during the first year of Mr. Lincoln's Administration than the entire expenses of conducting the Government during the four years of Mr. Buchanan's Administration. And, sir, that inundation of thievery which commenced then has been growing and rolling and swelling from that day to this until the people are brought to poverty in one section of the country and to starvation in another. If the party that brought about this thing has any remedy to offer it is time the remedy should be presented. When the people are crying for relief from the enormous burdens which are weighing them down it is high time that this party, now upon its last legs and about to retire from power forever, should inaugurate some system by which the people may be hereafter protected from such robbery as that by which they have suffered. There are many ways of introducing reform and protecting the interests of the people. I know of one method which I think would be infallible, and I hope my colleague, or if that is hopeless, at least that the honest masses who have been deceived by the false pretensions of the party in power, will join me in bringing about the desired reform.

I do not, I must confess, have very strong hopes that my colleague will unite in the proposed effort, but the remedy is a palpable one, and that is to go back to the old principles and practice of Democratic administration, bring in a Democratic President and a Democratic Congress, and introduce the principles of economy and justice which were always carried out when that party was in power. Then this robbery of the people will cease. I will guaranty it, sir. The history of our Government from its foundation to the present time furnishes irrefragable evidence that this is the remedy, and now the only remedy.

My colleague proposes one plan by which to increase the revenue from the whisky tax. I propose another plan, and that is to get rid right now of this party which has thus wronged and oppressed the people, and brought desolation, ruin, mourning, and woe to our fair land. Let the slick, unctuous gentlemen around me bow themselves out of these Halls, and let the old fashioned Democratic administration come into power, and I will guaranty that we will have an Administration which will relieve the people of the enormous burdens which are now crushing out their very lives, and that we will drive the thieves and money-changers in disgrace and ignominy from this great temple of liberty which they have been polluting and desecrating.

Mr. MAYNARD. Let me ask the gentleman a question. Mr. Floyd, one of the old-fashioned economists, has unfortunately departed, but can he inform us whether Jacob Thompson is accessible, and what means we shall resort to in order to get him back? [Laughter.]

Mr. MARSHALL. I have heard charges against these men, and they may be true, but Mr. Buchanan's Administration was not a favorite of mine. I have, however, the testimony of leading Republicans for saying that the stealing during the first year of Mr. Lincoln's Administration amounted to a larger sum than it cost to run Mr. Buchanan's Administration for four years, stealings and all. [Great laughter.]

This thing of stealing, sir, has become a wholesale business, and has grown to most appalling proportions since the advent of the Republican party to power, and it will cease, in my judgment, the very day that it goes out of power, and not one moment sooner. The present condition of the country, sir, ought not to be considered cause for surprise or wonder to any one who has brains enough to comprehend the natural and inevitable connection and sequence between cause and effect. Similar causes would produce similar results in any age or in any country. The Abolition, now called the Republican or Radical, party was founded on the maxim, which they spread out on their banners and boldly proclaimed to the world, that "The United States Constitution is a covenant with death and an agreement with hell," and that there was a higher law than the Constitution, and no man was bound by its provisions or obligations. And this party since it came into power has been true to this theory upon which it was founded. Every feature and principle of that sacred instrument and every safeguard put there for the protection of the rights and liberties of the citizen have been openly and defiantly trampled under foot by this party. And now its great leaders and Representatives upon this floor openly proclaim that they are administering the Government "outside of" and in open defiance of the Constitution. No wonder, Mr. Speaker, that all sense of moral obligation has been destroyed among their followers. No wonder that the floodgates have been broken down and a deluge of crime, debauchery, and prostitution, political, moral, and social, has swept over the land. When the chosen and select prophets of the sect openly and defiantly disregard the sanctions and guarantees of that great charter which they have just sworn to support why should we wonder that the lesser lights and disciples should feel resting lightly upon them the obligations of the commandment which says, "thou shalt not steal," or be surprised when we see them engaged in wholesale plunder and debauchery?

It was the most natural thing in the world that when the leaders were engaged in violating their duties to the country and its Constitution, the lesser lights should practice upon the rules of venality which had been laid down for them and go to filling their pockets. And they have done it with a vengeance.

These robbers are now rioting in luxury all over the land, while the honest, industrious laboring people are borne down with poverty and taxation. The very bread which they make by the sweat of their brow is wrested from them before it reaches the mouths of their children, and one half of the revenue wrung from them is taken to feed and clothe lazy, vagabond negroes, or put into the hands and pockets of these plunderers.

This system must cease, and there is a remedy for it; and the only remedy is to go back to the original principles of the Government; to reinstate that party in power which for sixty years safely and economically carried on the Government, and successfully prosecuted two great foreign wars without any oppression of the citizen, any violation of the safeguards of the Constitution, and without sending one single Federal tax gatherer among the people to eat out their substance.

And how dare my colleague or any gentleman, in the presence of public and well-known facts, charge any of these frauds upon the President or upon any one outside of the party now in power? By an act of Congress the President is stripped of his rightful power for the correction of these evils. He cannot remove a single man from office, not even one of his own Cabinet ministers, or appoint a single man to office without the consent of your Radical Senate. The consequence is that while the offices are now filled by Radicals all new appointments must be made from that party. It is sufficient for the Senate to know that a man is a friend of the President or an opposer of the Radical measures of Congress to secure his rejection; and, therefore, rather than have these offices vacant that are necessary to be filled for the public service, he time and again sends in men of the Radical party, the very elect of the party, and they are the only ones who can be confirmed for positions of any importance. He has not the power to select men of his own choice. Why, even for the very highest offices in the land, although opposing Congress in its mis-called "reconstruction" policy, the President takes the elect of the Radical party. Look at our foreign missions where vacancies have occurred. Mr. Bancroft was appointed to one, and Mr. Raymond to another. Then Mr. Greeley, the very head and front of the party, was nominated for one of the first positions under the Government. It is not true that the President, even where he has had the power of appointment, has confined himself to his own friends in making the selection. He has been compelled, in all these revenue cases, so far as my knowledge extends, either to take men of the dominant party or those with whom they were satisfied or leave the offices unfilled. And if, in selecting among them, he finds one thief out of a dozen, I do not think it is at all remarkable, and I am only surprised that he has not been more unlucky than he has in this particular.

We are alarmed, Mr. Speaker; and honorable gentlemen seem surprised at the cry of distress that comes up to us from all parts of the land. A once happy, free, and prosperous people find themselves upon the very brink of financial and commercial ruin, while trembling between the Scylla of anarchy and the Charybdis of despotism that threaten to engulf our brightest prospects and fondest hopes forever. But why should we be surprised at our present condition? The experience of all ages, the lessons of all history would have warned us of the rocks against which we were madly dashing if we had but listened to their voices. No people on earth could long exist without utter ruin under the system of misrule, profligacy, and debauchery inaugurated by the men who now unhappily control the destinies of our country. Even if the system of speculation and robbery of which I have been speaking could be stopped, the expenditures actually authorized by law would crush any people. The hard-earned money of our people is recklessly voted away and squandered as if our resources were endless and the means and patience of the masses inexhaustible.

Nearly three long years have passed since the surrender of the last army of the confederates brought gladness and hope to the hearts of our people. If the men who had control of our Government had permitted the Constitution of our fathers to extend its protection and benign influences to every part of the land, and had at the same time inaugurated a system of strict economy in the administration of the Government, we would to-day be the happiest and most prosperous people on earth. But this would not answer the ends or purposes of the Radical faction. The founders of their sect had denounced the Constitution as a "covenant with death and an agreement with hell," and now, drunken and debauched with their ill-gotten power, our rulers trampled that sacred instrument under their feet and inaugurated their most wretched and wicked system of revolution and subversion. And this wicked scheme naturally and inevitably led to the adoption of measures that have quadrupled the expenditure of the Government. A bureau, at an enormous expense, to feed, clothe, and proselyte to radicalism a horde of lazy, vagabond negroes; a large standing army; an expensive military despotism in the South, extending its withering and blighting influences to every part of the land; a horde of Federal office-holders spread all over the land to spy out and seize upon the substance of the people; these were all appropriate sequences of this wicked purpose to destroy the Constitution and establish a Radical despotism in its stead.

We have had profound peace, Mr. Speaker, for nearly three years. From the surrender of the confederate armies in April, 1865, to the present time there has not been an arm raised anywhere against the power of the Federal Government. Why, then, these enormous expenditures, that are crushing the very life out of the people? Why should the ordinary expenses of the Government now greatly exceed those of the years immediately preceding the war. Mr. Buchanan's Administration has always been characterized by the party now in power as most reckless and extravagant. I am not here now for the purpose of defending it. But let us compare for a moment the last and most extravagant year of Buchanan's Administration with the expenditures now inaugurated under Radical rule. Men may mislead the ignorant by frothy declamation, but figures are stubborn things, and when used fairly never mislead. In the figures I now give I do not include the public debt or the interest thereon, nor the pensions and bounties to soldiers and their families, all of which the people will cheerfully pay.

The Secretary of the Treasury asks for appropriations for this year as follows:

For the War Department, exclusive of bounties and pensions.....	$95,000,000
For the Navy Department.....	36,000,000
For civil service.....	51,000,000
	$182,000,000

There can be no doubt that the actual demands and expenditures of the Government under existing legislation will greatly exceed even this enormous sum. For who ever heard of a Congress in these days without a series of deficiency bills? The expenditures invariably exceed greatly the estimates.

The whole expenditures of the Government for the same service in 1860 (the last year of Mr. Buchanan's Administration) were:

For civil list.....	$6,077,000
For the War Department.....	16,563,000
For the Navy Department.....	11,514,000
	$34,154,000

Difference between the estimates for 1868 and actual expenditures for the same items in 1860.....$147,847,000

Thus it is demonstrated that the ordinary expenditures of the Government under Radical rule is more than five times as great as it was under the much-abused Administration of Buchanan.

We have been accustomed to call ours a free and happy and prosperous people. But, sir, no people can be properly called free or prosperous, whatever may be the form of government, whose daily earnings are wrung from them by the tax-gatherer to feed a horde of hungry vultures who are preying upon them. We now pay in taxes nearly twice as much per capita as any other people in the world. And it will be seen from the foregoing figures that, even if our national debt were wiped out as with a sponge, we would still, under our present rulers, be the worst taxed and worst governed people on earth. The people should in thunder tones demand of this Congress—"Why does this country, in time of peace, with no prospect of war, require five times more expenditures, in proportion to its population, for the Army or the Navy or the civil list, than it ever required at any time before the Republican party came into power?" Your wretched, unconstitutional, and most wicked policy, your negro bureaus, your large standing army, your military despotism, your hordes of hungry vultures sent all over the land to devour the substance of the people, furnish the answer. Sir, the Republican party has been trusted by the people as no party was ever trusted before, and their generous confidence has in every respect been most shamefully abused. I know it is easy to indulge in loose and idle declamation and censure; and lest I might be accused of sinning in this direction I will furnish here for the consideration of the House and of the country some tables compiled from the archives of our Government, upon which I wish to base a few additional remarks, and which will demonstrate beyond all possibility of contradiction the folly, recklessness, and extra-gance of the party that now most unfortunately controls the expenditures of our Government:

Table giving the entire expenditures of the Federal Government, exclusive of the public debt, from the foundation of the Government to the close of the last British war:

From March 4, 1789, to December 31, 1791	$1,910,509 52
1792.....	1,877,903 68
1793.....	1,710,070 26
1794.....	3,500,546 65
1795.....	4,350,658 04
1796.....	2,531,930 40
1797.....	2,833,590 96
1798.....	4,623,223 54
1799.....	6,480,166 72
1800.....	7,411,369 97
1801.....	4,981,669 90
1802.....	3,737,079 91
1803.....	4,002,824 24
1804.....	4,452,858 91
1805.....	6,357,234 62
1806.....	6,080,209 36
1807.....	4,984,572 89
1808.....	6,504,338 85
1809.....	7,414,672 14
1810.....	6,311,082 28
1811.....	5,592,604 86
1812.....	17,829,498 70
1813.....	28,082,396 92
1814.....	30,127,606 38
Total.....	$172,697,779 00

Thus it is seen that the entire expenditures of our Government from the foundation thereof to the 1st day of January, 1815, including the expenses of the last British war, does not equal by over eleven million dollars what is now required for the mere ordinary expenses of the Government for the present year under Radical rule. I say ordinary, as I do not in the estimates given include the amount required for bounties, pensions, and interest on the public debt. But these expenditures which I have given are, in fact, most extraordinary, and enough to cause the very clods of our mother earth to rise in mutiny against the further rule of such a party.

It will be seen by looking at the foregoing table that the whole aggregate expenditures of the Government during the three years (1812, 1813, and 1814) of our last great struggle with Great Britain, in which we met and grappled in the death-struggle on land and sea with the greatest Power on earth, amounted only to $76,039,502, which is $105,960,498 less than it now costs to run the Government in a time of profound peace for one year under Radical rule; and that, too, without counting the frauds and robberies perpetrated under our revenue system, and which may be estimated at least fifty millions more, that never reaches the Treasury, but every dollar of which is wrung from the pockets of the toiling millions.

But it may be urged that these comparisons are not fair, and are calculated to mislead, as the population was much less in the early days of the Republic than now, and the expenditures necessarily less than now. Admit all that can be fairly claimed from this fact, and yet it does not weaken the startling character of the facts I have given. Surely no one will contend that it ought to cost more, or at least much more, per capita to administer our Government as we increase in population than it did during the early and struggling days of the Republic. If it does necessarily have this result we should in self-defense immediately put a stop to immigration, and go back as speedily as possible to our original boundaries. But it cannot possibly produce this result if the Government were now administered on the principles on which it was founded. Taking this as indisputable, I will now furnish another table that will place in a still stronger light the enormities of our present system:

A table showing the expenses of the General Government, exclusive of public debt, and the population shown by the census during each decennial year, from the foundation of the Government to the year 1850:

Year.	Expenses.	Population.	Rate per inhabitant.
1789-90 and 1791	$1,910,509 52	3,929,827	$0 48
1800.....	4,981,669 90	5,305,925	0 90
1810.....	5,311,082 28	7,239,814	0 73
1820.....	13,134,530 57	9,638,131	1 36
1830.....	13,259,533 33	12,866,020	1 03
1840.....	24,139,920 11	17,069,435	1 41
1850.....	37,165,990 09	23,191,876	1 60

HO. OF REPS.

Reconstruction—Mr. Koontz.

It will be seen from this table that while during Washington's Administration the expenses of the Government amounted to but forty-eight cents per capita, in 1840, the last year of Van Buren's Administration, to but one dollar and forty-one cents per capita, and in 1850 but to one dollar and sixty cents per capita, they now, in a time of profound peace under Radical rule, estimating our population at thirty millions, amount to six dollars per capita, or about forty dollars annually for each head of a family, for what are called the ordinary expenditures of the Government. Sir, these facts are in themselves sufficiently alarming, and I do not see that I can now add to their force by dwelling further thereon. If they do not arouse the people from Maine to California to demand an immediate change in our rulers and in our system of government, then, indeed, may we say with a sad heart, farewell forever to all hope of a restoration of our poor bleeding country to prosperity and happiness.

Mr. Speaker, in these remarks I do not intend to misrepresent, or, if I can avoid it, to be misrepresented; and therefore I must repeat that in this indictment against the Radical party I have not included those expenses and expenditures which are the necessary result of the war through which we have just passed. I have not included the estimates for paying bounties and pensions or the sums necessary to pay the interest on our public debt. I have left these out, that the people might see whither we are tending under Radical rule, even if these sacred but most burdensome debts were canceled forever.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I should not have made remarks of this character, especially at this time, if it had not been for the extraordinary partisan course which my colleague [Mr. Logan] took in addressing the House upon this question, which ought to be considered as a mere matter of business. I am aware that unusual latitude has been given in the debate. Whether it is in the power of Congress, the President, and the Secretary of the Treasury combined to inaugurate a system by which this whisky tax can be collected or not it is impossible for me to say. My impression is that while the enormous tax of two dollars per gallon is retained the revenue never will be fully collected. The temptations to fraud and bribery are too enormous in this profligate age. I care not how vigilant the head of the Department may be, there will necessarily be a great deal of thievery and fraud. My impression is that the only remedy is to reduce the tax to one quarter what it is now and inaugurate a better system of collection, and the amount of revenue received would probably be as great as it is at this time. I do not believe that it is in the power of mortal man to inaugurate a system by which the entire revenue can be collected while the tax is retained at the present rate.

In the remarks which I have made, as a matter of course—and I presume it was so with my colleague—it was not intended to insinuate that all the officers connected with the revenue service are engaged in speculation and fraud. I do not believe anything of the kind. I do not understand my colleague to charge anything of the kind, although his charges have been very broad. But with the temptations that are held out some fraud is inevitable. It is impossible for the President, or the Secretary of the Treasury, or the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to know one man in a thousand of their appointees. How are they to avoid, when they must take the men recommended to them, getting men often who are at best weak and will yield to the temptations that are held out so bounteously around them? I do not believe that it is possible to inaugurate a system under our laws as they are now, and with the taxation as it is now, that will result in an honest collection of the revenue that ought to be received from this whisky tax.

A few words more, Mr. Speaker, and I have done. Our whole revenue system seems to be devised for the purpose of holding out temptations to fraud and perjury. There is but one hope and one remedy. Bring the party as soon as possible into power that is pledged to economy and justice, and whose whole history proves that it will redeem those pledges. Your Army must be reduced; your Freedmen's Bureau abolished; your military despotism uprooted; the expenditures of the Government reduced one half, the taxes reduced in the same proportion; the horde of tax-gatherers must be called in wherever they can possibly be dispensed with; the most rigid economy must be introduced into every branch of the Government, and our outstanding bonds, as speedily as possible without injury to the country, be paid off in precise conformity with the contract upon which they were issued. Without these reforms destruction, speedy and inevitable, is upon us. And I would say in all kindness to the bond oligarchy that your only hope of escape from irretrievable ruin depends upon your calling in your mercenary pack of slanderers of the only party that is for justice, economy, and a strict and sacred preservation of the public faith. The path in which we are now traveling leads to inevitable ruin and bankruptcy, and if persevered in for any considerable time your bonds will not be worth the paper on which they are written. Aid us in rescuing the people from the oppressions that are grinding them into the dust; ask for no more on your bonds than the people have agreed to pay you; do not seek to escape your share of the burdens of Government; and the public faith, I will guaranty, will be sacredly preserved, and you may live to a green old age in happiness and prosperity.

But there is no hope now save in a speedy ejection of the Radical destructives from power and place. I know that, frightened at the thunder tones of an enraged people in the late elections, they came up to this session of Congress bawling hoarsely for retrenchment and reform. But that cry is already forgotten, and they have turned more madly and fiercely than ever to their schemes of consolidation, despotism, and measures that must result in the robbery and ruin of the people. It would be as easy for the Ethiopian to change his skin or the leopard his spots as for this Congress to return to the principles of economy and justice under the Constitution. But, sir, I do not despair of the Republic. The people are aroused at last, thank God. The bright angel of hope is spreading her wings once more over our beloved land. The dark cloud that has so long hung like a pall over our country is already encircled with a silver lining. The destructives and malignants are dying out in their strongholds. They will be driven in disgrace and ignominy from these Halls. I see it, sir; I see it with the eye of prophecy. The principles of economy and justice will once more take charge of the administration of our Government. Prosperity, liberty, and hope will return to gladden the hearts of our overburdened people. And then, sir, when that happy day arrives, I can with truth say with good old Simeon, "Lord, now lettest thy servant depart in peace, for mine eyes have seen thy salvation."

SPEECH OF HON. W. H. KOONTZ,
OF PENNSYLVANIA,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
January 20, 1868.

The House having under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 439) additional and supplementary to an act entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed March 2, 1867—

Mr. KOONTZ said:

Mr. SPEAKER: This bill has been pretty thoroughly discussed on both sides of the House, and I will endeavor, in as brief a time as possible, to present to the consideration of the House my reasons for supporting the measure. In discussing this bill there are three things to be considered: first, what is proposed to be done by the bill? second, has Congress the power to pass it? third, is there now such a pressing public necessity as calls upon Congress for the passage of the bill?

This bill proposes to declare that in the late rebellious States "there are no civil State governments republican in form, and that the so-called civil governments in said States, respectively, shall not be recognized as valid or legal State governments either by the executive or judicial power or authority of the United States."

The bill also proposes to confer upon the General of the Army the power "to enjoin, by special orders, upon all officers in command within the several military departments within said several States, the performance of all acts authorized by said several laws above recited, and to remove by his order from command any or all of said commanders and detail other officers of the United States Army, not below the rank of colonel, to perform all the duties and exercise all the powers authorized by said several acts."

The bill also confers upon the General of the Army the power of removal from and appointment to the civil offices under those several provisional governments. It further declares that "it shall be unlawful for the President of the United States to order any part of the Army or Navy of the United States to assist by force of arms the authority of either of said provisional governments in said disorganized States to oppose or obstruct the authority of the United States as provided in this act and the act to which this is supplementary."

Then there is added a section making it a penal offense for any person to attempt to prevent by force the execution of the orders of the General of the Army.

These, sir, are in brief the provisions of the bill. The next question is, has Congress the lawful power and authority to pass this measure? And, sir, in asserting the power of Congress over this question it becomes necessary to sustain the allegation of fact contained in the first section of the bill, that in those States there are no civil State governments republican in form; for, sir, I concede that if it be not true in point of fact that there are no such civil governments in those States then this proposed legislation and all the legislation of Congress pertaining to the question of reconstruction is wrong; but if, on the other hand, it be true in point of fact that there are no valid State governments in those States, then I apprehend that gentlemen on all sides of this House will concede that there is necessity for some legislation, either in the shape of this bill or some other.

Now, sir, is it true that there are no legal State governments in those States? I maintain that it is. I do not deny that prior to 1861 there were legal State governments in those States holding their true relation to the Government of the United States, and acting harmoniously with the other States of the Union, under the Constitution, the supreme law of the land. But I assert that those governments were overthrown by traitors; that they were seized by men whose hearts were filled with treason, and all, or nearly all, of the legislative, executive, and judicial officers of those States assisted in carrying them outside of the Government of the United States.

It is necessary, sir, to briefly allude to some of the leading events of that period. A Republican President had been elected in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution of the United States; but because he and his party were of a different political faith to theirs they seized upon what they considered a favorable opportunity to enforce their long-cherished doctrine of State rights. For many years the political leaders of the South had been promulgating the wicked and dangerous theory that it was within the power of any one of the States, at its pleasure, to sever its connection with the Government of the United States; and the election of a President by the Republican party was made the pretext for rebellion; and I would here remind gentlemen who are continually denouncing the Republican party for what they allege to be its unconstitutional acts, that in the election of Abraham Lincoln that party was strictly within the limits of the Constitution, and that the leaders of the rebellion not only disregarded the plain provisions of the Constitution in refusing to abide by that election, but engaged in their unholy work before his Administration had come into power and without waiting to see whether, so far as they were concerned, he would not take care that the laws of the land were faithfully executed. It will be remembered that they passed their ordinances of secession, and by the most solemn legislative enactment declared that their States were no longer bound to the General Government. Not only that, but they seized upon all the public property within the limits of those States. They seized upon the forts, arsenals, mints, custom-houses, navy-yards, and all the property belonging to the United States Government therein. They went further, sir; they elected their representatives and sent them to Montgomery, Alabama, and there they united together under another government, formed a constitution for themselves, and adopted a flag different from the flag of our fathers. By the most solemn forms of law they created a separate and independent government, with the avowed intent and purpose of destroying the Government of the United States.

Reconstruction—Mr. Koontz.

And, sir, for four long years they wielded the power of this great and tremendous organization, extending over ten States, a vast empire in themselves, holding within and under its control ten million people, and with almost unlimited resources, for the purpose of destroying the Government which had been framed by Washington and his compeers. They were unsuccessful, but I need not remind gentlemen on this floor of the tremendous cost to the loyal people of the country in precious blood and treasure to maintain the unity and integrity of this Government.

Now, sir, during these four years of civil war where rested the legal power and authority of the United States Government? I answer that they were with the loyal, adhering, organized States of the Union. Does any gentleman on the other side say that the legislation for those ten States during that time was wrong because they were in armed rebellion? Will they deny that the legislation necessary to carry on the Government within the organized States was illegal, unconstitutional, and void because those ten States happened to be in organized revolt? Was not the legislative, executive, and judicial power of the Government of the United States fully recognized by the people of the loyal States during that time?

MR. MUNGEN. We get appeals to this side of the House, and I should like to answer.

MR. KOONTZ. Not now. I answer that during the time that those States were outside of the Government, so far as they could place themselves, the sovereign power of the nation was represented in the organized States of the Union. He would be a bold man, indeed, who would controvert this position; for to deny the authority of the law-abiding, organized States to wield the sovereign power of the Government during an insurrection or rebellion in others, would be equivalent to an admission that the bare organization of rebellion in any section of the country would of itself work a dissolution of the Government, for those not in revolt would be powerless to prevent it. But not only were the legal power and authority of the Government of the United States vested in the organized States by recognition of the loyal people but they were recognized by foreign nations. The United States of America did not in the eyes of other Powers cease to be a nation because a portion thereof was in rebellion, but its dignity and sovereign power were as fully acknowledged by them as before.

Now, sir, if the proposition be true that during the rebellion the legal power and authority of the United States remained in the loyal States, when did that power cease over the disorganized communities? When the war ended, say the rebels; when Lee surrendered, say the Democratic party. This would be equivalent to saying that there should be no penalty for treason, for there would be no power to impose it, as the guilty would have an equal voice with the guiltless in settling the controversy. Against this doctrine the loyal people protest, earnestly protest, and insist that the terms of settlement shall be fixed by them; that as the power and jurisdiction of a court over the criminal attach until the sentence is pronounced, so the power and jurisdiction of the loyal States attach and remain over the disorganized part until all the questions springing up and arising out of the rebellion have been fully and entirely settled.

But, sir, if those States were not entirely overthrown, gentlemen will admit with the President of the United States, as they now seem to have come to his position, that they required at least some legislative or executive action in their behalf, because they were so far disorganized as to require it, to set them on foot again. The President recognized this when he declared that they were without civil governments, and undertook to assume the power of legislation on this question. He recognized the fact that their civil governments had been overthrown when he established provisional governments for them. We only differed with him so far in asserting that the question of reconstructing these States was with the Congress of the United States and not in the hands of the Executive.

Then, sir, to establish the point I am making, namely, that these are not valid civil governments, I deny that they are such, because they are the creatures of executive power and not of legislative authority. It was a question that belonged exclusively to Congress and not to any other coördinate branch of the Government.

But I object to these governments further because they have had the breath of life breathed into them for the purpose of reviving the fell spirit of treason that for four long years spread disaster and sorrow throughout the land.

Now, sir, I think I have clearly shown that the power of this Government belongs to the loyal States of the Union, those that remained true to it during the civil war. Then the only question remaining is, is there a public necessity for this bill?

I urge, in the first place, that there is a necessity for the passage of this bill to protect the loyal men of those States. Does any man doubt, from all the evidence we have had during the last two years, that if the military power is withdrawn from these States the loyal men, black and white, will be entirely under the control of the rebels, who will have an ascendancy as complete and effectual as when Lee held undisputed power over the whole region?

It is needed, further, to prevent the obstacles that have been thrown in the way of reconstruction. We have had obstacles not only on account of the construction of the law, as was stated by my colleague, but in adverse executive action; and in order that there may be a harmonious policy, and that all obstacles may be removed in the way of the policy of Congress, it is necessary that this question should be under the control of the General of the Army and not of so many different military commanders. We would thus be relieved of the difficulty that exists under the present law, of having one policy for Louisiana and another for Virginia.

But it is needed, further, because the rebels and their sympathizing friends in the North refused to accept the generous terms that were offered by the Thirty-Ninth Congress. That Congress offered a plan of settlement of these difficulties so fair and generous that no honest mind could controvert it; and yet these people, aided and encouraged by the President of the United States and by the Democratic party of the North, refused to accept the generous terms proffered in the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States. Therefore it becomes necessary that Congress should exercise its authority and demand that other terms shall be acceded to by them since they have refused to accept so generous an offer. Indeed, the terms of settlement contained in these several reconstruction bills are more generous than were ever offered to a vanquished foe before. A magnanimous people demand neither the lives or property of their late enemies; but they do insist that they shall only be restored to political power in the Union upon the conditions prescribed by the loyal people of the country.

These, sir, are in brief my reasons for advocating this bill, and I propose now to advert to a few arguments—I can hardly say a few, because it seems to me there is but a single argument advanced on the other side against this bill. The whole cry is that this bill is unconstitutional. Sir, all the reconstruction bills that have been passed by this and the preceding Congress have been denounced by gentlemen on the other side as unconstitutional. This is the old cry repeated. We heard it at the beginning of the war. We were then told it was unconstitutional to coerce a State; that it was unconstitutional to call out armies and defend the capital of the nation; that it was unconstitutional to draft men into the armies of the United States; that it was unconstitutional to issue money to pay the soldiers who were drafted; that it was unconstitutional and wrong to arm the negro. In short, every measure that was ever advocated by the Republican party in these Halls for the suppression of this infamous rebellion has been denounced by the Democratic party as unconstitutional. They seem to assume, or rather they do assume, that they are the especial guardians and protectors of the Constitution. I desire, in the brief moments that are left me, to point to some of their own acts in regard to the Constitution.

It will be remembered, in 1860, when the conscience of the people had become aroused by the aggressive spirit of slavery, and had brought into life and being a party that planted itself upon the ground of opposition to the extension of that institution, that John J. Crittenden, a Senator from Kentucky, offered in the other branch of Congress a series of resolutions to perpetuate the curse of human bondage. He proposed to place in the Constitution of the United States that word which James Madison refused to permit to go in. He was willing not only to insert the word "slave" in the Constitution but to dedicate the whole of that vast empire south of 36° 30' to the curse of slavery. That was Democratic doctrine then. The Constitution might, by their consent, be changed, provided it would be to the interest of the slave power.

We go a step further. After the Montgomery constitution had been adopted there was a portion of the Democratic party that was willing to run the line north of Pennsylvania and to exclude New England from the Union. They proposed to take in Pennsylvania, New Jersey, New York, and as many western States as chose to come in, and adopt the Montgomery constitution for the purpose, as they said, of leaving New England out in the cold.

Sir, let me say that New England will not be kept out in the cold, and the reason of it in brief is this, that she is true now to the cause of human liberty as she was when the Mayflower landed her precious cargo upon her shores and

"The sounding aisles of the dim woods rang
To the anthem of the free."

But, sir, in answer to gentlemen upon the other side who claim that the Democratic party is the great protector and defender of the Constitution, I want to point out to gentlemen upon all sides of this House this significant fact, that when the great unconstitutional work of this century was undertaken, namely, organized rebellion in ten States for the purpose of breaking up and destroying this Union, never during all that time was there promulgated from a Democratic State convention or from a Democratic State committee a single authoritative enunciation expressive of their indignation at the great unconstitutional work that the rebels were engaged in; no, not one. And permit me to say now that if that party had denounced that great unconstitutional work with half the zeal and half the energy with which they have denounced the measures that were necessary to put down the rebellion, and that are necessary to keep it down, the war would have ended a year sooner than it did, $1,000,000,000 of public debt would have been saved to the Government, and many firesides would now have chairs occupied that are vacant. This was the policy of that party that has assumed to act as the special defenders of the Constitution. Let me add another item on this point. I remember that in the latter part of June, 1863, the news spread abroad throughout the North that General Lee was advancing upon the State of Pennsylvania, and soon that news was confirmed, and the invaders stood upon the soil of Pennsylvania. At that very time there was a Democratic State convention sitting in the capitol at Harrisburg, and although the enemy was ready to carry destruction and devastation throughout the broad limits of the Commonwealth, and, indeed, the whole North, if it had been in his power, not one word in condemnation of the rebellion or denunciation of the unconstitutional work its leaders were engaged in went out from that convention; and yet, sir, this is the party that professes to speak for the Constitution.

Mr. BOYER. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. KOONTZ. My time is nearly out. I would like to yield to my colleague, but I cannot.

Sir, I think I have effectually answered the claim that the Democratic party has set up to be considered the special guardian and protector of the Constitution of the United States. We maintain that the power we have had ever since the war began, the power that belonged to the remaining organized States of this Union to crush and destroy the rebellion, remains with us until every vestige of treason is destroyed. And if the provisional governments in these States, created without any authority of law, are to be made instruments to reinstate treason in the high places of this Government, then they must just as surely fall as did the military power of the rebellion before the invincible armies of the Republic. We claim that this bill is necessary to a proper enforcement of the reconstruction acts heretofore passed, and to a just and fair settlement of this vexed question.

In conclusion, sir, permit me to say that we are now engaged in rebuilding the foundations of this great Government that have been shaken by the fierce tempest of civil war. Treason did its work in attempting to pull down and destroy, let it be the work of loyal hands to build up, beautify, and adorn this temple of liberty. Let us see to it that the loyal people are protected throughout the limits of the whole country; that equal and exact justice to all men shall be the rule by which the Republic is guided, and then we shall have faithfully executed the trust committed to us.

CONCERNING

The Rights of American Citizens in Foreign States.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 27, 1868.

Mr. BANKS, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported a bill concerning the Rights of American Citizens in Foreign States, accompanied by the following report; which was ordered to be printed in the Globe:

The Committee on Foreign Affairs, to whom was referred "so much of the President's message as relates to our foreign affairs," also House resolutions Nos. 100, 111, 159, and 166, instructing the committee to inquire into and report upon the subject of the rights of American citizens in foreign countries; as well as sixty-three resolutions and memorials adopted in public meetings held by citizens of different sections of the country, praying that action be taken to secure to citizens of the United States protection abroad, respectfully

REPORT:

The treaty of peace between the United States and Great Britain at the close of the war of Independence left unsettled three subjects of international importance: First, the impressment of seamen; second, the right of search; and third, the question of expatriation. The impressment of seamen had long been practiced under the most absolute of the monarchs of England, and little discrimination was there made between subjects and foreigners.

The right to search American vessels had been asserted and exercised by Great Britain from the recognition of American independence. Both claims were justified upon the theory of intrinsic and perpetual allegiance of all persons born subject to the British Crown. The enforcement of this doctrine by the arrest and search of American vessels on the high seas, the impressment of American seamen, and the imprisonment of such as would not fight against their country, led to the war with Great Britain in 1812, which resulted in the triumph of our forces by sea and land. The treaty of peace did not in terms surrender these claims, but they were abandoned in practice. No impressment has been attempted since the war closed. A feeble effort to establish the right of search in a qualified form was made in the quintuple treaty negotiated in 1841, for the ostensible purpose of suppressing the slave trade and piracy, by the five great Powers—England, France, Austria, Russia, and Prussia. Having been declined by the United States, and not being ratified by France, the treaty failed. The exercise of the right of search and impressment of seamen, which led to the war of 1812, have therefore been abandoned. But the claim is still maintained. The very earnest appeals of Mr. Webster, made as late as 1842, enforcing the wisdom and public necessity of removing this ground of past complaint and future danger, were promptly but politely rejected.

The question of the right of expatriation, the most important of all, and upon which both these claims rested, still remains unsettled, and under different circumstances becomes one of the most important questions of our day.

At the commencement of the war of 1812 the number of emigrants in the United States did not exceed one hundred and twenty thousand. International difficulties prevented any considerable emigration from 1810 to 1816. The actual returns from 1820 to 1867, added to the estimated emigration from 1790 to 1820, show that the total emigration to this country from Europe since the Declaration of Independence is six million six hundred and forty thousand persons. No more important question can arise than that which concerns the relations of this portion of the American people to the Governments they have abandoned and that of their adoption. The English law holds them and their descendants as British subjects, "at least to the second generation, and perhaps forever." * The theory of a double allegiance is discarded, and they and their descendants, even though born of a foreign mother, are inexorably and forever held to the service of native-born subjects, incapable of disavowing their allegiance to the mother country or of acquiring a legal citizenship in another land, and liable to punishment as traitors if found in a time of war in the Army or Navy of their adopted country.

During a general war in Europe they would be deprived of the privileges of travel or commerce; and in the event of participation by this Government in such war, which is not impossible, they would be liable to punishment as traitors by European or American Governments, whether yielding compulsory service to one or the other. The execution of naturalized citizens of the United States when captured in the American Army by the British troops, who claimed them as British subjects during the late war, was only prevented by the President's orders for retaliation on British soldiers. Deprived of recognized citizenship, debarred from the privileges of travel or commerce in peace, and exposed to punishment in time of war, they are without safety and without rights. The commission of public crimes could not more effectually strip them of privileges which in every age and in all parts of the world have been the accompaniments of civilization and freedom. At the opening of our national career Great Britain attempted to enforce her claims upon her natural-born subjects beyond her territorial jurisdiction, arresting American ships and impressing American seamen under their own flag. The actual sufferers were few in number. Now, after the lapse of half a century a similar claim is enforced against a nation of people; not, it is true, as before, upon their own soil or under their own flag, but wherever found within the jurisdiction of other nations. In the first contest their success would have driven American sailors from the ocean. In this it would deprive masses of the American people of privileges that were never denied to any nation, retaining any sense of the value of personal liberty. It is scarcely to be supposed that it can be pressed to this extent; but if the doctrine be inapplicable to masses of people it is unjust that it should be enforced against individual citizens in a manner to disturb the peace of a nation.

The correspondence transmitted to Congress shows that naturalized citizens of the United States being present in Great Britain, without the commission of any offense, have been arrested, tried, convicted, sentenced, and punished as criminals, upon the ground that they were natural born subjects of the Crown; that their allegiance was perpetual and indefeasible, except by its consent; and that they were therefore subject to its laws and liable to punishment not only for offenses committed within its jurisdiction, but for words spoken and acts performed in the United States. They claim the protection of their adopted country which has made them citizens and conferred upon them the same rights both at home and abroad which are enjoyed by native-born Americans. The Government is in duty bound to listen to their appeal, and to protect them in their rights. The

* "Unless the British Government consents to their ancestors' expatriation, the same posterity must be treated as British at least to the second generation, and perhaps forever."—Westlake's Private International Law, page 23.

President called the especial attention of Congress to this subject in his last annual message.

It is not our province to examine laws of England under which these prosecutions have been conducted; but as the English judges appeal to the law authorities of this country in justification of their course it may not be inappropriate to consider the origin and nature of the claim of indefeasible and perpetual allegiance to the British Crown. The principal authority cited in its support is found in Blackstone's Commentaries on the Laws of England, as follows:

"Natural allegiance is such as is due from all men born within the sovereign dominions, immediately upon their birth; for, immediately upon their birth, they are under the protection of the Crown, at a time, too, when (during infancy) they are incapable of protecting themselves. Natural allegiance is, therefore, a debt of gratitude which cannot be forfeited, canceled, or altered by any change of time, place, or circumstance, nor by anything but the united concurrence of the Legislature. An Englishman who removes to France or to China owes the same allegiance to the King of England there as at home, and twenty years hence as well as now; for it is a principle of universal law that the natural born subject of one prince cannot by any act of his own—no, not by swearing allegiance to another, put off or discharge his natural allegiance to the former; for this natural allegiance was intrinsic and primitive and antecedent to the other, and cannot be divested without the concurrent act of that prince to whom it was first due."—Vol. I, page 368.

The Commentaries of Blackstone have probably never had greater weight with any people than in this country. In the discussions preceding the Revolution it was the authority mainly relied upon by the Colonists in their contest with the mother country for constitutional liberty. More copies of his work were purchased in America than had been sold in Great Britain up to the time of the Revolution. It is not forgotten, however, that he supported in Parliament principles of law in direct opposition to those of his Commentaries. Blackstone was the servant of power, and it was not without justice that Junius said of him that "he recollected he had a place to preserve, though he forgot he had a reputation to lose." But the American Constitution is itself proof that Blackstone's theory of allegiance was not accepted by the American governments. He claimed for the sovereign absolute power. He left to the subject nothing but servile submission. The American statesmen reversed the proposition. In their system the people were absolute and the ruler a representative only. According to the philosophy of Blackstone the people were a possession of the Government. Under the American system the Government was the property of the people. They reserved to the body-politic collectively the power of reforming its institutions at pleasure, and left to the people individually the right of transferring their allegiance to other Governments whenever the safety of life, the welfare of the subject, or liberty of conscience should demand it.

There are no rules of universal authority by which Governments are guided in regulating the rights of subjects. The controversy existing between this country and England, and in a less degree with European States, in regard to the rights conferred by emigration and naturalization is a contest between feudal ideas and those that govern civilized States. Feudalism held all rights dependent upon the possession of the soil. The soil was the gift of the Crown. Allegiance was due to the Crown and controlled by the place of birth, and all the obligations of the people were summed up in that of personal fidelity to the king. It was more absolute in England as established by William the Conqueror, than on the continent under Charlemagne or the Gothic kings.

The oath of allegiance administered to the landholders of England by William the Conqueror at Salisbury, in 1086, sets forth this obligation and the reason upon which it is founded with more authority than in the paraphrase given us by Blackstone. Observe the oath to the Crown: "I BECOME YOUR MAN FROM

THIS DAY FORTH, of life and limb and earthly worship, and unto you will be faithful, and bear you faith for the land I hold of you. So help me God."

The feudal law of Europe claimed allegiance to the Crown from the barons, and that of lesser lords and landholders to the barons in turn. The English monarch held all alike in subjection to the Crown. Other laws extended the principle to strangers, who were required to live and die in the king's quarrels, to serve in his wars, and to lodge only in English houses. The king's writ, ne exeat Regno instead of being limited as now to processes of civil courts, obliged his subjects to remain within the realm, or recalled them from beyond the seas, and this "not merely in respect to attempts prejudicial to the State, but from the king's right to the attendance and service of his liege men within the realm." No merchant was allowed to remain in the country above forty days, no host to receive a lodger for more than three nights, and no man to wander from the highway without sounding a horn, under penalty of death.

The doctrine taught by Blackstone is hardly less absolute in principle than these provisions of the laws of Alfred, William, and later kings, upon which his theory is founded. It is unnecessary to say that in this age such doctrines have no claim to respect. The truth is now universally recognized in theory if not in practice: the world belongs to its people. Political institutions are rather for them than for their rulers. Under every form of administration it is now admitted that Governments are for the people, if not by them; and in this view they claim that "that which is best administered is best."

This is true of European States, but especially of England. The great charters of later English history and the popular rights secured by them attest this fact. The feudal theory of allegiance in England was early modified by the statute of Henry VII, which declared that no one was to be called in question for obeying a king de facto: denying the theory of divine right, and recognizing partially the revolutionary doctrines of possession and power. This is regarded as the basis of modern English allegiance.

The revolution of 1688 was the foundation of the present British constitution and overthrew all feudal institutions. The king no longer held power exclusively from tenure, birth, or possession, but by the consent of the people. He obtained from their representatives year by year authority for his Government, and supplies for the maintenance of his army and navy. Instead of being held by the king to the soil on which they were born, the people forbade the king to leave the kingdom without the consent of their representatives. "Sovereignty," they said, "was in the king with the Parliament." Without the recognition and support of the representatives of the people he had no power. Such is the comparison which history forces upon us between the Governments of William of Normandy, in 1086, and that of William of Orange, in 1688. And such is the contrast between the principles of allegiance contended for by Blackstone and English judges of the present day, and that which is sustained by the principles of modern history based upon public reason and justice.

Restrictive legislation, which forbade subjects to leave or strangers to enter the kingdom, has been swept away. The prerogative of kings, though sometimes exercised in such matters during the bloodier periods of European history, has been resisted and its abuse punished with exile or death. The Chinese have been compelled to abandon their system of isolation and exclusion, maintained for many thousand years. Within our own time it has been held by all civilized nations that a government of isolation and exclusion presented in itself just grounds of war.

Such changes in the constitution of England and the States of Europe demonstrate that the doctrine of feudal supremacy, which is the basis of feudal allegiance as now upheld, ought to be without authority or force in any form of government existing in this age.

Having made war upon a nation so distant as that of China, disturbing so little the rest of the world by the movements of her people or the character of her Government, it scarcely becomes the English or European Governments to maintain the principles of absolute and perpetual power over their natural-born subjects, or the supremacy of municipal law against the laws of nations and the progress of civilization.

OF THE SERVICE DUE TO GOVERNMENT.

It is not to be denied that there is between the Government and the subject an equitable and mutual interest; neither can it be denied that there is due from every citizen to the Government under which he lives certain obligations, and that the service which is implied by these obligations, whether or not supported by his oath, cannot be cast off without its consent. This is but a just return for the protection which he receives from the Government, which attends him from his birth, and secures after death the preservation and disposition of his property according to his will so long as his name or race shall endure. This does not arise so much from any special or implied contract made in the organization of society as from the law of necessity and of nature. It is inherent in every form of civilized society, and is as apparent and as absolute in an unorganized company of individuals as it is in village, city, State, or nation. No man is permitted anywhere among civilized men to look with unconcern upon any outrage inflicted upon the persons or property of a company of which he is a member, without at least signifying to the extent of his ability his opposition to the wrong and defeating it if in his power. This mutual obligation extends to the protection of property, the preservation of the public peace, as well as to the security of life. The same obligation rests upon a subject in regard to the Government under which he lives. He is bound to assist in its protection, to aid in its support by the contribution of his means or his labor, to maintain its honor unimpaired, to strengthen its capacity for usefulness by the performance of every duty which is necessary to the peace and prosperity of society, and to defend it in peril with his life if necessary. Failure in the performance of such duties is justly condemned and punished by all Governments. But the recognition of these varied and important obligations can in no wise be held to render such subjects and their descendants to the second and third generations perpetual prisoners of any association, society, or form of government. So long as they are of it they must fulfill their obligations, whatever they are. A mere contingent or possible obligation cannot rightly be made by construction, absolute and perpetual, controlling the actions and life of the subject from whom it is due wherever he may be found.

But if, from causes appertaining to the conscience or safety, the welfare of a subject or his family is to be improved by separation from that society of which he is a member, the laws of nature and the practice of all civilized nations, ancient and modern, justify him, within reasonable limits, in severing that connection; otherwise, in a State which has an established religion, any citizen might be compelled to conform to its doctrines, and to leave his descendants to the same mental and moral servitude, deprived of the freedom of belief, and without that freedom of worship to which, according to the laws of nature and of God, every man is entitled. Society is necessary to the existence of man, and government indispensable to his civilization, prosperity, and power. But the perpetual subjection of every person born within its jurisdiction, without consent and in disregard of protest or removal, is not necessary in any form of political society. It does not rest upon any theory of justice, and the whole course of civilization disproves its justice or wisdom. It is a power that does not attach to a State which has for its object the welfare of all its members, but to a despotism that knows no duty and cares for no interest but to strengthen and perpetuate the power of rulers. The law of allegiance and of service is as essential to a republic as it is to a monarchy. It is not a mere matter of agreement, convenience, or utility; it is a necessity. Every form of government depends upon it, and dissolution awaits all forms of society to which it is denied.

But here the parallel ends. The authority of despotic governments is force; that of a State is the consent of its people.

The claim of indefeasible allegiance and perpetual service is the symbol of feudalism and force. The right of emigration and naturalization, where life or liberty is insecure, or where the prerogatives of conscience are violated, is wrought into the constitutions of all governments of choice. The feudal claim is as absolute over the mind as the body. It denies liberty of conscience and of thought by the same title that it proscribes the right of locomotion. It dwarfs human capacity and reason and corrupts the nature of man and society.

OF THE CONSENT OF GOVERNMENTS.

It may justly be conceded that the express or implied consent of both parties is necessary to the extinction of mutual obligations between a Government and its subject. But this does not justify the perpetual control of one by the force of the other. It assumes that it is the right and duty of the Government to so regulate the manner of separation as to secure in the highest degree the welfare of both. It is to this natural law that we refer the right to regulate, not defeat, emigration and naturalization, which together constitute expatriation. But a Government cannot justly admit one and deny the other.

A subject may justly be held to the complete performance of all obligations actually due to the Government at the time of separation. In a period of war or when public peace is threatened, every form of political society is justified by natural as well as municipal law in holding its members to the fulfillment of their duties until the crisis is passed. In moments of public peril it might with justice forbid emigration so long as the common danger continued. But this exercise of power must be considered as incident to a present exigency of the State. It cannot be just that a citizen who has withdrawn in a time of peace, with the actual or implied consent of the Government, is to be held, himself and his descendants, forever responsible for the conduct of that Government or the perils which it may encounter; or that he is bound under such circumstances to render the same service in its defense or make the same sacrifice for its support which could have been demanded had his connection remained unbroken.

The reciprocal protection which is the basis of the obligation due from a subject to the State is rightfully terminated by a permitted removal, and leaves no foundation for the subsequent claim of perpetual service. The State would be justified, in anticipation of immediate or approaching public peril, in prohibiting many acts threatening its present or its future safety. In this view the decree of Charles I in 1637-38, denying the right of departure to "passengers" for New England "as idle and refractory persons whose only or principal end is to live out of the reach of authority where they take liberty to nourish and preserve their schismatical factions," might be justifiable as defeating an organization detrimental, if not destructive, to his throne. In this he did not merely assert a right, but he averted by his acts an immediate danger. Whether the result was more fortunate for his crown than to have allowed these "passengers"—among whom were Pym, Hampden, and Cromwell—the liberty of emigration, and how far despotic rulers ought to take warning from the fatal consequences that followed the exercise of such power in this particular case, his successors may be called upon to determine.

RULE OF INTERNATIONAL LAW.

International law does not control nations in the conduct of municipal affairs. It leaves them to the good sense of every independent State. It does not, therefore, present any positive rule by which Governments are to be guided. Nevertheless the opinions of writers of recognized authority upon national and international law, whose judgments are universally respected, ought not to be without weight in this discussion. With few exceptions, and those least important, they favor the largest liberty consistent with public safety in emigration and naturalization, which, taken together, complete the act of expatriation:

"Since one is a subject in regard that he constitutes, with others, one republic, into which he willingly enters, it follows from thence that one ceases to be a citizen so soon as he willingly removes with that design from his native country and joins himself to another State, settling there his fortune and family, unless the laws forbid subjects to remove."—Heineccius, B. 2, § 230.

"A man should not leave his country or the State of which he is a member in time of war or great distress, but in a time of peace he may do so if he pleases."—Grotius.

"Where the liberty of removal hath been promiscuously allowed, and the subject settles himself and his effects under the protection of a foreign State, the Commonwealth which he left hath no longer any authority over him."—Puffendorf, B. 8, Ch. 11.

"Every man is born free; and the son of a citizen, when come to the years of discretion, may examine whether it be convenient for him to join the society for which he was destined by his birth. If he does not find it advantageous to remain in it, he is at liberty to quit it on making compensation for what it has done in his favor, and preserving, as far as new engagements will allow him, the sentiments of love and gratitude he owes it. A man's obligations to his natural country may, however, change, lessen, or entirely vanish, accordingly as he may have quitted it lawfully, and with good reason, in order to choose another, or has been banished from it deservedly or unjustly in due form of law or by violence."—Vattel.

"In England the subjects are under a stronger and more particular obligation to the sovereign than elsewhere in virtue of a right which they there call allegiance; but this does not prevent the English from withdrawing from the kingdom without the permission of the king; and when they have established themselves elsewhere neither the authority of the king nor of the laws of the kingdom have any further power over them."—Wicquefort, section 11, book 1, Ambassador.

"It is a right inherent in all free people to have the liberty of removal if they think proper. When a person becomes a member of a State he does not thereby renounce the care of himself and his affairs. He may seek the necessities and conveniences of life elsewhere. The subjects of a State cannot be denied the liberty of settling elsewhere in order to procure those advantages which they do not enjoy in their native country."—Burlamaqui.

"The particular duties of citizens terminate with the offices from which they flowed; but, as to general duties, they subsist as long as one continues to be a citizen and until that character is lost. Now, a man ceases to be a citizen in one of these ways: 1. When he goes to establish himself elsewhere; 2. When he is banished; 3. In case of subjection to a foreign Power."—Fetis, Droit des Gens.

"On the other hand, except in cases of great necessity, where it is intended to call out the strength of the society, the civil power, considered simply as such, has no right to restrain emigration and the disposition to settle elsewhere; this right not being necessary for the perpetuation of the body-politic, and the inhabitants of a country being by nature sufficiently attached to it (if the government be tolerable) without being detained."—Vicat.

"Man, whose subsistence depends upon his industry, ought naturally to seek happiness wherever he can find it. Want and misery make the law for him in this respect. If his native country offers him resources it is his nature to be attached to it. If it does not, by what right—I will add, with what motive—shall we seek to arrest and to punish him? May he not say, 'Give me and my family assurance of support, or let me seek it elsewhere?' The law of nature, which is that of self-preservation, will be to eternity stronger than all the maxims and calculations which politics can present. We are wrong to say that this man injures his country by carrying his industry abroad. He may justly reply that his industry is his own, and that he has a right to carry it where it can furnish him subsistence."—Rayneval.

"In times of peace it would seem unjust and dishonorable to any State to hinder its citizens from selling their lands and removing to any other State they please and freeing themselves from their former political relation. For the several subjects, by the taxes or tributes which they pay annually, compensate all the ordinary advantages which they receive from the community, and it would be unjust to hinder them from consulting better their own interest, if they can, elsewhere. Nor is there danger that any State will be deserted by many of its subjects unless it be either miserably constituted or administered, and in such cases the citizens have a better right to quit it and cannot be compelled to remain its subjects."—Hutchinson's Moral Philosophy.

"Men may relinquish their country from a sense of insecurity, oppression, annoyance, or inconvenience, and emigration ought neither to be prohibited nor discouraged."—Payley's Moral and Political Philosophy.

"Considered from an international point of view, the jurisdiction of a nation must be founded either upon the person or the property being within its territory; considered from a civil point of view, jurisdiction may be founded upon natural as well as local allegiance; in other words, every independent State claims to make laws perpetually binding upon its natural-born subjects wherever they may be. But natural allegiance or the obligation of perpetual obedience to the Government of the country wherein a man may happen to have been born, which he cannot forfeit or cancel, or vary by any change of time or place or circumstance, is the creature of civil law, and finds no countenance in the law of nations, as it is in direct conflict with the incontestable rule of that law: 'Extra territorium jus domicili impune non paretur.'"Twiss's Law of Nations, page 231.

"Formerly it was doubted whether an individual had a right to quit his country and settle elsewhere without leave from his Government; and in some countries he who did go had to sacrifice a part of his property.* At present such a right is very generally conceded under certain limitations. 'The right of emigration,' says Hefter, 'is inalienable; only self-imposed or unfulfilled obligations can restrict it.' The relation of the subject to the sovereign is a voluntary one, to be terminated by emigration; but a State is not bound to allow the departure of its subjects until all preëxisting lawful obligations to the State have been satisfied. Notice, therefore, may be required of an intent to migrate, and security be demanded for the satisfaction of back-standing obligations, before the person in question is allowed to leave the country.† De Martens writes to the effect:‡

"It belongs to universal and positive public law to determine how far the State is authorized to restrict or prevent the emigration of the natives of a country. Although the bond which attaches a subject to the State of his birth or his adoption be not indissoluble, every State has a right to be informed beforehand of the design of one of its subjects to expatriate himself, and to examine whether, by reason of crime or debt or engagements not yet fulfilled toward the State, it is authorized to retain him longer. These cases excepted, it is no more justified in prohibiting him from emigrating than it would be in prohibiting foreign sojourners from doing the same. These principles have always been followed in Germany. They have been sanctioned even by the federal pact of the German Confederation, as far as relates to emigration from the territory of one member of the Confederation to that of another."—Woolsey's International Law, page 142.

"While almost all the nations of Europe are ignorant of the constituent principles of society, and regard the people only as beasts of a farm, cultivated for the benefit of the owner, we are astonished, we are edified, that your thirteen republics should know at once the dignity of man, and should have drawn from the sources of the wisest philosophy the principles by which they are disposed to be governed."—Abbe de Mably to Mr. Adams, Minister to Holland.

"One of the principal objects of police is to hinder the subjects from emigrating in too great numbers. It is for the public universal or particular, law to determine to what degree a sovereign is permitted to restrain the natural liberty of those subjects who wish to quit the territory for a long time or expatriate themselves entirely. A foreigner, as long as he remains so, and has not contracted debts or committed crimes, is entirely at liberty to quit the State when he pleases; it is only in case of collision, reprisal, or war that a State is justifiable in detaining a foreigner against his will. This liberty, founded on the universal law of nations, is confirmed and even extended by a great number of treaties, and accordingly it is rarely violated; but a foreigner, formally naturalized, has no more right to exemption from this restraint than those who are born subjects of a State, unless he made express or tacit conditions on the subject."—Von Marten's Law of Nations, § 7.

"Citizenship ceases by penal or voluntary expatriation. In the first case the country renounces all its claims upon the subject; in the second he loses his privileges by voluntary separation from the country. But even when it is not permitted by law the bonds which unite the subject to his country are not dissoluble. Being wronged by his Government, compelled to seek in other lands the well-being (bienestar) and the happiness that he is not able to find in his own, he is allowed to abandon the association to which he belongs and to establish another elsewhere. This is a right of which the civil law cannot deprive him, and in the exercise of this right, as in all others, he is to decide for himself when to dissolve the ties which bind him to his country. It is, without doubt, possible for him to abuse it, but whether or not it is abused will be a difficult question for foreign nations to decide, as they are not competent judges of the facts."—Bello. Derechos Internacional, Paris, 1864, page 75.

*By the jus detractis, droit de detraction, property to which strangers out of the country succeeded was taxed. By an analogous tax, as the gabelle d'emigration, those who left a country were amerced in part of their goods, immovable or movable. Such odious rights, says De Martens, (I, sec. 90,) although existing still, are very generally abolished.

MUNICIPAL LAWS OF EUROPEAN STATES.

The enlarged and just views of these and other authors as to the inalienable rights of man must, in good time, produce their proper effect upon the legislation of the world. But unhappily the ground of our present complaint is that the municipal legislation of European States is in conflict with the principles advocated by the most enlightened jurists, who have best studied the laws of nature and of nations.

In other relations of government great advances have been made. The great States of southern Europe have abandoned in their recent organizations the political philosophy of the Middle Ages. There are no longer sovereigns who govern for years without a parliament, like Charles I, and there are no archbishops who, like Laud, boast that they are not likely to hear "that noise" again. The consent of the people is now the first condition of permanent or peaceful Governments. The forms of the ancient monarchies only are retained. The popular power expands with every generation in the organization of States; but as to subjects the rigid traditions of feudal law are strictly preserved. Municipal government is unimproved. It confounds police regulations with natural law: local legislation with the law of nations.

LOCAL LEGISLATION OF EUROPEAN STATES.

We have appended to this report a résumé of the laws of the several States of Europe, given by the principal Cabinet officers in answer to inquiries presented by the American Government in 1849. It is but just to suppose that a statement of laws thus made by officers best acquainted with the course of legislation and administration will be more satisfactory than any cursory examination of the various statutes could give. The correspondence from which these expositions of European law upon the subject of expatriation are taken, is printed in Executive Document 38, first session Thirty-Sixth Congress.

The doctrines of Great Britain, as represented by Lord Palmerston in a letter to Mr. Bancroft, are thus stated: that while it has never been denied by the British Government that emigrants leave their country by virtue of that right which has been asserted to be the foundation of all liberty, the right of every reasonable being to seek a new country, and that by the laws of Great Britain no restraint can, except in very special cases, be placed upon the perfect liberty of every British subject to leave the realm when and for whatever period he chooses, yet this expatriation, in the sense of a voluntary abjuration of natural allegiance, cannot be sanctioned without the assent of the sovereign power; nor does it debar the return of the emigrant as a natural-born subject.

Count Walewski, for the Government of France, in a dispatch to Mr. Calhoun, 25th November, 1859, declares that French legislation does not permit a Frenchman to renounce his nationality, but he loses it by positive law when naturalized in a foreign country. A Frenchman who emigrates, and thus places himself out of the way of military service, would assuredly be punishable on his return to France although he should have obtained a foreign naturalization. (Article 230, Nouveau Code Militaire, 1859.)

The royal decree of the Spanish Government, 17th November, 1852, declares that a Spaniard naturalized within the territory of another Power without the knowledge and authority of his Government shall not exempt himself from the obligations which were consequent to his primitive nationality. The same rule is applied to foreigners naturalized in Spain. (Serrano, to the Consul General of the United States at Cuba, 14th February, 1860.)

Austria requires an emigrant to disengage himself from all obligations as an Austrian subject, and he is deprived by law of the right to dispose of or inherit property. It provides punishment for those who absent themselves without passports.

In Prussia a subject loses his nationality, first, by discharge at the subject's request; second, by sentence of competent authority; third, by living ten years in a foreign country; fourth, by marriage, if a female, with a foreigner. Subjects who emigrate without obtaining a discharge are punished according to laws in that case provided, and if they return to Prussia are considered criminals, subject to punishment from which no citizenship of any nation can liberate them. The obligation to military service is not extinguished by time. After absence of more than ten years if he returns he is held to service. Emigration is not permitted except with express leave of the Government. (Baron Gerolt to Mr. Marcy, July 11, 1853; Baron Schleinitz to Mr. Wright, 6th January, 1859.)

The constitution of the North German Union, 1st July, 1867, makes every North German citizen subject to military duty. No substitute is received. Every able-bodied man is to serve three years in the field, four years in the reserves, and then five years in the militia. Colonization and emigration are regulated by the Legislature of the Union. (Executive Document 9, second session Fortieth Congress, pages 16-23.)

The laws of Hamburg make the denationalization of a subject dependent upon his obtaining a discharge from the Government, the payment of a specified sum of money, and evidence of the fulfillment of military service in person or by substitute.—(Merg. Dr., June 21, 1850.)

The Grand Duchy of Baden requires an emigrant to obtain the authorization of the Government, to show that he leaves no debts, that the country to which he emigrates will receive him, and that his wife is in accord in regard to emigration.—(Encyclo. 19, 19th Siecle. T. 11, p. 438.)

Bremen fully acknowledges her obligations to give protection to all American citizens, making no distinction between naturalized and native citizens of the United States. It holds that desertion from military service in any of the German States comes under that class of offenses (crimes) which will justify the surrender; and that no State could complain on the ground that such deserter had become its citizen. It cites the law of the United States to support this view. It does not regard a deserter from military service in the light of a political refugee, nor his act a political offense; and claims that desertion would be a crime in native as well as naturalized citizens. (Mr. Schleiden, minister &c., November 21, 1859.)

The laws of Hanover allow emigration with parents of children to the age of twenty-one years; those who emigrate without parents, up to the year preceding that when conscription takes place, and even in that year, upon proof that the emigrant betters his condition. Those who are within the age of military conscription, not yet in military service, are allowed to emigrate when their departure does not endanger the rights of others liable to service, or who give security for a substitute, in case young men should be called into service.—(W. Reitzenstein, minister, &c., August 20, 1859.)

The first article of the convention between the United States and the king of Wurtemberg,

October 3, 1844, provides that "every kind of droit d'aubaine, droit de retraite, and droit de détraction, or tax on emigration, are and shall remain abolished between the two contracting parties, their States, citizens, and subjects."

The convention with Saxony has the same provisions.

The treaty with Prussia, March 14, 1829, provides that the inhabitants of the respective States of the high contracting parties—

"Shall be at liberty to sojourn and reside in all parts whatsoever of said territories in order to attend to their affairs, and shall enjoy, to that effect, the same security and protection as natives of the country wherein they reside, on condition of submission to the laws and ordinances therein prevailing."

The Russian Government so far satisfies its subjects or so exercises its power as to restrain their emigration. In either case its municipal law is innocuous to other nations, and upon this subject at least does not materially affect the interests or rights of the United States. The same remark is substantially true of France.

REVIEW OF FOREIGN MUNICIPAL LEGISLATION.

There is one element of harmony that pervades foreign legislation upon this subject. The emigration of a subject is held to depend upon the consent of his Government. But the practice of the Governments in this matter varies so much as to show a substantial difference of principle. It does not appear that the consent of Great Britain, express or implied, is actually withheld from the multitudes who emigrate from her shores, or that she makes any exertion to prevent their departure, while in some of the German States the regulations are such as to imply the consent of the Government to the large emigration which seeks, in the provident language of their rulers, to improve their condition by establishing a new home in other lands. Such especially is the fact in Baden, Bremen, Hanover, and perhaps other States.

The French decrees admit a favorable interpretation also. The decree of 1811 was a war measure, established when France was in contest with the whole of Europe, and that of 1859 when fighting for the unity and freedom of Italy. Considered as interpretations of the rights of nations in a period of war, they furnish no reasonable ground of complaint. There is nothing in them that compels the French Government to insist upon them in a period of profound peace. On the contrary, it is but just to assume that an enlightened ruler like the Emperor of France, who has so constantly appealed to the people as the support and authority of his Government, and who has so largely contributed to the late reorganization of the State system of Europe, which has been characterized by the most eminent opponents of the empire as the grandest revolution of modern history, will recognize the difference between a period of war, when nations contend for their existence, and a state of profound peace, as to the absolute power of the Governments of modern times over the rights of subjects. The reserved right of assent or dissent which European States claim, ought to be considered, not upon the basis of the political systems of the middle ages, but in the light of modern ideas and necessities.

EFFECTS OF EMIGRATION ON GOVERNMENTS.

The history of the past twenty years has greatly changed the relations of nations to each other and those of Governments to their subjects; and among the active and powerful agents in this revolution none is to be compared in its results with that of emigration. Every State has participated in it, and the most important of them have sought and found in it security and relief. This is especially true of the English Government. India and America have borne from her millions of her surplus population. Colonization extended.

her power, and the independence of the States she planted contributed much to her commercial supremacy. It has not only strengthened her outward power, but relieved her of the evil of an over-crowded kingdom. She was taught by her own writers that her people would be too numerous for her means of support, that laborers would exceed the demand for labor. Nothing quieted this universal apprehension so much as plans for extensive emigration. Except in the case of her colonies the Government had done little directly to encourage it. Private enterprise had directed its movements and supplied its necessities. But it became necessary to elevate emigration from a private enterprise to a public and national measure. Committees were appointed by the House of Commons which recommended national systems of emigration; schemes of colonization like those practiced by earlier nations, by which, for the relief and security of the empire, whole communities were to be deported at once and occupations and homes provided for them, were advocated in Parliament and by public journals. Advances for this purpose were proposed from public taxes, to be repaid by emigrants. It was estimated in Parliament that an annual appropriation of £240,000 would be required to carry off the surplus of unemployed people, who would otherwise be an intolerable burden to the Government. Although this was done under the pretense of colonization, it was in reality a plan of deportation or emigration, without special regard to the countries to which the emigrants should be carried. The famine of 1848 made it necessary that the excess of Irish population especially should be reduced by emigration. The officers of the Government were authorized to borrow money for the purpose of advancing loans to such emigrants, to be repaid in five or seven years, and immense sums were raised for this purpose upon this public authority. Under the influence of such measures emigration increased from the British empire from eighty-three thousand persons in 1831 to three hundred and thirty-six thousand in 1857, and has continued to increase to this day.

The result was an immediate relief to the destitute, and increased work and wages for those in want. This was conspicuous in Ireland, where excess of population over the supply of food and of employment led to disorder, crime, and public discontent. "From Ireland," says an eminent authority, "the tide of emigration was directed not so much to the colonies as to the United States, which they seemed to consider as their home next to their own island." The great emigration from 1846 to 1854, which alarmed English politicians and threatened to depopulate Ireland, it is said again, "only redounded to the public advantage by raising wages and improving the condition of those who remained." "Of all those who have left our shores none have been so greatly benefited as the Irish, whose sole possession and inheritance was the sad one of deportation. For them no work was too arduous, no difficulty too great; and in their new homes they roused themselves like giants from the sleep of years."

This exodus of a nation accomplished all that was anticipated, and has been a subject of universal congratulation among English statesmen. England profited by it in many ways. The money remitted by her emigrants in ten years, from 1848 to 1858, through English commercial banking houses, upon their own statements to the Government, was about ten million pounds sterling, (£9,937,000,) nearly fifty million dollars, or five millions yearly. These remittances have probably been trebled in the ten years succeeding 1857. Thus the opponents of these Irish people found their deportation advantageous, while their friends were encouraged to hope for their speedy and complete regeneration.

The interest of the British Government in this national enterprise was beyond considerations of pecuniary advantage. Had she forbidden the emigration of her subjects, as she was bound in honor to do if she intended to enforce her claim to their service upon her theory of indefeasible allegiance, it would have added ten or twelve millions to the population of Ireland, and to that extent increased the evils of labor without employment, people without food, of misery and crime, the precursor of riot or revolution, and she would have been compelled to choose between a change of her policy towards Ireland or the extinction of an entire race of her people by violence. From such evils she has been preserved by the beneficial results of peaceful emigration to America. It was with good reason that Lord Ashburton described this emigration as "the modern means by which the population of the world found its level, for the benefit of all and eminently for the benefit of humanity."

Emigration from the German States has been nearly in equal proportions, though prompted by very different motives. But it has been attended with equally beneficial results.

Europe has exported to the United States since 1790 six million six hundred and forty thousand of its subjects. They and their descendants now number more than twenty millions. She has received from them in remittances of money £50,000,000 sterling. She monopolized the carrying trade which was thus created. Mr. J. J. Sturz, a German author, long connected with this interest, says that of one thousand and seventy round voyages between Europe and North America made in 1865, by about ninety steamships belonging to fifteen European steamship companies, (ten English, three French, two German,) there was but one voyage made under the American flag.* The same writer reported twenty-two new steamers on the stocks in Europe destined for this trade. A table from the Bureau of Statistics, appended to this report, shows that for the quarter ending September 30, 1867, the number of emigrants brought to the United States in European vessels was eighty-six thousand seven hundred and ninety-seven (including fifteen thousand three hundred and six, from British America, imported there in European vessels,) and only eight thousand two hundred and twenty-five in American vessels. The character of the people gives another indication of the advantage that foreign Governments derive from this emigration. Steerage passengers crowd the vessels from Europe to America, but they take none back from America to Europe. And this is done under the eye of foreign Governments. Every possible aid, public and private, with statute regulations and official protection and subsidy, has been given to this work, so essential to public security and profitable for private enterprise.

It is, therefore, a continuing prosperity for Europe, political, economical, and financial. The disparity between European and American participation therein is likely to be perpetual. No preparation is made by American governments, State or national, or by her steamship owners or navigators, to share in this traffic, which numbers three hundred and fifty thousand passengers yearly, and is not unlikely, under the stimulants of public and private enterprise, to reach half a million.

In the presence of such facts it is to be asked whether European Governments have "consented" to the exodus of these nations from her shores? Is an emigrant who came here in the steerage and returns a regenerated man to the home of his fathers to be told that he "is a deserter," has been absent without consent or knowledge of his Government, and is to serve the balance of his life in her armies or to work out his share of her debts incurred in his absence? Is a family of the second or the third generation—for such is the law—to be told that they, too, owe service to the Government from which they escaped without leave, and can never return to the hearth-stones or the graves of their ancestors? The pretension is preposterous and the inquiry offensive to justice and decency. Every State is bound to know what is done within its jurisdiction, at least what it does, and to accept the legitimate consequences of its acts.

The emigrants of Europe it may be were sent here to die; but it was also possible they might live. There was at least a chance for that. Their return to a country which they had abandoned because of its excess of population and its scarcity of employment and food could not reasonably have been expected. No stipulations were made of that character at least. It was possible that here in America they would find vacant space, comfortable shelter, healthy food, remunerative employment, and thus preserve, at least, the life God gave them—the only valuable thing they brought with them. Having escaped death by famine, and conquered for themselves a home and freedom, if not fortune and fame; having been counted among rulers in this country; who is able to satisfy them that they are here without authority, and that upon the theory of the oath made by the land barons to William the Conqueror and Charlemagne in the Middle Ages they are yet subjects of the States they and their fathers abandoned, because life was a burden, and now owe them service of mind and heart, of life and limb? Allegiance is not due to a State unable or unwilling to protect its subjects. Incapacity or disinclination is in itself an absolution from the obligation.

But it is not necessary to show the active participation of Governments in this history to relieve emigrants from this bondage of feudal allegiance. It is a well settled principle of public law that sovereigns and subjects are bound by acts which receive their implied sanction. Silence in this case is the equivalent of express consent. It is implied when it is manifested by signs, acts, or facts, or by inaction or silence, which indicate consent. The law of nations is founded upon the general consent of nations, whether it be express, tacit, or presumed. (Heffter, page 8.) The sources of international law are conventions or treaties expressly or tacitly made. The latter have their origin in the actions or customs of States. (Klüber, pages 5-183.) A nation can pledge its faith tacitly in making treaties as well as by express declaration. It is enough that its faith is given. The manner is unimportant. (2 Vattel, page 231.)

When a nation is discontented with public administration it has a right to reform it. But if they are themselves silent and obedient they are judged to approve the conduct of their superiors, and a fragment of the people cannot resist it. (1 Vattel, 164, 199.) Blackstone says that "the consent of the Crown to corporations which exist by force of common law is implied. Kings are presumed to have given their concurrence. The city of London, which has long existed, is looked upon as having the consent of the Crown; for though no charter can be shown the law presumes one, and that it may have been lost or destroyed." (3 Commentaries, 129.) The silence of a nation is received as its consent when it has liberty to accord or refuse it. (Pinheiro Ferreira.)

This is universal law. To deny it would unsettle all compacts, public and private. If this doctrine be good against a people who have not power to control what they may dislike, or against defunct monarchs who cannot deny such presumptions, it is better against Governments who are present with power to inhibit and prevent acts which they do not approve. It will not be denied that emigration from Europe to the United States has been accompanied by the tacit consent, at least, of its rulers, and has therefore an authority in law as substantial as the convention and treaties to which public faith has been tacitly pledged, or the city of London, whose charter cannot be shown.

Great Britain has not for purposes of her own transplanted four million subjects to this country, whom she could neither employ nor educate, nor feed nor govern, without knowing it; nor without knowing that when here they were likely to remain; that they were not to demand of her protection and support. She knew the separation was permanent, and she comprehended her interest in that fact. She could not doubt that being present residents they were likely to adopt the customs and become a part of the country. This was a result contemplated by Great Britain. It was the nature of the transaction. She was bound to take notice of the fact, because in recognizing the independence of the American States she had been compelled to study the character of their Government. She knew, as they knew, that they would here find employment, become educated, possess land, create new industries, acquire wealth, obtain social distinction, receive important public commissions, participate in the Government, and be numbered among its rulers.

She knew this, because she had seen this history enacted by the Colonists before the Revolution, and all along up to the war of 1812. Great Britain must have been conscious that when they came to prosperity and power they would cherish the memories of what they had enjoyed, and as well as what they had suffered. If she had capacity to consent to anything she consented to all this—emigration, naturalization, expatriation; and in absolving her Government from the burden of protection she abandoned all claim thereafter to their subjection or service. This is as clear as if done with "the united concurrence of her Legislature."

AUTHORITY OF MUNICIPAL LEGISLATION.

Lord Palmerston, in his dispatch to Mr. Bancroft, cites with admiration Mr. Justice Story as authority for the doctrine which "every nation has hitherto assumed, that its laws extend to and bind natural-born subjects at all times and at all places;" that "every nation has an exclusive right to regulate persons and things within its own territory according to its own sovereign will and pleasure;" and that "in speaking of the right of a State to bind its own native subjects everywhere, we speak only of its own claim and exercise of sovereignty over them, and not of its rights to compel or require obedience to such laws on the part of other nations." And Lord Palmerston considered this exposition of public law as conclusive against the American theory of allegiance and the rights claimed for its naturalized citizens. Americans recognize the truth of these declarations of Mr. Justice Story; but they reject Lord Palmerston's deduction therefrom. What Americans claim is that a State which cannot employ, support, protect, and govern all her people, and for that reason regulates and accomplishes the deportation of that portion least able to support themselves, forfeits her right to govern them anywhere as exclusively her own subjects; and that in this case the doctrine of intrinsic and indefeasible allegiance comes to an abrupt and final termination by mutual consent and necessity.

AMERICAN LAW AND PRECEDENTS.

Foreign Governments attach much importance to the fact that the laws of the United States, as interpreted by its judicial tribunals, sustain their claim to perpetual allegiance. This is one of many embarrassments that attend this difficult and delicate question. The President, in his last annual message, refers to this subject:

"The attention of Congress is respectfully called to a singular and embarrassing conflict of laws.

The executive department of this Government has hitherto uniformly held, as it now holds, that naturalization in conformity with the Constitution and laws of the United States absolves the recipient from his native allegiance. The courts of Great Britain hold that allegiance to the British Crown is indefeasible, and is not absolved by our laws of naturalization. British judges cite courts and law authorities of the United States in support of that theory against the position held by the executive authority of the United States. This conflict perplexes the public mind concerning the rights of naturalized citizens and impairs the national authority abroad. I called attention to this subject in my last annual message, and now again respectfully appeal to Congress to declare the national will unmistakably upon this important question."—Page 32.

Yet, justly considered, the American interpretation of public law on this subject, elementary or judicial, adds nothing to the authority of Blackstone. The jurisdiction of courts does not extend to the enactment of laws. It is limited to their just interpretation. Judges are often governed less by reason than by precedents. "The doctrine of the law, then, is this," says Blackstone, "that precedents and rules must be followed unless flatly absurd or unjust. If the reason of a decision cannot be discovered, yet we owe such deference to former times that we are bound to suppose they did not act wholly without consideration." "I will servilely follow in the footsteps of my predecessors," said one of the most eminent English judges. The obsolete claim of inalienable allegiance may well be sustained by such absurd doctrines of legal construction. There is no American authority which cites this doctrine that does not rest it upon English law. The common law of England at the American Revolution is by some authorities accepted as law in the United States until changed by legislation. There has been no legislation upon the subject of expatriation, because the Constitution of the Government rests for its authority avowedly upon the voluntary consent of its subjects. American law authorities, receiving the common law of England before the Revolution as American common law, as some jurists do, the theory of indefeasible allegiance might be considered as having some color of law, because it was indisputable, at the time of the Revolution, a pretension of the common law of England. It is in this manner that it has been treated in this country. Elementary writers recognize this law because it is a part of our legal history; and a class of lawyers, who subordinate reason to precedent, and a few public men who have cited their views without indorsing them, have held that the English doctrine was law in this country, upon the theory, which has no just foundation, that everything that was law in England before, was law in America after the Revolution. But it has not been so authoritatively declared by the legislative, executive, or judicial officers of the Government.

"It is the doctrine of the English law," says Judge Kent, "that natural-born subjects owe an allegiance which is intrinsic and perpetual, and which cannot be divested by any act of their own." But he cites the writers on public law as generally in favor of an opposite doctrine. Suggesting that the better opinion is that in absence of any legislative act on this question the rule of common law prevails, he also declares that "some relaxation of the old stern rule of the common law is required and admitted under the liberal influence of commerce."

Judge Story, in the case of the Santissima Trinidad, (7 Wheaton, 283,) evaded the question of expatriation, giving no decision thereon, but said "it was perfectly clear that it could not be done without a bona fide change of domicile under circumstances of good faith." The references to this subject in American judicial decisions are chiefly in cases where the plea of naturalization or expatriation is fraudulently made to support unjust claims to property or to justify acts of war against nations with which we were at peace. In the case of Williams, 1804, cited in 2 Cranch, 84, Chief Justice Ellsworth ruled that upon this subject the common law of the country remained as before the Revolution. But this was a case where a citizen of the United States, in evasion of its laws, accepted a French commission, and made war upon England, justifying his wrong by pleading naturalization in France. His defense was manifestly an evasion, and the just purpose of the court was to show that no such defense could be recognized for such purposes. "It was difficult," the Chief Justice said, "to restrain our own citizens from acts which would involve us in war." Williams was justly convicted and imprisoned. The decision of the court maintained the integrity of the Government in its treaty stipulations with England at a time when she was at war, though we were at peace, and ought not to be cited by Englishmen against the principles of public law that lie at the foundations of American government. But it has one important feature. It is a distinct recognition, even at that early day, that the emigration from Europe, and the expatriation of its citizens was with the consent of the European Governments. In countries so crowded with inhabitants, said the Chief Justice, there is necessity for emigration, while in America we have no inhabitants to spare. (Niles's Register.)

It will be difficult to find an authority of American law writers or a decision of American courts in which the doctrines of perpetual allegiance is recognized, except as a tradition of English law; or a case in which it has been regarded with favor, except for the purpose of preventing private injustice or the injury of the public peace. It has no authority in this country except as an element of English common law, existing at the time of the Revolution. There is nothing American in the oath of the land barons of England in 1086, nor in the feeble paraphrase of that obligation by Blackstone.

The opinion of American jurists and legislators on this subject is well expressed by Mr. Webster, Secretary of State, in a letter to Lord Ashburton, August, 1842, upon the right of expatriation:

"A question of such serious importance ought now to be put to rest. If the United States give shelter and protection to those whom the policy of England annually casts upon their shores—if, by the benign influences of their Government and institutions, and by the happy condition of the country, those emigrants becomer raised from poverty to comfort, finding it easy even to become landholders, and being allowed to partake in the enjoyment of all civil rights—if all this may be done, (and all this is done under the countenance and encouragement of England herself,) is it not high time, my lord, that, yielding that which had its origin in feudal ideas as inconsistent with the present state of society, and especially with the intercourse and relations subsisting between the Old World and the New, England should at length formally disclaim all right to the services of such persons, and renounce all control over their conduct?"

In this statement Mr. Webster regards the doctrine against which he protests not as American but as English law.

EFFECT OF THIS THEORY ON THE PEOPLE OF THE UNITED STATES.

The American people are perfectly conscious that every nation has a perfect right to frame its municipal laws to meet its own necessities. This municipal right is recognized, because it cannot be known otherwise what is required for the public safety. It has not, however, the same elevation as other branches of public law. It is in the nature of police regulations. But even in this view it is not entirely independent of public opinion and authority. Excessive cruelty or injustice in its provisions would justify interference. Every household has the same immunity, but its authority must be so exercised as not to impair the peace of other households; and the municipal legislation of a nation should be so framed as not to disturb, much less to impair or destroy, in others rights common to all nations. Legislation that does this—municipal or otherwise —is against the law of nations and of God. The municipal legislation of Great Britain has this effect upon the people of this country. Under such circumstances this Government is remanded to that general and permanent attribute of nations, denominated the right of self-preservation, which implies not only the right negatively of defense and security against external aggression, but positively of making such regulations generally as may maintain and promote the national welfare and prosperity. (Reddie's International Law, 190.) The authority for internal municipal legislation can never justify a State in disregarding the principles of universal law, public and private, the law of nations and of nature, when it operates, as in this case it does, to deprive a people of privileges conceded to the citizens of all civilized States.

The United States have a population of thirty-five millions. The free people, in 1700, numbered three million two hundred and fifty thousand. With an annual increase of births over deaths, estimated at one and thirty-eight hundredths per cent., they would now number nine million two hundred and fifty thousand; add four million emancipated people, and the aggregate of the population existing in 1790, with their descendants, is thirteen and a quarter millions. The balance of the people, twenty-one million seven hundred and fifty thousand, are emigrants and their descendants.

If this portion of our people—more than twenty millions—are subjects of the several States of Europe and their service is due to them, if they have no right to defend themselves or their adopted country in the event of war with Europe; if, unstained by crime and free of all offense, they are in consequence of this claim of service debarred from travel and from intercourse with civilized nations; or subject to arrest and compulsory service in armies organized to fight against their own Government, then the United States has no independent existence. It may have numbers, industry, commerce, letters, science, invention, courage, enterprise, wealth, prosperity and power; but it is not independent.

Its dreams of equality are delusions and its sacrifices have been in vain. Every State in Europe will have its garrison if these claims are admitted in every part of the Union. The able-bodied portion of three fifths of our population could be summoned to fight for Governments with which they have no connection and against those with which their fortunes are indissolubly united, and they would be accounted traitors if found in the ranks of its armies. We have received, educated, employed, enriched, enfranchised that portion of the people of Europe which its rulers cast off, to find them in their strength incapable of defending their country or lawful resistance to public enemies.

They would be exposed to arrest and compulsory military service or punishment, not only if found in their native country, but in any civilized nation with which their native Governments might have treaties of extradition. Martin Kozsta was a native of Hungary residing in Turkey with the consent of its Government; his surrender was demanded by Austria under an interpretation of treaties rejected by Turkey, and would have been surrendered and imprisoned but for the forcible intervention of the Government of the United States. The intimate association of those who are claimed as subjects of foreign Governments is such as to put in peril the rights or peace of all. Its absurdity if applied to this large portion of our people is palpable. But the injustice of its application to individuals is equal to the absurdity of its application to nations.

REMEDIES.

The injustice of this principle is more apparent than the remedy. But that there is a corrective for so great a wrong cannot be doubted.

It is not in vain to labor for a reconsideration of this great question by European Governments, more in the light of reason and less in the spirit of feudal philosophy. The solution of this important international problem belongs to men who have capacity to divine the right in law and the courage to assert its power. That such men are to be found among those who occupy the proud eminence of royal or popular favor cannot be doubted.

There is one quarter of the world to which we look with hope. Those who have evoked from the labyrinth of German politics, which have been to all students of history in one sense a mystery and in another a puzzle—who, from the elements of anarchy, have in an instant and by a word called into being a new creation already recognized as a permanent empire, and which promises at a day not distant to unite a race long divided, and to cement a power in central Europe long needed, that may number sixty million people: to those to whose genius and success is due the North German Union we have a right to turn for the justice we demand.

In the foundation of a new Power she has wisely submitted her plans to the approval of the people. She has made petty interests that formed petty governments subservient to great principles that are the only basis of great nations. She has united the people who speak the same language and who reverence the same historic past. She seeks to hold them together by consent, not by force. The constitution of 1867 is prophetic of the future. The Republic of the New World might adopt with profit many of its wise and just provisions. She knows how important emigration is to civilization and to liberty. She felt in the great struggle which terminated at Sadowa the priceless advantages of the Germanic emigration to the north which gave to her a friend and an ally in Russia. She counts not less than two million native-born children in the republican family of the United States, and of their descendants nearly six millions more. She will understand how dearly they cherish the glorious memories of the "Fatherland." She can comprehend the advantage of an ally and friend in the New World equal in spirit and strength to that which supports her in the Old. The concession we ask is not worth to her the parchment upon which it is written. Her conventions and treaties closely approach it. The legislation of some of the lesser German States, as interpreted by their rulers, require but the definition of a single word to secure to Americans all they ask of Germany.

But whatever may be her decision or that of other States, the point we make will be conceded. That the rights we claim can be permanently denied; that the question at issue will be settled against us; that it is to remain long unsettled, is impossible.

The Committee on Foreign Affairs have entered upon the consideration of the question only by the direct order of the House. It has received the considerate attention which its great importance demands, and the result of its deliberations is embraced in a bill herewith submitted for the consideration of the House. Nothing can be more apparent than that legislation does not alone furnish a remedy for the evils of which the country complains. Local legislation is as powerless to effect the reforms we desire as it is to justify the wrongs inflicted upon American citizens by other nations. But it is indispensable as a first step that statute declaration of the rights we claim should exist. It is also important that distinct proclamation of the limitations to the rights we claim should be made. The project of a law which is submitted herewith seeks to accomplish this result. It also proposes that when all the resources of the Government shall have failed to produce a recognition by other Governments of the principles of public law so long maintained by this, in regard to the rights of naturalized citizens, the President shall be invested with the same authority within our jurisdiction as to subjects of other Governments, that foreign States enforce upon American citizens within their jurisdiction. In case of collision, reprisal, or war, a State is justified in detaining a foreigner against his will. (Von Martens, Law of Nations, 87.) But it is not anticipated that such proceedings will be required. It cannot be that in this age, when all the political traditions of the middle ages are tumbling, that Europe will rush to extremities to sustain a claim repudiated by every authority of law, humanity, experience, civilization, and justice.

A BILL concerning the Rights of American Citizens in Foreign States:

SECTION 1. Be it enacted, &c., That all naturalized citizens of the United States while in foreign States shall be entitled to and shall receive from this Government the same protection of persons and property that is accorded to native-born citizens in like situation and circumstances. And the President is empowered to employ all the resources of the Government in just efforts to secure the recognition by other Governments of the principles of public law which have been insisted upon and maintained by the Government of the United States in regard to the rights of naturalized citizens: Provided always, That no citizen of the United States who is guilty of crime against the laws of any foreign State committed within its jurisdiction; or of desertion from actual service in the Army or Navy of such State; or who shall have acquired naturalization by misrepresentation or fraud in regard to residence or otherwise; or who by treason or other crime against the United States shall have forfeited, or who shall have renounced his rights as a citizen, or who shall establish a continuous residence beyond the limits of the United States for a term exceeding five years, shall be entitled to the protection contemplated by this act.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That whenever it shall be duly made known to the President that any naturalized citizen of the United States has been arrested and is detained by any foreign Government in contravention of the intent and purposes of this act, upon the allegation that naturalization in the United States does not operate to dissolve his allegiance to his native sovereign, or if any citizen shall have been so arrested and detained whose release upon demand shall have been unreasonably delayed or refused, the President shall be, and hereby is, empowered to order the arrest and to detain in custody any subject or citizen of such foreign Government who may be found within the jurisdiction of the United States; and the President shall, without unreasonable delay, give information to Congress of any such proceedings under this act.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That if any naturalized citizen of the United States shall return to his native country with intent to resume his domicile therein, or if any citizen shall leave the United States with the intention of permanent residence in any foreign State, or shall fail to make annual return of his property in the United States for taxation to the assessor of internal revenue of the district of the United States in which such citizen last resided, or shall engage as an army or navy belligerent in any foreign war or service, such citizen shall not be entitled to the interposition of the Government in his behalf under the provisions of this act.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the term "domicile" in the preceding section shall be construed to mean a continuous residence of more than five years in the native country of the naturalized citizen, or establishing himself in any business which denotes an intention to resume a permanent residence.

SPEECH OF HON. W. WILLIAMS,
OF INDIANA,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
January 25, 1868.

The House being in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the President's annual message—

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana, said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: Since I have had the honor of a seat in this House I have never save on one occasion, and then very briefly, occupied the attention of the House. So far I have preferred to remain silent and listen to the words of wisdom as they fell from the lips of the experienced statesmen of the land. And as I speak to-day ex tempore I shall invoke the charitable criticisms of the House and the country and ask the Chair that I shall not be interrupted during the short time allotted me by the rules of the House.

Mr. Chairman, the condition of the country at this time, both political and financial, is the subject of anxious solicitude in the minds of the people, and to Congress they look with confidence for a happy solution of the national difficulties. I have sometimes wondered since occupying my seat whether I was sitting in the Halls of an American Congress or had taken my place in the Council Chambers of a foreign Power, whose institutions and government was ruled by the hands of some mighty despot. I have heard, sir, with harsh grating on my ear, from the lips of distinguished statesmen and classic orators, the following terrible words: "usurpation," "unconstitutional legislation," "infamous legislation," "monstrosity," and language of similar import, well calculated to arouse to action the sleeping energies of a nation to the impending dangers which surround them; and I trust, sir, that the Republican party will heed the warning voice of these new guardians of liberty, or latter-day saints, and prepare to meet the impending storm that so seriously imperils the life of the Republic.

Sir, I love to go back in my country's history to the time when Providence smiled upon the birth of freedom, and, if possible, draw inspiration from the teachings and principles of the fathers who have transmitted to us so glorious a heritage, and proclaimed to the world the capacity of man to govern himself. I have read, sir, with deep interest, the graphic description of that event that transpired long since, when the fathers spoke and an empire was free. It is said by the writer that the assemblage which convened in that memorable Hall in grandeur and sublimity was only excelled when Trinity held council for the redemption of man. I fancy I can see them as they look over the great white ocean and see no army or navy to encounter the mistress of the sea, and in the midst of the solemn reverie it is said that an old man with a red cloak approached the Speaker's chair and offered a prayer to God for the deliverance of the struggling colonies, and a voice came out from behind the cloud that veiled the brightness of Jehovah's throne. Let victory perch on liberty's side. The British lion was driven back to his lair, and God gave to our fathers a land forever to be dedicated to freedom; and to-day they say to us, "Stand firm amid the battle shock, and transmit to coming generations unimpaired that which treason has sought to overthrow and destroy."

That declaration was but a fulfillment of a prophecy more than four thousand years before, when inspiration, looking down upon the vast future, declared that the time should come in the history of the world when a nation should be born in a day. And the fulfillment of that prophecy came when our nation was born, and liberty came forth as the morning star and the hope of the oppressed millions of the world.

For seventy years, with but two exceptions, no person dreamed of war. Under the balancing power of the Constitution our country grew and strengthened into a great empire, whose territory was washed by the waves of two oceans. But war did come, and I propose to-day briefly to show what great party it was that raised their impious hands against the Constitution of our country, and who determined if their action could accomplish it to sever the land of Washington, and to let the future historian write the epitaph on his tombstone: "Here lies the hero of a nation that has gone down in rebellion;" and then to divide this great empire which God had decreed, by its mountains, lakes, and rivers, should be one people and one Government until the last sands shall have passed from the mirror of time.

Mr. Chairman, I propose to show that the remnant of the once great and powerful party who in the days of its loyalty and fidelity to the Constitution, when it marched its solid columns, beneath whose tread the earth trembled as they approached the ballot-box, do now, in the days of their degeneracy and affiliation with treason, propose and boldly proclaim that should the Republican party restore back to the disorganized communities in the late rebellious States governments republican in form and such as are required by the Federal Constitution to be guaranteed to all the States, then and in that event this Union party shall be driven from power, and the enemies of the Republic shall be restored to power and placed in charge of the ark of our political covenant.

I charge upon the present Democratic party that they were the party that raised their impious hands against this Government. And what do we see to-day? All over this great land the fires of a thousand forges have gone out; the spindles of your great factories are stilled, and thousands of operatives are unable to obtain employment, with the proceeds of which to maintain their families; the merchant in your commercial metropolis stands with anxious care inquiring, "What shall I do to save my credit and meet the obligations pressing upon me?" The nation, borne down with taxation, fastened upon them by Democratic treachery, calls loudly to Congress for relief, and repeats the Macedonian cry, "Come over and help us;" and I have faith to believe that a Republican Congress will so far as possible meet the emergency.

And what party was it that brought this great ruin upon the land? The answer comes back as true as the law announced amid the roaring thunders and the flashing lightnings of Sinai's mount—"Democracy, thou didst it." And we are to-day reaping the fruits of the legacy bequeathed to the Republican party by the Democratic party of this country, who had grown fat upon the public plunder from our national Treasury, and, like Jezebel of old, "waxed fat and kicked."

When we came into power what was the condition of the country? For forty years, with but few exceptions, the Democratic party had controlled this Government. Before Abraham Lincoln was inaugurated they had stolen of the property of the people of the United States, $12,670,000, in forts, arsenals, and money. Six States had gone out of the Union as far as they could do. They had organized a confederate government, with a confederate president and a confederate congress, in opposition to the Government which our fathers gave us. That is the legacy the Democracy bequeathed to the Republican party.

The honorable gentleman who has just addressed this committee [Mr. SITGREAVES] says that the Radical party is responsible for all this. Go with me, if you please, down in sight of the city of Charleston in April, 1861, and what is the sight there which meets the gaze of the patriot? There are a large number of gentlemen clad in military apparel marching backward and forward with trailing arms, and with their cannon pointed toward the flag of your country. Ask who are those men, and the answer is, "All Democrats." And upon that terrible morning in April they opened their batteries of stolen guns against the national fort and fired upon the flag which in its mission of mercy had shed its rays of light over the dark waters of Japan and in searching for the lost navigator in the frozen regions of the north.

I ask Democrats, Do you recollect the morning when the telegraph flashed all over the land the news that Sumter had been fired upon and had fallen, what a thrill went to the hearts of the American people? and Democracy stood appalled at the work of their own hands. Abraham Lincoln called for seventy-five thousand men to defend the existence of the Republic, and Democracy then proclaimed that there was no power in the Constitution to preserve its own vitality or existence, and that the call for troops was a violation of that instrument which perjured treason was attempting to overthrow by the strong hand of armed resistance to its authority. What did the Democracy say? These men who now prate about "the Constitution" told us then that it was a violation of the Constitution to defend the flag of our country. I challenge this Democratic party to show by a single record where, as a party, they ever sustained the Government in its efforts to put down this infamous Democratic rebellion during the entire progress of the war. When the Government found it necessary to suspend the writ of habeas corpus what was then the cry? They said, "This is an infringement of our rights; it denies to us the privilege of free speech and a free press." Yes, when we declared that a man should not receive the protection of this Government and at the same time preach treason against his country, the Democracy claimed that it violated their rights under the Constitution. During the entire war the Democratic party of the great North had no sympathy with the struggling thousands of our brave soldiers who went out to defend the flag of the country.

I now come to speak of the period when the Chicago convention was held. The remnants of this great body, who claim to be the political descendants of Jefferson, met in solemn convention upon the borders of that great lake that forms the northwestern boundary of my noble State. What did that convention declare? They declared that they were for peace; they declared that the war had been a failure; and I charge to-day that that resolution, passed by that peace convention, was a slander and a libel upon the brave soldiers of the North who had reconquered three-fourths of the rebel territory, and were then just about to take that great march with Sherman to the sea—a military expedition exceeding in glory the proudest exploits of Napoleon. And in that convention the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] not now in his seat made a prayer on behalf of the Democratic party. It is astonishing to me that the Democracy should ever pray; but my astonishment diminishes when I discover that Jeff. Davis prayed for the triumph of his rebel government. Let me read the language used on that occasion by the gentleman from New York:

"Now, my friends, I counsel peace. [Cheers.] I counsel peace in the Democratic party that we may restore old rights to this distracted land. We must have a union of the party that we may have a Union of the States. [Cheers.] Planting ourselves firmly upon a peace platform, that's right, and cheers, with a candidate pledged to restore peace and harmony, [cheers,] some great-hearted Democrat, the Union shall and will be restored. [Bully for you, and loud cheers.] Now, my friends, we have had war, we have had administration, desolation, emancipation, and damnation. [Loud and continued cheers.] And now we propose to apply the remedy—to administer the antidote—peace. God of our fathers, grant us peace, [Amen.] peace in our hearts, and at [his] altar; peace on our red altars and on our blighted shores; peace for beleaguered cities and the hosts that wait around them; peace for the widows and fatherless, for the sinning and sinned against. Grant us peace, O God, for all, and for a distracted, torn and bleeding land. Speed the great time of peace. [Immense cheers.]

It is my opinion, that in the midst of these outbursts of enthusiasm, had they paused for a moment—the pale finger of a Douglas might have been seen writing on the wall these words, mene, mene, tekel, upharsin. Peace, Democracy, thou art weighed in the balance, and found wanting.

That is a very eloquent prayer. The gentleman who uttered it went upon the principle expressed by the poet, who says,

"Prayer is appointed to convey The blessings God designs to give."

But that prayer was never answered. God did not answer the prayer of that Democratic convention by calling back our brave soldiers in their triumphal march and dishonoring our Army. He heard and answered the prayer of the widow going up in behalf of that flag in defense of which her husband had fallen. "There is no peace unto the wicked, saith the Lord." God heard the prayer of the mother whose boy grasped in his firm hand the ensign of the Republic, which was kept waving till an honorable and triumphant peace had been conquered from armed rebellion.

When the war closed what was the condition of this country? Ten States were practically out of the Union. I may differ with some of my Republican friends; but I claim that when the war closed those States were States geographically, but had no civil governments. They had by rebellion overturned the authority of the United States within their limits, and the Constitution was powerless to operate; they had set up rebel governments in antagonism to the national authority. Our armies succeeded in overthrowing those rebel governments, and when the war closed there was no civil government in those States.

Now, under the Constitution it was the duty of Congress to provide for those disorganized communities a republican form of government. But before Congress could take any action President Johnson, assuming to be himself the United States, wrapping himself in the mantle of a self-constituted Moses, said, "I will reconstruct these States on my policy," and did proceed to appoint Governors, declare who should vote, and so far as it was possible under the Constitution or outside of it, so organized these revolted provinces as to place the control of these self-constituted State governments in the hands of the disloyal and rebel element, permitting and appointing men to office who never took the oath prescribed by Congress; and in violation of law, and all his previous pledges made to the people that treason should be punished and traitors take back seats in the work of reconstruction. Congress offered to the people of the United States for ratification an amendment to the Constitution, which, if these revolted and conquered provinces had signified their willingness to see incorporated into the organic law of the land, and had made their reorganization of State governments republican in form, would long since have been, in my opinion, represented in the Legislature of the Government, and to-day would be enjoying all the rights of States in the Union. No nation on the face of the globe ever offered to outlawed and conquered belligerents such noble and humane provisions as was held out as inducements to win them back to their fealty to the Constitution and the land they had dishonored. We had a right under the law of nations to demand indemnity for the past and security for the future. But did we get indemnity for the past?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana. I cannot yield.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I would like to know the terms offered. That is all.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana. We said to them we simply require these guarantees for the future. They could not give us indemnity for the past. Could they, I ask you, restore the limbs of our soldiers lost upon the battlefield? Could they restore to the mother the bright jewel of her household that she gave in defense of liberty? All the cotton upon the vast plains of the South, all the vast wealth of her planters could not give us indemnity for the past. We demanded only security for the future. We asked that there should be ingrafted into the organic law of the land a constitutional provision providing that the rebel debt should never be assumed and paid either by the Federal or State governments; we asked a pledge that the pension of the widow of the soldier who gave his life and blood to save the nation should be promptly met and paid; we required a provision in the organic law that the debt of the nation, contracted to put down rebellion and save the country, should never be repudiated; and when we asked these moderate and humane provisions of security the President of the United States and Democracy declared it was a violation of the Constitution to amend that instrument, and the hosts of rebellion answered, Amen! So mote it be.

The President said he acknowledged only two superiors, the Lord and the people. The question was submitted in 1866, and the people, by an overwhelming majority, decided with Congress. And the Lord, becoming disgusted with his repeated violation of his pledges to the people, has forsaken him in this his hour of calamity, that there is none now so low as to do him reverence.

There has been no act passed by the Thirty-Ninth or Fortieth Congress on the subject of reconstruction which has not been denounced by our Democratic friends on the other side as unconstitutional, revolutionary, and tyrannical in its provisions, and designed to supplant the civil by the military power. I suppose they mean the bogus civil governments set up by the fiat of executive usurpation.

I ask my Democratic friends, who now profess so much love for the soldiers, are you afraid to trust the great military leaders of this country, who led our armies triumphant to victory, to hold the rebels in check simply long enough to let the loyal men of that country organize governments republican in form? That is all the measure provides. If you cannot trust our military commanders to hold that rebellious element in check, I ask you what party you can trust in this hour of the nation's life?

I want gentlemen to understand that, while prating about military power, they voted a day or two ago in this House solidly against placing the power of reconstruction in the hands of the civil authorities by voting down the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER.] They evidenced their faith by their works in that vote in favor of letting the military have the control of reconstruction in these States, thus ignoring all their former positions on the question of reconstruction. But gentlemen tell us, and so does the President, that the object of this great Radical party is to Africanize these southern States. They say that we are placing them under negro domination. They say that by these acts of Congress the Republican party say that negroes shall have the right to vote. My friend from New York [Mr. BROOKS] says that this is a "white man's Government." Sir, I deny the assertion that this is a white man's Government. I say that on the adoption of the Federal Constitution in every one of the original Colonies save two every free person of color had a right to vote and did vote for the men who made the Constitution and on its ratification. A "white man's Government!" Sir, I claim that it is a Government for the people of every clime that come to seek protection under the flag of the Union. We invite by our naturalization laws the foreigner to come, and whoever he may be who comes here and obeys the laws and pays taxes for the support of the Government and defends its flag it is his Government, be he red, black, or white, and he is entitled to the same protection of the native-born American whose eyes first beheld the sunlight upon American soil.

But they tell us we are placing the ballot in the hands of the negro, who is not qualified to exercise the franchise. Why, sir, let us see: in Tennessee, by the act of the people, without congressional intervention, they gave to the colored population the right to vote. There you have a practical test of the first emerging of humanity from slavery to freedom. Let the loyal delegation on the floor of this House from Tennessee answer the question; they voted right. Why, sir, they voted the Republican ticket in Tennessee, say our Democratic friends. Well, I think that they exhibited more intelligence and sound judgment by that vote than the white Democrats who did not vote or who voted the Democratic ticket.

But let us examine this matter for a moment. What do the Democrats propose to do? What kind of a system do they propose to give us? They say they are willing to restore all the rebels to power without either faith or repentance. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. SITGRATES] this morning said he was opposed to reconstruction, but in favor of restoration. Sir, what great rights have these men lost by the act of reconstruction? When the war ended they had no rights under the Constitution. They were alien enemies, and had no rights except such as Congress saw fit to confer upon them. Restoration, indeed; that means restore back to these rebels the loyal black man to slavery. Democracy are the only mourners to sing its requiem.

Sir, the country calls upon us to-day in the Halls of this American Congress to restore these ten disorganized governments to the Union. But what does the Democracy say in response? They say to us, "You are going to sap the foundations of the Republic." My friend from Indiana [Mr. KERN] the other day said: "If this reconstruction act is passed and forced upon the people of the South the last sands of the Republic are about to pass away, and it follows to the grave the republics of the past;" and he called mightily upon Hercules to come and save the Government. But, sir, Hercules did not respond. Instead of Hercules, the old fossil Democracy, like ulcerating sores upon the body politic, and the virus of treason yet on their garments, only respond to the invocation.

The question before the country now is, shall this Government be restored upon the basis the fathers designed to establish? Shall we make this, the great empire of the West, the refuge and home of the free? But the President comes in with his message and says to us that in 1861 Congress passed a resolution declaring that the object of the war was not to interfere with the institutions of the States, but to save the Republic and restore the insurgent States to their status prior to the war. I know that was the declaration of Congress. But, sir, we had a practical demonstration of the effect of that position at the very outset of the war, when a military order was issued, called Order No. 3, declaring that no colored man should come inside of our lines. Tell me, if you can, one single battle that we won under Order No. 3? Let the history of Bull Run answer. It is true, we tried to save the country and save slavery at the same time, but the fiat from the throne of the Eternal came down to us saying, "Let the oppressed go free." It came through the proclamation of the great head of the nation, who afterward became the victim of Democratic assassins. He derived his teaching from Independence Hall, from the liberty bell that was cracked while tolling the funeral of the immortal Clay, upon which was this inscription: "Proclaim liberty throughout the land to all the inhabitants thereof." And inspired by that message of liberty he writes that immortal proclamation which shall go down to posterity side by side with the farewell address of the father of his country. Then the manacles fell from the limbs of four million human beings, and the shout of jubilee went up to God, and they went forth clothed with all the rights of humanity.

But gentlemen on the other side tell us that if we persist in this policy of forcing upon the South the reconstruction measures it will supplant the party now in power by the Democratic party, which will rise up and take possession of the Government. Sir, I have no fear on that score. They may by the cry of high taxes and hard times attempt to make an impression upon the people, but I have no fear of this Government being placed in the hands of the party that rose in arms to tear down the citadel of liberty. It may be that in the city of New York, that modern Sodom, and other sinks of iniquity and gambling hells of pandemonium, the arguments of the gentlemen will take effect; but when you come among the rural districts, where churches and school-houses are found, you will find a moral, virtuous, and intelligent people, who have stood by the Government, and who are going to stand by the great party that saved it when the proud ship of state was swaying upon the waves of treason, and when Democrats, with the drawn stiletto in hand, sought to stab the Goddess of Liberty in the back in her onward march of advanced civilization. Sir, it makes no difference what parties may say. I believe that the empire of our fathers must live coextensive with time itself. God has planted this Government here as the great central orb whose light shall radiate out to the despotic Governments of the Old World, and its oppressed millions will behold the scintillations of its light, and, inspired by its shining glory, will rise in their majesty and proclaim to trembling despots that the day of their dissolution is near at hand.

The gentleman from New York speaks for himself. Hear him:

"The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOWEN] tried to alarm the country by foretelling that the Democracy, if reinstated in power, would undo what the Republicans have been doing; but I think he will give joy to the country rather than alarm by assuring them of that. He instanced, to increase that alarm, what the Democracy had been doing in Ohio and in New Jersey; as to them he might have added New York. Sir, Ohio and New Jersey are but the beginning of the end. We intend to undo almost everything that has been done for the last three years by this and the preceding Congress. We intend to change the present majority here, and to repeal all the destructive acts which you now have in course of reconstruction."

He tells us what his party will do when they obtain control of the Government. He tells us that they are going to wipe out all these measures of reconstruction which have been passed during the last three years. Sir, he need not lay the flattering unction to his soul that they are ever going to get the control of this Government. The loyal people of this land have sworn a great oath and registered it in heaven that none but loyal men shall rule the country. But I suppose the gentleman proposes, then, to repeal the law that gives pensions to the widows of our soldiers. He proposes to repeal the law to give bounties to the brave defenders of our flag. He proposes all that, and what else? Let me tell you. He and his party will propose, if by any accident they should ever get control of the Government, either to repudiate our national debt or fasten upon this people for this generation the payment of pensions and bounties to rebel soldiers.

Let us see what the Democracy say. I quote the language of a Democratic candidate for Congress in Virginia in 1865, under Andrew Johnson's government there. He said:

"I am opposed to the southern States being taxed at all for the redemption of this debt, either directly or indirectly, and if elected to Congress I will oppose all such measures, and I will vote to repeal all laws that have heretofore been passed for that purpose, and in so doing I do not consider that I violate any obligation to which the South was a party. We never plighted our faith for the redemption of the war debt. The people will be borne down with taxes for years to come, even if the war debt is repudiated. It will be the duty of the Government to support the maimed and disabled soldiers, and if the United States Government requires the South to be taxed for the support of Union soldiers we should insist that all disabled soldiers should be maintained by the United States Government, without regard to the side they had taken in the war."

That was the doctrine of the leading Democrat in Virginia, and I say that it is to-day the doctrine of the Democratic party of the country. If they and the rebels can get the control of this Government they will surrender it into the hands of its enemies, and pension the rebel soldiers and their widows at the expense of the great North.

Another distinguished Democrat, Colonel Crockett, of Memphis, Tennessee, says:

"If the Democratic party will sustain the policy of President Johnson, within five years we shall get all under the Government that we fought for outside during the war."

That, sir, is the language of Democrats, and I say it is the key-note to their party campaign. That is what we may expect if they should get into office under this Government. I ask you, sir, will the great loyal people of the North, who sacrificed the lives of five hundred thousand of the very jewels of their households, and who are saddled to-day with the mighty incubus of a public debt of $2,500,000,000, consent to place the ark of the covenant of our fathers in the hands of this party, whose hands are stained with treason, and who, if they come into power, will lay this burden upon the people of this country, to bind them and their children for a generation to come.

Mr. MUNGEN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana. I cannot be interrupted at present.

Mr. MUNGEN. Cannot he? I guess not.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana. There are one or two other points to which I desire to refer. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HUBBARD] made a very remarkable speech the other day, and I was glad to know that he is very frank. He declared in his speech, which seemed to be very highly appreciated by his party friends, that if he had known that this kind of legislation was to be the result of the war, and that these acts of Congress would be passed, he would have shouldered his knapsack and gone over to the other side. I infer from that, Mr. Chairman, that if another rebellion were to come upon the country now, growing out of our endeavors to reconstruct this Government upon a loyal basis, he would be a rebel. Have I a right to infer that? I think I have from what the gentleman said in his speech. And I will say to him that while I have no doubt that he is a brave man, and during the war was, as he says, a loyal man, a large majority of his party were on the other side. They were the first men who fired upon the national flag. They were Democrats who hauled down the national flag in disgrace from the towering battlements of Sumter and raised up in its stead hell's hissing emblem, the serpent. It was the Democracy which swore with a great oath that they would pull down this Government, build by our fathers, and erect another upon its ruins, the corner-stone of which should be slavery. And further than that—while the southern Democrats were in rebellion, armed and bravely meeting the loyal champions of freedom in the North in the conflict of battle and clash of arms, where was the great Democratic party? On which side of the war were they? I propose to read an extract to show where they stood. There never was a victory won by the great Union Army during the war that was eulogized by the Democratic press. There was never a great battle imminent when the prayer of the Democratic party went up for the success of our arms.

Mr. GETZ. The gentleman is certainly in error in making that statement. I know something about the spirit of the Democratic press during the war.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana. I must decline to yield to any interruptions. I propose to show that during the war three hundred thousand members of the Democratic party, who were too cowardly to go on the other side and fight, and too much opposed to the liberties of this country to shoulder their muskets and fight on the loyal side, organized a great conspiracy to overthrow this Government. I have the record of the military commission in the Milliken case, in which it is shown by Democratic testimony that three hundred thousand Democrats took the oath of the "Knights of the Golden Circle." The candidate, having his hand on the Bible, is asked: "Do you believe this to be the word of God, and do you believe the present war now being waged against us to be unconstitutional?" Both being answered in the affirmative, the candidate takes the following oath:

"I promise and swear that I will do all in my power to bring all loyal Democrats into this circle of hosts; and I further promise and swear that I will do all in my power against the present Yankee disunion Administration; so help me God."

There is the oath taken by three hundred thousand Democrats of the great States of the northwest, saying that they will seek to introduce into their reasonable organization all the Democrats they could. They went further than that and plotted to seize the arsenals at Camp Douglas, Camp Chase, and Camp Morton, and let loose twenty-five thousand rebels who had been captured by our troops in the field, and to place in the hands of those rebels the arms thus stolen, in order that they might pillage, burn, murder, and destroy the property and people of the great Northwest. And yet this party now tell us that they were all for the war. I admit that a great many Democrats went into the war, thousands of them, and that they fought nobly. But that loyal element of the Democratic party stands to-day with the great Union party for the preservation of our liberties and the perpetuation of the Constitution. Some few, perhaps, after having won glory and renown in the war for the Union, have gone back and grasped hands with those men so stained with treason, and who denounced them during the war as Lincoln hirelings and Lincoln hounds. Yet it is but another illustration of the old proverb that "The dog has returned to his vomit and the swine that was washed to her wallowing in the mire."

Mr. MUNGEN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana. I decline to yield.

Mr. MUNGEN. Then I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. MUNGEN. My point of order is this: The gentleman was looking in this direction. [Laughter.] I went into the war, and I think I did as much for the Government as he did. Now, I want to ask him this question: [Cries of "Order," "Order."] Does he say that because I now vote the Democratic ticket I am a dog?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. MUNGEN.] The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WILLIAMS] will proceed.

Mr. MUNGEN. That is very nice. Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana. Of course I make no personal reference to any gentleman on the floor of this House; I am speaking generally. I was going on to remark that while these Democrats of the North to the number of three hundred thousand met in dark and secret places to conspire against liberty, there was another portion of them who were not in the war. There was a very large party of them who, when the draft came, shouldered their knapsacks and went to seek protection and security in the dominions of Queen Victoria, and they now come back and ask us to give them the control of the Government.

Sir, history teaches us that Christianity had its Judas; that Rome in her demoralization had her Cataline. But in 1860 the Democratic party had its hundreds and thousands of men who, having enjoyed the protection of our Government, raised their arms against the flag that had protected them.

Restore the Government to the hands of the Democratic party! Why, sir, the proposition is monstrous to contemplate. They ask us to admit back into full fellowship the very rebels who have done their utmost to overturn the Government and who yet have exhibited no sign of repentance or sorrow for their crimes.

Why, sir, the great arch rebel himself, who was expelled from Heaven for his treason, has never asked to be restored to his ancient position without faith or repentance; but Democracy says: "Let rebels come back without either."

Mr. Chairman, leaving this branch of the subject, I now pass on to notice the next great conspirator, the accessory to all this crime against liberty and republican government—I mean the President of the United States. In a speech made at Nashville on the 9th of June, 1864, he uses the following patriotic sentiments:

"And let me say that now is the time to secure these fundamental principles, while the land is rent with anarchy and upheaves with the throes of a mighty revolution. While society is in this disordered state and we are seeking security let us fix the foundation of the Government on principles of eternal justice which will endure for all time."

And again, in the same speech, while his heart was beating responsive with patriotic impulse for the punishment of traitors, he pronounced the punishment due to the men who had raised the parrioidal hand against the Government, as follows:

"If we are so cautious about foreigners, who voluntarily renounce their homes to live with us, what should we say to the traitor who, although born and reared among us, has raised a parrioidal hand against the Government which always protected him? My judgment is that he should be subjected to a severe ordeal before he is restored to citizenship."

Now, sir, what severe ordeal has the President required the traitor to pass through before he restores him to citizenship? None. He simply issues his executive edict and restores them to all the rights of citizenship on the condition that they worship at the shrine of treason and proclaim upon the house-tops that he is the Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the end, of the Constitution—that in him is centered the legislative, judicial, and executive departments of the Government, or, more properly speaking, the Constitution—manifest in the flesh.

But, sir, I pass on to notice some other points. It will be recollected that on the 22d of February, 1866, Andrew Johnson made a speech, in which he indicated the policy he was to pursue during the remainder of his term. What did he say?

"I came into power under the Constitution of the country and with the approbation of the people, and what did I find? I found eight millions of people who were convicted, condemned under the law, and the penalty was death; and, through revenge and resentment, were they all to be annihilated? Oh! may I not exclaim, how different would this be from the example set by the Founder of our holy religion, whose divine arch rests its extremities on the horizon while its span embraces the universe! Yes, He that founded this great scheme came into the world and saw men condemned under the law, and the sentence was death. What was His example? Instead of putting the world or a nation to death He went forth on the cross and testified with His wounds that He would die and let the world live."

Now, Mr. Chairman, if President Johnson could only follow that illustrious example and die speedily I have no doubt the loyal people would feel somewhat easier; for then the wicked would cease from troubling, and the wearied nation for a time would be at rest. But, Mr. Chairman, Christ required two conditions—faith and repentance. The President of the United States, however, requires no repentance. All he asks is faith in this second Moses. I would to God that the Republican party had left him in the Democratic bullrushes long before he reached the presidential chair. But the President now comes in and very modestly says to Congress, "I differ with you in opinion, and I ask you to repeal your acts of reconstruction." He asks us to repeal the very laws by which we are seeking to give to the loyal people of those States republican forms of government.

But the President says that the object of these reconstruction measures is to give the negroes of the South the control of these State governments. Sir, he knows and we all know that in five of these ten States a large majority of the registered voters are white voters, and those States where the white voters preponderate gave the largest majorities in favor of conventions, while in the five States in which the negroes had a majority of the registered voters there was but a small majority in favor of holding conventions. I should like to know from the President how four millions of ignorant and debased slaves, as he claims, are going to rule and control the destinies of thirty millions of the intelligent white race.

But, sir, I am done with the President. The Democratic party have lately adopted him and taken him into full fellowship and communion into their church. On the 8th of January the Democratic party of my own State passed a glowing tribute and eulogy to his treachery to freedom. I am glad he has found a home; that where Democracy is there he may be also.

The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. SINGMASTER] has told us this morning that this great Republican party is going to ruin the country. Now, I ask any honest, candid man what has Democracy ever done for this land? It was Democracy that made war upon the Constitution and the Government; it was Democracy that carried on the war and northern Democracy that protracted it so as to fasten upon this people $2,500,000,000 of national debt, to be a tax for all time to come upon the property of our children; it was Democracy that declared you could not conquer these rebels at the South; it was Democracy that told us that ten millions of the Anglo-Saxon race, bone of our bone and blood of our blood, never could be subjugated. Our loyal soldiers said that they would put down the rebellion, and they did put it down, with the fire of rebels in front and the fire of cowardly Democrats in the rear; and when this great pacific policy of reconstruction shall have been carried out we will have the noblest, the freest, and the most powerful Government on the face of the earth, and our children will rise up and call us blessed.

What has radicalism done? It was radicalism that furnished the men and money to carry on the war; it was radicalism that built the proudest navy that floats upon the waters of the earth; it was radicalism that carried on this great war and put down the rebellion; it is radicalism, the great progressive civilization of the age, that is to-day building the Pacific railroad, the great iron artery of commerce that connects the two oceans, and in less than two years more, under this great progressive radical policy, you will see the brazen steed, as he climbs the towering summits of the Rocky mountains, conveying to the great commercial metropolis of the East the products of the mines of the Pacific and carrying back the work of the artists and mechanics of the great North. Radicalism will yet nail upon the top of that great ice column of Alaska the flag of the American Union. It is radicalism that is establishing in the revolted provinces in the South, desolated by war, the school-house where the slave-pen stood, and which will, under the productive energies of free labor, make that great country, what God designed it to be, the Eden of the American Union.

Talk about radicalism! Sir, the people of this country will hold the Democracy to the dark, damning, black record they made during the war, and Democratic orators will find no welcome response from the people to the idle acclamation that the Republican party are disfranchising the white man to place the negro in supremacy. Such appeal to the passion and prejudice of the ignorant and degraded may win to them a few votes. But the intelligent and virtuous will stand by the integrity of the Union party, who are true to the pulsations of liberty. The Democracy say: "Oh, wipe it out; do not bring up that record against us now." Sir, I will tell you when the American people will wipe out that record. When the Democracy shall go down to Andersonville and galvanize into life the sixteen thousand loyal men that were there starved to death by rebel cruelty and restore them to their mothers, their wives, and their children; when they shall go up to Arlington Heights, once owned by the traitor Lee, and call up from their graves the thousands of brave men who sleep there and give them back to the country; when they shall go to the tomb of the immortal Lincoln, upon whose grave the tears of a nation were shed, and restore him to life, and wipe off the bloody winding-sheet of the assassin from his brow, and place him in the chair now dishonored by a vile usurper of the Constitution of his country, and pay off the debt they have made by giving aid and comfort to the rebellion; it will then be time enough to seal up the book that contains their history.

Mr. Chairman, while we sit here in the Council Chamber of the nation and hear the voice of the people saying to us, "Stand by the integrity of the Government; stand by the great principle of liberty," we hear, also, whispers coming from the graves of three hundred thousand patriots, martyrs for liberty, saying, "Do not dishonor the brave who fell in defense of their country's flag." When the hosts of freedom shall marshal their battalions for the approaching political struggle Democratic politicians may well exclaim, "Oh, that we had the wings of the morning, that we might fly to the uttermost parts of the earth," where no radical shall disturb the repose of our ignoble remains.

Mr. Chairman, I have great faith in the future of the Republic. I am one of those who believe there is a Providence that controls it. I believe the same great right arm that enabled Washington to wrest the sword from the hand of Britain's chieftain and nerved the arm of the gallant Meade with our patriot soldiers to place the crowning cap of victory on the smoking summit of Gettysburg, will still preserve a party faithful to liberty, justice, and humanity.

"Liberty crushed to earth shall rise again:
The eternal years of God are hers;
But treason, wounded, writhes with pain,
And dies among his worshippers."

Contraction of the Currency.

SPEECH OF HON. WILLIAM SPRAGUE, OF RHODE ISLAND,
IN THE UNITED STATES SENATE,
January 15, 1868.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, having under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 213) to suspend further reduction of the currency—

Mr. SPRAGUE said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: I have a great interest in the principles involved in this bill, but little interest in the bill itself. It is a temporary measure, and essentially deceptive. If the receipts going into your Treasury are greater than your expenditures to the extent of the deficiency, contraction continues. As the $46,000,000 compound-interest notes fall due, the last in October, contraction to that extent continues, less, perhaps, $20,000,000 three per cents. heretofore authorized yet unsold, provided Government can make sales of them, but which, in the present condition of trade and finance, I doubt its ability to do. I wish the Senate realized as I do the exact condition of the disturbed condition of the people's interests. It is no flimsy or temporary difficulty, that without congressional action will speedily pass away; and the important question, what is the real difficulty and what is its cure, must now be answered. In the wise disposal of the currency much will depend of our measure of prosperity or adversity. Matters of taxation and expenditure must be adjusted to the lowest sum compatible with our obligations, and the strictest economical administration of public affairs. The power to increase the currency up to the requirements of the Government and the demands of business is indispensable. By it we may yet save our remaining resources, and through it arrive at a more speedy resumption of specie payments. You cannot, however, expand your currency through increased issues of Treasury notes. These notes to-day are, as I will show, the great enemy of resumption.

Contraction of Treasury notes reduces the means of general speculation. The evil of contraction here is that it is capital that is reduced, when it costs so much to procure it. Treasury notes of themselves have no life, and must be forced to be active. There must be an attraction to the source of issue for currency to benefit trade or industry; for no issue can arrive at this condition unless by the instrumentality of the people, and then only through their industries. One dollar of active currency is better than five dollars or even any larger sum that, from its nature or otherwise, is inactive. An active currency spreads throughout and is beneficial to whole communities. An inactive currency benefits the one only who uses it as an operating power; and not that one unless his use of it bring profit to himself. One has constant life-giving properties, the other exhausts itself after the first operation. The real object of currency is to represent capital, and to promote movement among material things. The capital represented is not gold exclusively, but gold if you have it, and houses, barns, factories, public improvements, or national possessions. It is peculiarly an American necessity when we consider that we have more property and less money. That is, capital in the form of property and not in the form of money. By means of currency, or capital represented by paper, we are to bring our capital in property equal to other peoples' capital in money. By means so simple and safe we are to secure a representative of our capital, which is the presence of capital itself, and by which we will be able to build more houses and factories, clear more farms, and thus continue to give employment to labor. If, like greenbacks, with no return power and no life, and tending to centralization, it has no value as a currency or a representative of capital. It is capital itself, the same as houses and lands are capital. We try to create a distinction between Treasury notes and five-twenty, ten-forty, and other interest-paying securities, by classing the first as currency, the other as property. There is no such distinction, in fact; all are property; and the difference is, one pays no income to the holder, while the others do. In my judgment you may issue a million Treasury notes to-day, and sell them in our market without Government or people deriving but a temporary relief. In fact, the issue becoming property a surplus and an overstock would reduce its value, and through it the value of every other public or private security; besides, it is the poorest kind of property. You cannot get an income from it so long as you hold it; hence you are tempted constantly to speculation to obtain that which you cannot obtain without. Like chaff in a bed, every stir up sets it floating in the air, to settle again lifeless and useless. Not so a currency performing its legitimate office of an active and distributive circulation. This I cannot easily place my hands on; the other I can buy. I then operate with it as rapidly as possible, otherwise, and as long as I hold it, I lose interest on my money. The seller feels as I do. He also makes an effort to relieve himself of them, and everybody avoids holding Treasury notes.

Concentration takes place when they are again brought into operation, where the chances favor profitable returns. Pay off, if you will, your national debt in greenbacks. Let the present holders of your securities take your issues. He will hold them so long and no longer than to turn them into interest-bearing securities or property. Whose securities or property? The people's property, of course—yours and mine; because it is only here in this country that the issues would pass at all. Here, then, we have a measure that is advocated in the interest of the people that first takes their property, through which a living was procured, and leaves with them a property that pays nothing.

How long, I ask, would a property retain its value, or any value, that pays no income and which nobody wants? If such a measure was proposed by a tyrant the outrage would appear plain to all, as it is advocated in the interest of the people, and though their property is to be the sacrifice the deceitfulness of the proposition is not discovered.

Here, again, the people are true to themselves; they seek relief from impending servitude; they accept the defense that appears best, seek the same object through a cheaper and safer method, more honorable and certain of success.

The people, through their industries, is the only power that can promote general distribution of capital or its representative currency. When, from the prostration of those industries, the power ceases to act, concentration of capital prevails, then speculation begins. This is the condition of your monetary affairs to-day. When there is insufficient capital, or when it is scattered as ours is, money if generally distributed becomes cheap. When general distribution prevails, outside calls for capital become of course less and less frequent. In proportion to this decrease more and more favorable propositions are made from those who command capital to those who employ it. This comes in form of lower rates of interest and less valuable securities. This, for the time being, gives money to a whole country at a lower rate of interest on the principle of the action of a tiller. Its slightest motion changes the course of the largest vessel. How important, therefore, for the whole country, to wisely and firmly control in the people's interest this sensitive and controlling point.

The absence among the people of this distributive machinery and the neglect of Government to concentrate its scattered resources and to operate them in its own defense, is one of the real causes of our present difficulties. The banker, the broker, and the operator will not give this counsel, for if such should prevail his occupation is gone. Hence, from the beginning until now, he has given the opposite and false direction to your monetary affairs. The absence of distribution, which is the character of the greenbacks, renders resumption of specie payment through their agency clearly impossible. Your determination to resume it at a stated time would bring the whole issue upon you for gold payment, because it is a commodity waiting purchase and in any sums. Here, at just this point the Treasury policy has rested all its hopes of resumption to be utterly and irretrievably blasted, and carrying down with those fond hopes most of the people's industries.

The circulation that has been most useful to this or any country, in my judgment, is that which rests on property. It is steadier and less liable to fluctuation than coin. If coin, you are liable to lose it in the process of trade, and again it accumulates. The accepted opinion favors coin. The currency as well as the capital that has built up and sustained the industries of my State has had no coin as a basis for its solvency. The currency came from banks having for capital the obligation of the people, property-owners, in form of notes, acceptances, drafts, and the like. These banks were but departments of the industries of the State, tributary to, dependent on, and useful only as they promoted those interests. Few of those interests would have had being except through the agency of these institutions. There never was more than one to two per cent. of coin in their vaults. I have come to this conclusion: that gold, as a basis of currency, is as the middleman to the trade of a country, exacts tribute, increases cost to the consumer, but adds no value or safety for the cost. While it is idle interest is lost, and that is the people's loss. Besides, you employ two representative mediums. This is false economy. The gold may be stolen. It certainly fluctuates. Property—or its paper representative, in the form of notes, &c., of the people—is not so easy to take to itself wings and to fly away.

Currency is to capital in banks what banks are to property, the industrial interests and the trade of a people—the motive power; and, like all those powers—steam or water for instance—when acting under direction and control, is performing wonders unknown and unthought of in past ages; but when that direction and control are lost there is a common ruin for all. Let financiers pause here and consider. The assertion that the bank issues of Great Britain are all based on coin is an error. The Bank of England alone issues one hundred million of our values on property other than coin, and so, also, is the case with her other banks. Besides, and in addition, every deposit of coin calls for a corresponding issue in paper. I would not speak of this point as a defect did I imagine my words would influence a change. I hope through this very defect my country will one day command the money market of the world, as you will presently see how unsafe and crude it is to place your reliance on gold.

When, through the process of trade, the drain of gold is into England these issues commence and continue as the drain continues, producing an increasing ease on the market when the market is, perhaps, perfectly easy. On the other hand, the drain is out, the issues are at once called in, no matter how occupied, and a scarcity calls for still greater scarcity. If the drain continues long enough every pound goes out and every issue is canceled, and the public must break, unless through the action of Government additional issues are authorized and gold purchased. As an illustration, a few months since a condition of things existed as I have stated. The people of England were on the eve of general bankruptcy. New issues were authorized and gold was purchased by the bank of the Treasury of the United States at thirty per cent. Thus England was saved by the gold in our Treasury, as the suddenness of the difficulty gave no time to purchase elsewhere; and as a reward for our magnanimity she forced gold up on us to fifty per cent. not a week after. Who, I ask, counseled this blunder? We, saving from failure our greatest rival, and the depreciation of our securities, and at a cost of twenty per cent. in gold. Bear in mind just here that I condemn our policy with but one view, and that is to inaugurate a new policy that will save our people, so they may have heart to continue the great work God has called them to perform.

SENATE.

Contraction of the Currency—Mr. Sprague.

So long, therefore, as our intimate monetary relations exist with Great Britain we shall be controlled by their ruinous gold system, and suffer when they suffer. Every interest throughout the world is unsettled through its shifting character. We are still asked to rest our currency on coin where it never has been done and never can be done. Do not forget that currency has but a representative value and a motive power, and that it cannot represent a security at par when that security is below par. The financiers' clamor for payment of all our securities in gold at par is a paramount cause of our present prostration, because it prevents a safe and easy method of creating capital, the collecting of our resources, and issuing thereon a representative, which otherwise is lost to us as capital. We shall begin to learn something when we can understand that a nation, like an individual, must fail if without capital it attempts to compete with one that has an abundance. Unless, therefore, you act upon the idea of resorting to the power to create and collect, and the will to employ your capital in protecting your own and the people's interests, the business prostration of 1887, 1847, 1857, and 1861 will have no parallel in that which is before us. Perhaps it is my fortune to understand more directly from those who now suffer or from those who know of sufferings in the country than those about me. I am not myself influenced by panics. I feel calmer always when the disaster is upon us than in its anticipation; but, as I have contemplated this question, I am astonished that business has held up as long as it has. Now, if there are any who read my words let them pause in their operations and await a change, for if that change does not take place the longer you go on the more difficult it will be to extricate yourself in the end. We may not have a violent and sharp prostration, but, like the sinking of a foundering ship, none the less certain or disastrous. Its violence may pass away to-day, but you cannot escape the effect of the exhausting process, through the constant drain of your securities, public and private, that meets you at every turn.

I do not contemplate the question of finance from any one interest point of view. No one here can charge me with this; my wish is that the manufacturer shall have such facilities and profits only as will enable him to devote his whole time and ability to the perfection of his production. I ask for him nothing that will tempt him into other channels of occupation. So of commerce, agriculture, trade, and the professions. Such, sir, in times gone by has not been the condition of our industrial interests. These have failed in consequence of the skill that should have been devoted to the perfection of production being forced into, and almost exclusively devoted to procuring capital for those operations, leaving to unskilled hands and unlettered heads the perfection of the interest itself; we thus bore failure on the face of all our efforts.

Does Government succeed in the object of its establishment when it fails to afford to the people reasonable protection to their industries? No, sir, I want no more quackery to procure a healthy restoration of our finances, either through financiers, manufacturers, traders, demagogues, and the like. I want a skillful physician who will carefully consider the disease, and, in lieu of remedies applied to the irritated and diseased parts, which at best but adds irritation to irritation, will furnish soothing remedies and careful nursing, then strengthen the healthy parts, to enable nature to work on and itself expel the parts diseased, or an abandonment once and for all time of the false practice of forced resumption, and give life and strength to all your industries—absolute abandonment of the curative processes that kill your patient. In other words, I want a statesman who will cut off the hacks who have given counsel to our injury and to their own increase; and, while looking for commissions and exchanges, pray God to save the country and the cause, when they know, or ought to know, that they are its real impediments.

The two great objects is to place our debt at home among our own people, and to place it at a low rate of interest amid unusual plenty of money, notwithstanding your Treasury and your committee have other views. The rates of interest and taxes for your business operations following those established for Government, will thus enable me to carry every American product into the markets of the world and to compete successfully. With the present extraordinary rates I must at no distant day abandon even the home market, notwithstanding your tariff. The law of force has been entirely overlooked in our management of finances.

When attacked by hostile Powers we organize armies and oppose force to force, or surrender. At this moment from every quarter comes up hostile attack against your finances to procure your securities at the least possible cost. To meet this force you have first scattered your own, then permitted yourself to be besieged in your main works, leaving your scattered hands to be cut up in detail, and your country laid open to his ravages and plundering expeditions. In other words, you have withheld your means, which otherwise would have enabled your people to have held on to their own property, to have defended the Treasury, and kept the national debt at home. You established no point on which the people could rally, either to assist you or protect themselves. You studiously and angrily withheld every assistance, and when you surrendered you prostrated and humiliated them. These charges are severe. Contradict them he who can. What would be thought of any other Government that acted thus toward its people?

Again, to my mind your present position may be likened to a lion caught in a net and the time for the approach of the hunters drawing near. A mouse can release him. Who has the courage to approach and extend that relief in our case. Our securities are buffeted about by the poorest and the meanest among us, as well as the richest and most honorable, who possess or can borrow, beg, or steal a dollar with which to operate upon them. No one has yet seen a well-directed blow given in defense either of Government or people's securities, but all have witnessed their utter abandonment.

When England in 1694 established her bank (Bank of England) her debt was owned abroad, selling fifty per cent. below par, with interest at from fifteen to twenty per cent., the Government and people of course growing poorer every day. Bankers, brokers, financiers, merchants, and all who represented fixed interest, including the Tory, the then opposition party, exhibited the bitterest hostility, sarcasm, ridicule, and venom in opposing its establishment. The necessities of the people demanded its existence, and it has existed from that day to this. How similar is our position regarding our finance, and as to our attempt to establish a similar system. Who but those just named would be in the Opposition? Now, as to the result. In less than sixty years England's debt was at par, bearing but three per cent. interest, and all held by her people. All this took place during years of exhausting war and civil commotion. Then a second or third rate Power, having but insignificant resources, limited population, large debt, appreciating the resources of the people and exhibiting the ability to organize them, did establish and maintain a mammoth system of industrial interests, enormous Government enterprises, and succeeded also in commanding the money and the markets of the world. How long, in face of these facts, will our people pay fifteen per cent. interest and be content with a thirty per cent. depreciation, and increasing in that direction daily?

It is interesting to observe the political effect by the bank's operation. Through the creation of varied industries a wealthy and an intelligent middle class, laborers of numerous grades, and their employers, has sprung up from out of the poor and depressed tenantry, and who are now about to assume control of England's future destiny. This aristocratic privileges of a thousand years' standing will give way before the resources of the people when organized in the people's interest. The absence of this controlling and directing influence has given rise in this country to your Vanderbilts, Astors, Cooks, Jeromes, and Stewarts, who, possessing the monopoly of capital, compel every interest to pay them tribute. The people of England checkmated their aristocracy and will subdue it in thus creating a power superior to it. I would perform at this time a like service for the people of this country.

The Secretary of the Treasury holds power given him by our acts, which if granted under the recommendation of an English king, and if used as our Secretary has used his, would cost the king his crown, the Cabinet their portfolios, and Parliament their seats. What sense is there in our reluctance to confer power to organize the means of our people while we continue an enormous trust in irresponsible hands without a restriction or reservation? We cannot control or remove the Secretary. What reason for any complaints against him when he but executes our acts. I am not here to point out the features even of the measures I would ingraft on your financial system. It is not my business, except to present the case to you exactly as it is. It is the business of your committee to act. It is for every Senator to become familiar with its general features. But that which is in greater demand than any other thing is for a statesman to have the courage to advocate any new plan. Timid men may hesitate. The opposing elements are big with hostile power, and Senators about me look at innovations with suspicion. I know the great humiliation that awaits on a change of your policy; but are not the people deserving even of our humiliation? Remember a suffering country, ready to take the character of an indignant people, awaits our action. Again, the absence of an organized system to control and direct our resources has this year cost $100,000,000 on the cotton crop alone. England's organization depressed our money market and compelled us to part with our crop for half its value. She has operated thus many times in my remembrance. Shall we continue to scatter our resources so as to always fall an easy prey to her and her capitalist operations? It is estimated the people of this country have lost otherwise $1,500,000,000 from the operations of capital on our weak condition, brought on by our own neglect of the simplest principle of self-preservation. Why not have financial protection as protection to home industry? On the same grounds I advocate protection to one as the other, and capitalist in England can appreciate all that this means. In fact, protection to our finances is primary to home industries, as without a favorable and healthy state of the first the other languishes and dies.

Our national debt is sacred to every loyal heart. What a feeling response comes up from every holder, foreign and domestic! It has, indeed, performed a sacred work. We are mindful of the means that obtained such ends. You that hold it now did not furnish us the means in our great extremities. The loyal people did that work. You have so depressed our market, reduced the value of our property, that we have been compelled to part with the debt we held for one half its value. I suppose your king or queen looks upon a debt created to perpetuate their power as sacred, that they may create a new one for the same purpose. A people whose debt has worked out great principles and secured as large possessions as ours has, is revered as means to an end. If, however, we are in danger of losing that which caused the creation of the debt, what then?

We love our guns when in our possession and doing good work against the enemy; but when he captures them and turns them on us, what then? Who would not lead an attack, and such a one as might be necessary, to recapture them?

Our Treasury has played into the hands of those who have depressed our market and depreciated our securities by acting in the interest of banks, bankers, and the like, and our national banks, willingly or otherwise, have followed in the train. We pay on capital national banks say twelve to fifteen per cent. in this wise: Government pays interest on bonds deposited eight and one half per cent., and people purchase the circulation at a rate of interest which would amount to seven per cent. On a similar amount we pay, perhaps, eight and a half per cent. The people lose interest on greenbacks, which is the same as if they paid the interest. These rates obliged the people to pay higher rates, as Government securities will be held by capitalists at less rate than the people's obligations. We cannot carry our debt, private and public, at less than ten per cent.; it may reach twelve per cent. We may rest just here for an answer as to why is the drain of our gold and securities to Europe? The people and Government owe five billions. The interest is from five to six hundred millions. Money comes from the cheapest market. London loans at one and a half per cent. Cut the sum down as much as you may, then add the cost of our purchases and expenditures otherwise, and the startling sum must confound the most thoughtless. Is not a protective measure necessary here?

Let us examine a moment as to the $100,000,000 gold in your Treasury. This property is available to the purchaser, as has been shown. Will anybody deny that the locking up of this sum has not cost the people its best securities. For the want of capital we have been forced to sell our securities, and that want has been created by our Treasury. As our wants continue we are subject still more to the screw, until we are screwed out of property, hope, and life by the criminal process. What can we do with gold? Certainly not to pay interest. Current receipts will meet all such demands; if not, can we not borrow on our expected receipts, as all nations have done before us? No, it is not that; we have piled it up to resume through its agency, when resumption is as far off as the north pole is from the south. No one will deny, then, that the $134,000,000 now hoarded in your Treasury has compelled the business of the country to pay an increased rate for money, for when capital is drawn from a distance to meet a demand it always receives increased compensation, and the process has, of course, compelled many interests to do without money, as it had not the credit to procure the means from abroad. The doing-without process is failure to all such. Has not the retention of gold out of the market carried up its price and put resumption afar off, as you would not be quite so weak as to think of resumption when so largely depreciated, and you cannot hope to bring greenbacks to par by hoarding gold, for it is clear the opposite result is produced; and, besides, it ruins your business, for it is only when your business is prosperous can you expect to resume.

Thus the Treasury policy has caused a scarcity of capital and money, depreciated securities by its operations in gold in increasing its value and causing its drain. Therefore the charge I make is, the Government has become the most extensive speculator in gold and also the greatest depreciator of its own securities. You have also left national bank reserves in hands of operators on your securities, and again created a scarcity of money. You have also before hoarding scattered your incoming receipts and made them available to the banker, and again created a scarcity by its withdrawal from the people without redistribution.

Thus a loyal people have been sacrificed by a loyal representation under a mistaken policy and on a mere theory. We have placed our honor at the disposal of the usurer, and have met the fate we might have expected. It is, of course, too late to prevent the wounds; many have died through them. Hundreds are nigh unto death, and all are demoralized. We must not longer stand idly by and permit this thing, having the power to prevent it. We must act now without a moment's delay.

Nowhere have we been more culpable than to have gone on so long neglecting to obtain the coöperation of the people by a proper use of their resources, which for their own safety they would have loaned you, and especially when the war on finance is more extensive and more bitter than the battles of armies; single-handed you have attempted to stand against a world banded against you. To save you an appeal must be made to the people, and they will extricate you as they did from your exhausting war. Let the rallying point be a financial point; around it create strength in capital; concentrate it, and make it available to act at all times promptly in the people's interests. When a position of strength is once taken the cowardly hordes that have shackled you will drop away in mortification and chagrin. How will this be done? Do the easiest thing. Establish a capital of $134,000,000; take the stock for the Government; then sell it to the people; receive your national bank deposits, your bank reserves, the deposits of the people, your taxes and income from all sources, and pay out no funds to lay in any one's hands one day longer than the necessity of the case demands; loan all to the people; issue circulation on your capital and on deposits, or on any other property you choose; and if you will not loan it all direct to the people let your national banks furnish you paper with their indorsements; especially pay a stated sum to the institution for the work it does for the Government, either for paying interest on your obligations or in paying your other indebtedness, whether in securing you a new loan or one more favorable. The corruptive influence growing out of commissions for financial service has been ruinous in the extreme; for besides the speculation and monopoly of the business it has promoted, it has prevented any other financial plan from being adopted than one that would perform the same service to the managers that the old plan had performed.

By this simple process you deprive money operators of the use of your money and make it available for the general public interests, and you produce an easy money market that will stop the drain and aid your specie payment in a way that you will become indifferent whether you pay specie or not. What do you care about specie payment when your securities are at par? This is the one great point to be obtained. Certainly depreciating the value of the property of the people will not appreciate the value of Government securities. The contrary is the fact.

When you will send a ship to sea without a rudder, manage your finances without a head to direct them, or, if you please, continue to manage as you have for the past three years.

A word here as to forced resumption of specie payments. Certainly we have had the scare constantly before us in the form of $100,000,000 gold in the Treasury.

We have gone on with the idea that a sleight-of-hand movement, without the coöperation of the people, was to produce the desired result.

Have you added anything anywhere else in form of property through a prosperous trade or employment and profit on the people's labor? Nothing, as the thirty per cent. depreciation of our property and the high rate of interest show. When England first proposed resumption her securities were very near par and every business interest prosperous. Can you do better than to imitate her policy?

Mr. President, we are told that it is a confidence that is required to carry us safely through our dilemma. Yes; but must not that confidence have a foundation of real property and values for its support? Can you cheat the people into paying specie on a mere sentiment—for it is the people only who are to pay specie in the end, not Government or banks, not they—until the people's property has appreciated to a gold value? It is constantly instanced that in the height of panics in England the moment it is determined to increase issues of bills panic ceases, because confidence is restored. How fallacious is this doctrine!

Here is a question of superior force operating on an inferior one. The weaker force, those whose fears kept back their means, are forced out of their position by a desire to be first to avail themselves of advantageous investments, fearing the others would thus act if they did not. The protection that the presence of superior force gives, acted on the people in promoting a closer union when before an abandonment of the field was clearly imminent. These results were many times obtained with no additional issues or increase of capital. Finances are, therefore, in my judgment, but questions of force. If superior, and handled with energy and skill, you conquer. It is such a force I desire to bring into our finances, and at the same time to crush out the small quaker force we have heretofore supported in our Treasury. For, during the past three years, it has been a contest of opposing forces, as much as that of the Union and rebel armies during the war. In that contest our first experience was defeat, as has been the case as to our finances. We then brought an additional and a discarded element into the field, and only through its means conquered.

We may hesitate. Hesitation is constant and disgraceful financial defeat. In the end we will accept the discarded and unpopular national bank, and with its aid conquer. But in this I do not mean to institute a power I cannot control or which will work otherwise than in the interest of the Government, because the Government's interest has become the people's interest.

Mr. President, I have been surprised to see how we have avoided the precedents of the past by the effort to work out a new system of finance, Government debt, and taxation. The only explanation is that those who are accumulating fortunes by the commission obtained in exchanging a seven-thirty for a five-twenty bond, and the use of your securities pending sales and the deposits afterwards, have now the control of your finances. This is, I believe, the wise and comprehensive plan now before the country. The plan I urge is no new one; not one that has failed of its object, but one that is triumphant; one that has given liberty and prosperity to a great people. I believe, in conclusion, it is wisest to rely on the integrity of the people, and to believe that their impulses are right. Had we so acted we should have sent our soldiers home to profitable employment with less burden to the people. The people cannot, however, blame their representatives, unless blame is to follow failure, no matter how brought about. Their representatives desired to act in your interest, and they thought they were carrying out your views. Remember, first, last, and all the time, that rebellion is the first cause of our troubles, and also that political restoration of the southern States is very far from obtaining material prosperity for the country.

HO. OF REPS.

Reconstruction and the Supreme Court—Mr. Stone.

40TH CONG....2D SESS.

Reconstruction and the Supreme Court.

SPEECH OF HON. F. STONE,

OF MARYLAND,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 25, 1868.

The House being in the Committee of the Whole, on the state of the Union on the President's annual message—

Mr. STONE said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: Nothing but an imperative sense of the duty I owe to my constituents causes me to trouble the House to-day. The extraordinary character of the legislation of the past ten days makes it, in my opinion, the duty of every Representative of the people on this floor to express, both to the House and to the country, his views upon the recent action of this body. I propose, therefore, to express some views upon the two recent acts that have passed this branch of Congress, namely, the bill in relation to the Supreme Court and the reconstruction bill.

The first of these is a measure not designed to be temporary in its operation. It is to operate not for a few months, nor even a few years, but is designed to be the law of this country for all time. No such excuse as is held up to the country for passing the reconstruction act applies to this. It professes to be a measure that shall operate as long as this Government shall last, or at least as long as that august tribunal at which it is aimed shall exist. Although I cannot hope to influence one single man of the majority of this House, yet I feel it my duty in behalf of those I represent to enter their most solemn protest against both these measures, so destructive of all the cardinal principles of our Government, and so cruelly oppressive of the people who have no voice in these Halls.

There has been introduced into this House in the shape of an amendment to a Senate bill—introduced after the hour of noon and passed by this House before the set of sun—a bill which may be properly named and characterized as a bill to destroy the powers of the Supreme Court, given to it by the Constitution, and which vests this House with all the powers that the framers of that instrument had given to that august tribunal. Two hours only were deemed sufficient to destroy what it took the Convention of 1789 months of anxious deliberation to perfect—the judiciary of the United States. If this bill becomes the law of the land it at once destroys a coördinate branch of this Government, and renders the Supreme Court of the United States as powerless as if they sat there statues clothed in their judicial robes, instead of living and breathing men.

What does that bill propose? It declares that a question of the validity of an act of Congress shall not be decided adversely to such validity except by the judgments of two thirds of the court. The Supreme Court of the United States, a coördinate branch of the Government, is created by the Constitution, which says "the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court," &c. By the Constitution the Supreme Court, then, was made a coördinate branch of this Government of equal dignity with the legislative and executive branches. What did the framers of the Constitution mean by the words "Supreme Court?" When we know the meaning attached to them in 1789, has the legislative department of this Government now a right to change that plain meaning of the words used in the Constitution of the United States? Have they a right thus practically to abolish that instrument by declaring that words which its framers well knew the meaning of, and the meaning of which had been known for centuries, shall now have a different meaning? If they have there is an end to the Constitution, and Congress is the supreme power of the Government—it is legislative, executive, and judicial, and there is no hope of national liberty regulated by law in this great Republic. What, then, is the meaning of and the powers necessarily included in the words "Supreme Court?" For seven hundred years, in the courts of Westminster Hall and wherever the English language—the language in which our Constitution is written—has been spoken or written the word "court" has concluded and meant the power of decision by a majority of the bench.

When the Convention said there should be a "Supreme Court" did they not mean and include all the powers that had been so universally included in the word court? I challenge the gentlemen upon the other side who supported this bill reported from the Judiciary Committee to show me where, not in England only, but upon the whole continent of Europe, that word in any nation has ever been used to express a different meaning from that, a body of men the majority of whom have a right to decide. Thus the framers of our Constitution used it, and thus it has ever been used. And now, at this time, the Congress of the United States claims the right to take away from the majority of that court a right to decide upon the life, liberty, and property of the citizen, and in some cases to give it to the minority. If this Congress can say that the Supreme Court shall not give a judgment unless two thirds agree, have they not equal power to say that one third shall be sufficient? Do they not in fact say by this bill that in a certain class of cases a minority of that tribunal shall decide? It is but one step more for Congress to say how the court shall decide every question. If they say that two thirds shall be necessary to decide against the validity of acts of Congress, they say in effect that a minority of the court shall have a right to decide in favor of such acts; as this bill requires two to one of the judges to declare an act void on constitutional grounds, the conclusion is irresistible that Congress considers its own acts just twice as binding as the Constitution, and they, having come to that conclusion, wish the judiciary also to adopt that view.

But, supposing the bill to be ever so constitutional, it presents a strange anomaly. The Supreme Court now consists of eight; and by an act of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, in the course of time, will consist only of seven judges. Of those seven judges it will require five to declare an act of Congress invalid; three of the seven may declare it to be valid, and however clear, however plain the law may be against both the spirit and the letter of the Constitution, three out of the seven judges can give it validity under this bill. And when that contingency occurs a man who goes into that court claiming his rights under the Constitution, signed by George Washington, will lose his case, although he may have four of the seven judges in his favor; while the man who goes into that court with a claim under an act of Congress, signed by the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House, will gain his cause if he has in his favor only three out of the seven judges.

Mr. WOODWARD. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. STONE. Certainly.

Mr. WOODWARD. I agree that my question is rather for the other side of the House than for the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. STONE.] I desire, however, to ask him this question, in this connection, in the case which he supposes of four judges who are of the opinion that an act of Congress is unconstitutional: if they direct their clerk, who is but the creature of the majority of the judges, to enter that judgment on their record, I want to know where there is any power to review or amend that decision?

Mr. STONE. Nowhere, sir. I am thankful to the gentleman for the interruption. There is no such power anywhere, so long, at least, as the Constitution exists which was signed by George Washington. There exists nowhere in this Government any such power; and from that decision there rests no appeal on this earth; and I am glad there is no such appeal. Thank God, that court, in the past, and I hope in the future, mindful of its high duty, stands between the people and their oppressors, between national liberty regulated by law and absolute, uncontrolled despotism. Nowhere does there exist the power of appeal.

I have referred to this to show how unconstitutional, how void, how idle it is for this House, assembled, as it is, under and by virtue of the Constitution, claiming and exercising powers by virtue of the Constitution, to pretend to say that they can by their breath cast down in the dust a coördinate branch of the Government established by the people, upheld by the people, and which has stood by the people and the people's rights.

Sir, you may pass this law. We have each and all of us sworn to support the Constitution. The judges of that august tribunal have done the same. And there is no power in this House or in the Executive to declare of that court, as long as the court exists, that the powers it derives from that Constitution can be overridden and utterly destroyed by this House.

But that bill is not the only one which within the last ten days has been aimed at the independence and the efficiency of the judicial department of the United States. A bill, I think, misnamed "the reconstruction bill," has been introduced into and passed by this House, declaring that the existence of certain States of this Union shall not be recognized by the judicial power and authority of the United States. Sir, this is the first time in the whole history of this Government that the legislative branch of the Government has ever attempted to say in advance what shall be the decision of the judicial department of the Government. This is the first time that the Congress of the United States has ever said, through a solemn legislative enactment, to the Supreme Court of the United States, "Close your ears to every appeal made to you by a citizen of the United States; we say to you that you shall not hear any such appeal; we, a coördinate branch of the Government, say to you that you shall hear no cry for relief that comes up from any of the millions of people in ten States of this Union." The very first section of that bill says that the existence of those States shall not be recognized by the executive or judicial departments of this Government.

Since the time that the great charter, which for ten centuries has been the boast and the pride of every man who speaks the English language, was extorted from King John, where is there to be found any example of such legislation? The Congress says, "Be deaf; close your ears; we are not content with exercising all the vast powers which the Constitution gives us to enact laws, but we step beyond that and say to the whole nine million people in these ten States that the Supreme Court shall not hear their cry. Your lives, your liberties, your property may be in danger and in jeopardy; but you must address your prayers to God, for man shall not hear you."

Is not this so? I have heard again and again much declamation in regard to "equal rights," "human rights," and "eternal principles of justice;" but I have never heard one argument to show why it was declared in that bill that men over whom this free and great Government claims jurisdiction, for whom it claims to legislate, should not be heard when appealing to a great coördinate branch of this Government. If the bill was right, if it was founded upon constitutional power, if it was founded upon the "eternal principles" of which gentlemen on the other side are perpetually talking, then, in the name of the great God who rules us all, why close the doors of the Supreme Reconstruction and the Supreme Court—Mr. Stone.

HO. OF REPS.

Court against the presentation of such a question? Why say that the court should never hear the cause?

To those gentlemen on the other side who seem to think an act of Congress more sacred than our Constitution, I beg leave to refer to the language of Alexander Hamilton, speaking of the judicial power of the United States in the seventy-eighth number of the Federalist:

"There is no position which depends on clearer principles than that every act of a delegated authority contrary to the tenor of the commission under which it is exercised is void. No legislative act, therefore, contrary to the Constitution, can be valid. To deny this would be to affirm that the deputy is greater than his principal; that the servant is above his master; that the Representatives of the people are superior to the people themselves; that men acting by virtue of powers may do not only what their powers do not authorize but what they forbid."

Within the brief period to which I have alluded another measure has also been passed by this House. It is a bill declaring, among other things, that ten States of this Union have not governments republican in form. Sir, the Constitution of the United States at the time of its adoption left to the people of the States the right to fix the elective franchise. Nothing on earth, I presume, is clearer than this proposition. The States at the time of the adoption of the Constitution had prescribed different rules with regard to the exercise of the elective franchise. Some of them had a property qualification, some had not. The Constitution wisely left it to the States themselves to say what should be the qualifications of electors. The question was at that time thoroughly discussed. The danger of leaving it to Congress to determine by a legislative enactment the qualifications for the exercise of the elective franchise was clearly foreseen. Every Representative in this House at this hour holds his seat by virtue of that clause of the Constitution leaving it to the various States to prescribe each for itself the qualifications of electors. This Congress now declares in substance, and for the first time in our history as a nation, that republican government necessarily implies negro suffrage; that unless a State gives to the negroes within its limits the right of suffrage the government of that State is not republican in form and Congress has a right to change it.

Sir, if we admit, contrary to the direct letter as well as the spirit of the Constitution, that Congress has the right to prescribe for the States the qualifications necessary for the exercise of the elective franchise, the same power that to-day declares negro suffrage all-essential in the South may to-morrow declare that women suffrage or children suffrage is necessary to constitute a republican government in the North; and what is the fate of Virginia to-day may be the fate of Maryland and Kentucky to-morrow, and of Pennsylvania and New York the day after. Once depart from the authority of Congress as defined and limited in the Constitution, and the power of Congress is unlimited. Once depart from the provision giving the States the exclusive right to regulate suffrage and it will, in the language of the Federalist, depend upon the changing humors of Congress to declare what may or may not be a republican government.

But, sir, this bill goes further. It not only asserts by necessary implication the right of Congress to declare that republican government shall mean negro suffrage; in the extreme haste to attain that end it violates every constitutional provision designed for the security of individual rights. The bill recently passed by this House does not repeal the act of March 2, 1867, except in certain particulars. It does not repeal the third section of that act which gives to district commanders the power "to protect all persons in their rights of person and property, to suppress insurrection, disorder, and violence, and to punish or cause to be punished all disturbers of the public peace and criminals." That provision will still remain in force.

But, sir, I beg leave to state that there is this great difference between the act of March 2, 1867, and the act passed this session. By the former act it was left to the discretion of the district commanders to allow the civil courts to take cognizance of and protect the rights of individuals in their persons and in their property, and to punish criminals and suppress disorder. This bill in one line abolishes all government in these ten States, and with the government falls every court in that magnificent territory, three times, as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] said, the territorial area of France. This bill abolishes all government, executive, legislative, and judicial, and deprives the district commander of the discretion which he had under the former act. In one line of your bill, at one stroke of your pen, you have done what no other legislative body ever did since the world was created, and I defy gentlemen to point me to an instance to the contrary. You have abolished all law over nine million people and substituted in its place the arbitrary, unrestrained will of a colonel of infantry or cavalry to decide what is disorder, what is disturbance of the public peace, what is insurrection, and what crimes require punishment.

Sir, the question that was asked by a distinguished Representative from the State of Ohio [Mr. CARY] is unanswered, unanswerable. Who can punish a district commander or the General of the Army when he seizes an innocent man and consigns him either to a felon's cell or to an ignominious death? Where is the power to hold him amenable? When arraigned in a civil court, if ever he should be, he can turn with triumph to this act and say that the judiciary of the United States cannot take cognizance of his acts. If an appeal is made to his superior officer to court-martial him he can walk into the court with a printed copy of this law in hand and say, "I hung that man because the law said I should repress disorder and punish criminals; and he was a criminal. Tell me who can say that he was not?"

And yet, gentlemen with the Constitution upon their lips, with liberty, fraternity, and equality eternally resounding in this Hall, with professions of love for republican government and for rational freedom regulated by law, consign one third of this country to the tender mercies of colonels in the Army, without appeal from their decisions, and with no hope of redress from either the legislative or the judicial power of this country!

Sir, that question has never yet been answered. The gentleman to whom it was addressed [Mr. BINGHAM] says there is a fine and imprisonment. Imposed upon whom? Not upon the man who carries out this provision, but upon the man who opposes it. The fine is for the Executive of the United States if he opposes the law; it is for the judiciary, if they decide against it; but not for the colonels of the Army or for the General of the Army.

Sir, if you have the right, which the gentlemen of the majority in this House claim, to seize these States and give them a republican form of government, have you a right in doing so to violate every principle of that Constitution which was intended to guard individual rights? Have you a right in guarantying to the States a republican form of government to violate the other provisions of the Constitution? Have you a right in order to carry out one provision of the Constitution to violate the other ninety and nine? Have you a right to seize upon an innocent citizen of the United States, be he loyal or be he rebel, and hang him in order to secure to other persons a republican form of government? Is not that the whole theory upon which this bill is based, that you have a right, in order to carry out one provision of the Constitution, to violate ninety-nine others which are more important and which the great men of 1789 believed they had made unchangeable?

Mr. Chairman, I believe it is labor lost, but I cannot forbear reading to the committee a part of the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, in 4 Wallace, page 120:

"The history of the world had taught them that what was done in the past might be attempted in the future. The Constitution of the United States is a law for rulers and people equally in war and in peace, and covers with the shield of its protection all classes of men, at all times, and under all circumstances. No doctrine involving more pernicious consequences was ever invented by the wit of man than that any of its provisions can be suspended during any of the great exigencies of the Government. Such a doctrine leads directly to anarchy or despotism. But the theory of necessity upon which it is based is false; for the Government within the Constitution has all the powers granted, to it which are necessary to preserve its existence."

When gentlemen say that for the sake of that one article they can violate all the others I beg leave not only to refer them to the plain written language of that instrument but to that decision reaffirming it. That decision declared that a citizen of the United States, although in the midst of war, could not be seized and tried by a military tribunal. And yet, before the ink is dry on the paper upon which that decision was written this branch of the Legislature declares by the fourth section of the reconstruction bill that you can try any man by a military tribunal whether he be a civilian or not; and the power is conferred upon subordinate officers of the Army to try civilians.

But that is not all. The third section gives the power to the district commanders to establish martial law. Now, what does the Supreme Court say in regard to that?

"Martial law established on such a basis destroys every guarantee of the Constitution, and effectually renders the military independent of and superior to the civil power. The attempt to do which by the king of Great Britain was deemed by our fathers such an offense that they assigned it to the world as one of the causes which impelled them to declare their independence. Civil liberty and this kind of martial law cannot endure together. The antagonism is irreconcilable, and in the conflict one or the other must perish."

Sir, not only does this bill encroach upon the judicial power of the United States but upon the executive power. It gives the General of the Army exclusive command over the Army in the South. It takes away from the President the command of a part of the Army. It is said on the other side of the House that the President of the United States is to see that the laws are faithfully executed—that he must carry out the laws of Congress. Tell me, sir, what was the use of placing in the instrument the article giving him the command of the Army and Navy if Congress can take it away from him? What does that power amount to if the General of the Army can assign to the command of a military district his subordinates A, B, and C? Is not the power of the President gone? If the General of the Army has the power to command over the territory of the South by act of Congress he may have equal power conferred upon him to command over the North. The command of the Army of the United States necessarily involves the direction of the troops. If the President chooses to assign an officer who has been assigned by the General of the Army to the command of a military district on the Pacific coast he would have an unquestionable right to do so. Otherwise he has no command of the Army of the United States.

Although this clause of the Constitution seems to me sufficiently plain I beg leave to refer to the opinion, not of the court itself, but of the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court on this subject, to be found in 4 Wallace, page 139:

"This power necessarily extends to all legislation essential to the prosecution, with vigor and success, except such as interferes with the command of the forces and the conduct of the campaign. That power and duty belong to the President as Commander-in-Chief."

Also, on page 141:

"What we have already said sufficiently indicates our opinion that there is no law for the government of the citizens, the Army, or the Navy of the United States within American jurisdiction which is not contained in or derived from the Constitution; and wherever our Army or Navy may go beyond our territorial limits, neither can go beyond the authority of the President or the legislation of Congress."

How does that agree with the theory of some distinguished gentlemen of this House that the southern States are outside of the shield and protection of the Constitution? The Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, who is in political accord with the majority here, declares that the Army of the United States cannot go beyond the control of the Constitution of the United States, but wherever they may be, whether in the North or in the South, the East or the West, whether within or beyond the territorial limits of the country, the Constitution accompanies them, and neither Congress nor the President has any power over them except what is derived from that instrument. And if, as gentlemen say, these ten States of this Union are beyond and outside of the Constitution, certainly the Chief Justice of the United States says that the Army there and the Navy there are not outside of its jurisdiction, and that it is equally the law for them there as here or wherever else they may be.

Mr. Chairman, my time has nearly expired, but in behalf of the people I represent I mean to say and declare that we hold that instrument signed by Washington as the rule of our action.

Reconstruction.

SPEECH OF HON. LOT M. MORRILL,
OF MAINE,

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
February 5, 1868.

The Senate having under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 439) additional and supplementary to an act entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed March 2, 1867, and the acts supplementary thereto—

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: I cannot but confess for myself that I come to the discussion of this question at a time when I fear it must be anything but pleasant to the Senate to attend to any further consideration of this subject—that I am to glean in a field where the reapers have been many, and although the harvest has been abundant it has been gathered. On a motion collateral to the measure, and only related to it in part, a debate has been precipitated by the opponents of congressional reconstruction which has opened to the Senate and to the country that great subject in all its amplitude and in all its relations; so that Senators upon the one side and the other have felt obliged to traverse the whole field of the war, the powers of the Government, the relations of the States, and the respective authority of the President and of the Congress of the United States in the exercise of their functions for the restoration of the relations of the States to the Union.

Congress, by those who precipitated this debate, has been arraigned, and, I may say, presented to the country, for the part it has taken in this great work of reconstruction. It has been arraigned now on this question of reconstruction, as it was arraigned during the war on the question of war. Congress, in the contemplation of the Constitution, being the great war power of the Government, necessarily taking upon itself that function, in giving direction to the conduct of the policy of the war, at once brought down upon its head the denunciation of the bold, bad men who were in rebellion, the fierce and bitter criticism of all parties who hesitated or doubted about war as a remedy for the nation; and, in fact, all persons and all factions here and everywhere who questioned the authority of Congress to deal with the rebellion on the war side of the Government.

And now the honorable Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. DOOLITTLE] precipitates the question from which arise the same issues against the exercise of the powers of Congress in the consideration of the policy of reconstruction and restoration of these States to their relations with the Federal Union; and I beg to be allowed to say that the same spirit which characterized the denunciations of Congress during the war is repeated here to-day. Passionate, invective, fierce and bitter denunciation of the purposes and the measures of Congress, characterize this debate by its opponents. Congress is denounced now, as then, as usurping the "rights of the States." Congress is denounced now, as then, as establishing arbitrary military authority in these States. Congress is denounced now, as then, of a purpose to outlaw the white race in its "blind zeal," in the language of one honorable Senator, "to exalt the black race." We are charged specifically with "disrobing the white race to enrobe the black race." We are charged specifically with violating the Constitution of the United States "in order to give power and dominion over the white to the black."

These, then, sir, are the charges and the specification of charges in the arraignment of Congress on its reconstruction policy. Outlawry of the white race! Naturally enough one asks himself who is the white race here referred to of which Senators on this floor aspire to be the champions? Who are they in the history of this country? When the white race is referred to here as having been legislated against by Congress, who is meant? The class of white men who have dominated in the South for the last thirty years—they, and nobody else; the white men who are in power under the sham States set up by executive usurpation, and exercising that power exclusively to the oppression of the rest of the population of the South. They, and they alone, are the white race referred to; and who are they? Men whose hands are freshly imbrued in the blood of our children; men who for thirty years have cherished the malignant passion of hatred to this Government which eventuated in civil war and blood; men, moreover, who for a generation, nay, for two hundred years, have cherished a hellish lust for dominion over their fellow-man, in defiance of the law of God, the principles of our holy religion, and the laws of every civilized nation on earth. This is the party in court; this is the white race between which and Congress the Senators who have precipitated this debate, and who have made it incumbent upon Congress to consider it, volunteer their arguments and their sympathy to defend.

Mr. President, to these charges and specifications of charges, to this alleged usurpation of the rights of the States—this supposed outlawry of the whites, this establishing of military despotisms by Congress to the overthrow of ten States of this Union—is there any answer? It has been answered; first, by my honorable friend from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON,] fully, eloquently, logically, conclusively answered—answered many times by those who have followed him in debate; so that absolutely now there is nothing left for me save only to add my feeble voice in testimony and approbation of what has been said on this side of the Chamber.

How does Congress meet this assumption of usurpation, of the establishment of military authority over ten States? I will read you the answer: "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed March 2, 1867. Let me refer you to its provisions:

"Whereas no legal State government or adequate protection for life or property now exists in the rebel States of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Mississippi, Alabama, Louisiana, Florida, Texas, and Arkansas; and whereas it is necessary that peace and good order should be enforced in said States until loyal and republican State governments can be legally established: Therefore,

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That said rebel States shall be divided into military districts and made subject to the military authority of the United States, as hereinafter prescribed."

Then the third section provides:

"That it shall be the duty of each officer assigned as aforesaid to protect all persons in their rights of person and property, to suppress insurrection, disorder, and violence, and to punish or cause to be punished, all disturbers of the public peace and criminals."

Further, in section five, it is provided:

"That when the people of any one of said rebel States shall have formed a constitution of government in conformity with the Constitution of the United States in all respects, framed by a convention of delegates," &c.—

they may be admitted again to their relations with the General Government.

Now, sir, to the opponents of congressional reconstruction I have to say, in answer to your specific charge that we have established military despotism in these States, that finding anarchy, misrule, despotism, and disorder in these States, as the result of the rebellion, insurrection, and civil war waged by them, Congress by law, under its authority as the great war power of the nation, and bound to regard the results of the rebellion, has interposed its military authority as a police power to preserve order and protect life and liberty in these States.

Does it go any further than that? Has any Senator on the other side attributed to it any other power than that? No, sir. Its purpose, then, was to protect persons and property. Was it necessary? I do not stand here at this late day to argue that, of course. Allow me to refer Senators who doubt that to the current events of history, to that general information open to all the citizens, by which it appears that, at the time when this act was passed, it had come to be the common sentiment, the common opinion, and common judgment of the nation that there was no protection for life or property in these States. The courts were not open to the citizens of the United States; they were closed to a class, as they had been for two hundred years. Here was the grand necessity for the interposition of the military police authority of the Constitution of the United States to preserve order. That is the answer, the full answer, explained in the preamble to the enactment itself. The preamble declares that no legal State governments exist in those States. Is it pretended here that there are any legal State governments existing in those States at the present moment? The preamble further asserts that at the time of its passage there was no adequate protection for life or property in the rebel States. Does anybody deny that? This explains the motive and the purpose of the law which is characterized by the Opposition in the Senate as having established a military despotism over ten of the States of the American Union.

When Senators talk of usurping the rights of ten of the States of the American Union, to what States do they refer? Do they refer to the "slave States" that existed anterior to the rebellion in 1860; do they refer to the "rebel States" that existed during the war of the rebellion? Do they refer to the "belligerent States" of that period? Or do they refer to the "insurrectionary States," so denominated by the acts of Congress?

Mr. President, the argument about the interference of Congress with the rights of the States is of course upon the assumption that the rights of these States have an existence. If the rights of these States disappeared during the events and by the progress of the war, then, of course, the charge falls to the ground. Now, upon what theory is the notion of the "abiding rights" of these States based? It is based upon the theory that, after all, it turns out that the nation has not been

Reconstruction—Mr. Morrill.

at war in a legal sense. It is upon the theory of the honorable Senator from Maryland, [Mr. JOHNSON,] argued here during the rebellion, argued many times since, and, of course, always argued ably and well, that we have had no war in the sense of war; that we have only been engaged in an effort on the part of the Government to put down an insurrection; that what we have seen and witnessed in the last six years is only the exercise of the police power of the nation in dealing with insurrection, and in no sense war. That I understand to be the position of the honorable Senator from Maryland, of Senators in the Opposition, and is the necessary logic of all opposition to reconstruction either by Congress or the President; the Senator from Maryland sees very clearly that if we have been at war certain war rights have been acquired by the Government; that if the Government waged war on rebellion certain grand results would follow; the nation would be victor; the nation would be triumphant; somebody would be defeated; rights would be acquired or lost according to the success or the defeat of the respective parties to the war. So the honorable Senator early concurred in the ground taken by Mr. Buchanan and by those who held that we had no remedy against the rebel States by war; and that the only exercise of authority by Congress, or the President, or the nation at large, was the exercise of the police power of the Government to put down insurrection; and that we had, under the Constitution, no authority whatever for war; that war was destruction of the Union, and therefore could not be exercised.

In the apprehension of the nation I do not think this was correct. As a legal point I am sure it was ingeniously taken; but it has lost its power for good or ill; it was overruled by the judgment of the nation; it was overruled by Congress; it was overruled by the Executive; and, unfortunately for the argument, it was overruled by the Supreme Court of the United States. Still, those who oppose congressional "reconstruction" as against "restoration" fall back always, ever, and continually upon the abstract doctrine that the nation had no power to make war, and of course, therefore, the nation gets no rights of war, and consequently the rebel States were not involved in the disabilities, pains, penalties, and forfeitures of the war. That is the logic, the legal and constitutional argument of the Opposition to congressional reconstruction.

On this theory we have learned to miscall things altogether. On this theory the grand Army of the Republic, three million men, were only a posse comitatus, not to enact war, but to preserve order and arrest traitors. Lieutenant General Grant, at the head of all the forces of the United States, was only the grand high constable of the nation; was in no sense a military chieftain; he was not prosecuting war; he was trying to keep order; and his grand march from the Rapidan to Richmond was not a campaign in the sense of war, by which rights were to be enforced or lost, but it was simply a movement of the high constable with a posse comitatus to Richmond to force that city to keep the peace; not for its capture; not to destroy it, if need be. In the light of this interpretation of the Constitution, all your battles—Antietam, Chancellorsville, Gettysburg, Williamsburg, the Five Forks, and the surrender—are all nothing, so far as affecting the rights of the parties is concerned; the Government having prosecuted this war for four bloody years at an expense of blood and treasure, unparalleled in history, came out where they went in, settling nothing by this "last resort," an appeal to arms.

On this showing the question of secession is an open question. On this showing the emancipation proclamation, which was but an expression and an act of the war power of the Government is a nullity necessarily, and all that you have done changing the institutions, constitutions, or laws of the rebel States is null and void, inoperative, and not binding on anybody. On this showing nothing has been settled by this war. It was simply the exercise of a police power; it was to keep order, and it was not the exercise of that war power of the nation which alone could change results and which was omnipotent over constitutions and laws, institutions and interests; and whatever was determined by it was settled forever.

Now, sir, on this theory I understand to be based all the arguments of the Opposition to the power and authority of Congress to reconstruct these States. They all proceed on the theory that no rights were lost by the war; that it worked no subversion of State governments, no change of State constitutions or State laws, and therefore no reconstruction was at all necessary or expedient. The argument of the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. HENDRICKS,] of course, is based on this theory. He affirms as his belief that the State constitutions and State governments came through the war. The States went in with constitutions and governments, and they came out with constitutions and governments, with all their rights, privileges, and immunities unimpaired. Upon what theory can he assert this? Simply upon that to which I have referred, that we have not been at war, that we have been engaged in a great struggle to preserve order, and that during that struggle we were bound not to do damage. Nay, we have had it quoted upon us here often that in 1861 we resolved that we would not do damage, that we were prosecuting the war, as we then called it, inaply enough to be sure, it would seem, we were prosecuting the enterprise, if you please, or carrying on the struggle, not with a view of subverting institutions, State governments, or anything of the sort, but that at the end all these institutions, governments, States, and interests should be restored. Strange delusion of the times! But, sir, in the providence of God it was not to be so.

But, Mr. President, I do not propose to detain the Senate by elaborating that point. What I mean say, to return to the point for a moment, is that the nation was at war with all the rights of a nation at war is not an open question. The effect of this war upon State governments and State institutions is not an open question. The Congress of the United States, the supreme legislative war power of the Government, settled it in 1861 by the act declaring non-intercourse with these States. It settled it again in 1862 by the act declaring them public enemies and awarding against them confiscation of estates and freedom of their slaves and civil and political disabilities to those engaged in rebellion—both the exercise of the supreme power of war on the principle of public law, and adequate, if prosecuted to extremes, to work an entire revolution in the governments of those States. It was settled also by the supreme executive authority of the Government of the United States in the execution of these laws, the issuing of the proclamation of non-intercourse under the act of 1861 and the enforcement of the act of 1862, and by the march of its armies within the limits and jurisdiction of these States, the destruction of their cities and their towns, the overthrow of their institutions, liberation of slaves, the destruction of life and property wherever the Army made its way, leaving desolation and destruction in its track. Was that war or the exercise of the police functions of the Government? Sir, it was war in its most terrible reality. It was so adjudged, moreover, finally, by the supreme judicial tribunal of the Government, that the war waged by the Government of the United States against the "insurrectionary States" was in fact and in law, under the Constitution and by the principles of public law, war, and that it gave to the Government of the United States all the powers and authority and rights of war which any one nation could properly have against another nation.

Now, sir, is that an open question? I understand the theories and the speculations of the learned Senator from Maryland, for whose opinions no man here or elsewhere can have a more profound respect than I have. I am not arguing the question with him, but I am simply stating the facts of history; I am stating simply the current events of the war, which overrule his opinions; and which, sound or unsound, show they are no longer of the slightest practical importance to anybody but himself. The contest was a war; and the nation had all the right of a nation at war; and the results of the war involved the enemy, the domestic enemy, in all the pains and penalties and forfeitures and disabilities of a nation at war. That is the verdict of all the departments of this Government, legislative, executive and judicial, and it is conclusive. It is conclusive with the present, it is conclusive with the past, and it will be conclusive with the future. All institutions, constitutions, interests, courts of law, general or State, must and will conform to this great, historical fact of war, war on the part of the nation rightfully and properly waged, with all the rights of a nation at war, and with all the results of a victorious and conquering nation.

This is the record on which Congress stands; but it is not all. I am now speaking, of course, of the effect of war on the organization of these States. My argument is, that the results of the war were attended with annihilation of State governments and "State rights." Who, sir, as a lawyer, will stand here, after this general judgment of the concurring and coordinate departments of the Government of the United States, and argue for State rights "in the insurrectionary States?" State rights, in the extreme sense always a political fallacy, has by war become an absurdity, a legal and constitutional paradox. As a serious proposition, as a basis of legislative action here, it is an arrogant and impudent assumption in contradiction to the whole history of the war.

But, sir, there is another method of reaching the effect of this rebellion on these States and their governments. The overthrow of these State governments results from the action of the States themselves. I am not speaking now of ordinances of secession; I am not speaking of nullification; I am not speaking of changes of constitution and laws during the rebellion by which these States were made to conform to the "confederate States." I pass that all by. I agree with the honorable Senator from Maryland that they are all null, inoperative, and void; I attach not the slightest importance to their effect. If they effected nothing, did rebellion effect nothing? If the ordinances of secession, as a legal and technical proposition, were null and void, does it follow that the taking up of arms was null and void? Does it follow that when ten States broke into rebellion and armed for war and made war practically and marched armies against the national forces, sacked our cities, and beleaguered the national capital, that is not a fact of some significance as bearing upon the rights of these States?

What is a State government? It consists of constitution, in the first place, which is the organic law. That constitution upon the American plan provides for three departments of government, which are the expression of the constitution. Then it is a complex machinery, consisting of, first, the organic law, and second, the departments. Either one may be called the State, but both together properly constitute the government of the State. How was this organism of the State affected by this war? Let us see. In order to have a State government, organized through the several departments, executive, legislative, and judicial, certain things are necessary to be done. In the first place there must be officers, the persons who are to execute the functions of the State as provided in the organic law. How are they to be qualified? When may they begin to exercise any of those functions to put themselves in harmony with the Government of the United States? As the Constitution of the United States provides, when they have taken an oath to support the Constitution of the United States, and not before. The oath prescribed by the Constitution of the United States is the ligament which binds these States to the Union; it is as the soul in the body that animates the State; it is the very breath of life, without which there is no State vitality and no possibility of State organization. Is not that true? Will anybody deny that proposition? When the oath is gone, what becomes of the organization? It goes with it, of course; the ligament is broken, the breath of life departs, the vitality is gone. Now, did not these people renounce the oath? Did they not abjure the jurisdiction of the United States? Did they not defy it, deny its authority, and so abdicate power? Everybody must concede that. Then the organization of the State was gone, and it was gone by renunciation, abjuration, abdication; so that, taking South Carolina for illustration, as she led the way to armed rebellion, there was not, in 1862, any officer in the whole State under oath to support the Constitution of the United States. All had abjured, all had renounced, and the effect was disorganization of its government, absolute and entire. That condition of things remained until the close of the rebellion, so that at the close of the rebellion there was no officer and of course no function in that State. The State organization was dead; it had broken away from its allegiance, it had become foresworn, and it could perform no act of State authority whatever.

At the close of the war what was the condition of the State? Disorganized; disorganized by its own act; disorganized by the abjuration of every officer who could perform a function. How could it be reanimated? On the theory of my argument they had lost all their rights; they had been engaged in war, and had been overthrown; they had been treated as a public enemy, and had been conquered, and had lost all civil and political rights, and were in a state of absolute disability. There was not only no officer in South Carolina to perform the functions of office, but there were no persons in South Carolina who were eligible to office. How, then, was government to be revived? The people, just defeated as a public enemy, could not do it; they were under the disabilities of a public enemy—in a state of total political and civil disability. Some sovereign power, some power outside of themselves, must relieve them from this disability, and give them permission to reorganize those governments. But, sir, I have not yet come to that part of the argument; I am simply showing, attempting to show, the disorganization of these State governments.

But one step further; while these State organizations were thus disorganized and lost, their institutions and laws were overthrown, so that South Carolina, which went into the rebellion in 1860 a "slave State," came out a free State. How? By the change in her fundamental law; and how was that effected? Not by her own act directly, but by the incidents and events of war. By her act of war on the Government she had given the Government of the United States the authority to wage war, and making war the Government found it necessary to change her constitution and to emancipate her slaves. Nay, further, it found it necessary by an amendment in the Constitution of the United States, to provide for a total inhibition of slavery in any of the States. Then, sir, during the war, by the action of the Government of the United States, the constitution of South Carolina became subverted altogether; her slave code and the great body of her laws were subverted, overthrown by the supreme power of the Government in the exercise of its great war functions during the exigencies of civil war.

In this view what becomes of all this talk about these States having "brought their State governments" through the blood and carnage of the war? According to the argument of the Senator from Indiana everything else seems to have perished; there was general desolation throughout the South; cities were sacked and burnt; hundreds of thousands of the southern people perished; poverty, misery, distress, general anarchy and disorder everywhere prevailed; nothing remained perfect and undisturbed but the myth of State constitutions; "the rights and the privileges, the immunities and the dignity" of the rebel States triumphed over all, and came out of the great ordeal of battle unscathed and untouched! And honorable Senators bow reverently and obsequiously before the shade of departed slavery as if it were a real entity, had a bodily existence, and we were legislating in its presence and in deference to its supposed kingship.

State rights, sir, were annihilated by the march of the armies of the United States, which conquered and subdued everywhere, and also by the infatuation and madness of their people in making war on a Government the most beneficent on earth, against which they had never made any well-grounded or just complaint. During the war they were public enemies, and at the surrender were in a state of total civil disability and could exercise no function of Government whatever; their constitutions and institutions were subverted and revolutionized, and they must be touched by a power outside of them and which lay only in the sovereignty of the Government of the United States, before they could be reorganized or vitalized, or put in harmonious relations with the Government of the United States.

These notions of the effects of the war on these States are not novel. I am saying nothing new, and surely nothing unusual in the Senate. Those who took the ground that the nation had a remedy in war knew in the beginning that these would be its results. They knew that it would be attended with the utter overthrow of State governments, the utter annihilation of slavery and all its interests. They anticipated that, contemplated it, and, so far as its introduction into this Chamber is concerned, it was not original with this side of the House; it originated with the Opposition. The honorable Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. DAVIS,] far-seeing, far-reaching, indefatigable, philosophic in his speculations upon history and upon current events, saw it the first ten days after he entered this Chamber in 1861, and proposed to provide for it. He saw that the war cloud which was then overhanging the nation and threatening to involve every part of it in war—fearful, fratricidal, general war—would be attended with the results of war; that it would give the nation rights of war; that it would inflict upon the enemy forfeitures and disabilities of war; and he would provide for that state of things, and I proclaim him here and now to the nation as the great originator and inventor of the whole theory of the results which we are providing for in our policy of reconstruction. He was the great inventor of the term, now become historic, "Reconstruction." He saw at a glance on entering these Chambers how this thing must be dealt with; that the people of the rebellious States must be treated as enemies; that we must hold against them the rights of a public enemy; that we must deal with them as enemies, and we must insist that the results of victory should be the entire overthrow both of their institutions and their constitutions, and that the remedy of the nation would be in the end the right to "reconstruct," the right to readjust the parts to the nation. When the war was over and institutions were subverted, and constitutions subverted, and the governments no more, then the honorable Senator from Kentucky foresaw that it would be the function and the duty and the necessity of the Government of the United States to reorganize and reconstruct. To show that I am right let me refer to the record in verification.

I hold in my hand a bill introduced by the honorable Senator from Kentucky on the 30th of December, 1861, entitled "A bill declaring certain persons to be alien enemies, forfeiting their property to the United States, creating a lien on said property in favor of loyal persons to indemnify them for such damages as they may have sustained by the existing war of rebellion." I need not read it in detail. It will be found that it contemplated the exercise of authority and power far beyond any exercised by the Congress of the United States since. It covered the whole question. It assumed the absolute supremacy of the nation. It was based on the theory that the nation was at war; that it had public enemies; that our former fellow-citizens were these enemies; that the contest was to be prosecuted as a war and with the results of war. By this bill the honorable Senator, in advance, declared the rebels to be "alien enemies." Not a few of the leaders; but the provision was sweeping—every person who should participate at all, directly or indirectly, in this war was to be regarded as an "alien enemy." What was to be the consequence of this declaration? Forfeiture of all rights, civil and political. That was sagacious—that was profound even, because it met the exigency, stated the theory and the policy of coming events. It took most of us a long time to reach that conclusion; but the honorable Senator saw it in advance and would provide for it.

But that is not all. Here are resolutions introduced by the honorable Senator from Kentucky about the same time. The bill was introduced on the 30th of December, 1861. On the 13th of February following the honorable Senator introduced a series of resolutions, in which he undertook to embody the principles of the war, the principles which underlay it, the power of the Government, and the liabilities of those who opposed it.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the honorable Senator permit me to make a suggestion?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Certainly.

Mr. DAVIS. I will ask the honorable Senator to do me the justice and the courtesy to have those resolutions read by the Clerk.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. At the present time?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Certainly; I shall be glad to oblige the Senator.

Mr. DAVIS. I have no objection to the bill being read, too.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I do not care about having the bill read now. It is pretty long, but I send the resolutions to the desk, and ask that they be read.

The Secretary read the following resolutions, submitted by Mr. DAVIS on the 13th of February, 1862:

"1. Resolved, That the Constitution of the United States is the fundamental law of the Government, and the powers established and granted, and as parted out and vested by it, the limitations and restrictions which it imposes upon the legislative, executive, and judicial departments, and the States, and the rights, privileges, and liberties which it assures to the people of the United States and the States respectively, are fixed, permanent, and immutable through all the phases of peace and war, until changed by the power and in the mode prescribed by the Constitution itself; and they cannot be abrogated, restricted, enlarged, or differently apportioned or vested by any other power, or in any other mode.

"2. Resolved, That between the Government and the citizen the obligation of protection and obedience form mutual rights and obligations; and to enable every citizen to perform his obligations of obedience and loyalty to the Government it should give him reasonable protection and security in such performance; and when the Government fails in that respect, for it to hold the citizen to be criminal in not performing his duties of loyalty and obedience would be unjust, inhuman, and an outrage upon this age of Christian civilization.

"3. Resolved, That if any powers of the Constitution or Government of the United States, or of the States, or any rights, privileges, immunities, and liberties of the people of the United States, or the States, are, or may hereafter be, suspended by the existence of this war, or by any promulgation of martial law, or by the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus immediately upon the termination of the war such powers, rights, privileges, immunities, and liberties would be resumed, and would have force and effect as though they had not been suspended.

"4. Resolved, That the duty of Congress to guaranty to every State a republican form of government, to protect each of them against invasion, and on the application of the Legislature or executive thereof against domestic violence, and to enforce the authority, Constitution, and laws of the United States in all the States, are constitutional obligations which abide all times and circumstances.

"5. Resolved, That no State can, by any vote of secession, or by rebellion against the authority, Constitution, and laws of the United States, or by any other act, abdicate her rights or obligations under that Constitution or those laws, or absolve her people from their obedience to them, or the United States from their obligation to guaranty to such State a republican form of government, and to protect her people by causing the due enforcement within her territories of the authority, Constitution, and laws of the United States.

"6. Resolved, That there cannot be any forfeiture or confiscation of the rights of persons or property of any citizen of the United States who is loyal and obedient to the authority, Constitution, and laws thereof, or of any person whatsoever, unless for acts which the law has previously declared to be criminal, and for the punishment of which it has provided such forfeiture or confiscation.

"7. Resolved, That it is the duty of the United States to subdue and punish the existing rebellion by force of arms and civil trials in the shortest practicable time, and with the least cost to the people, but so decisively and thoroughly as to impress upon the present and future generations as a great truth that rebellion, except for grievous oppression of Government, will bring upon the rebels incomparably more of evil than obedience to the Constitution and the laws.

"8. Resolved, That the United States Government should march their armies into all the insurgent States, and promptly put down the military power which they have arrayed against it, and give protection and security to the loyal men thereof, to enable them to reconstruct their legitimate State governments, and bring them and the people back to the Union and to obedience and duty under the Constitution and the laws of the United States, bearing the sword in one hand and the olive branch in the other, and while inflicting on the guilty leaders condign and exemplary punishment, granting amnesty and oblivion to the comparatively innocent masses; and if the people of any State cannot, or will not, reconstruct their State government and return to loyalty and duty, Congress should provide a government for such State as a Territory of the United States, securing to the people thereof their appropriate constitutional rights."

Mr. DAVIS. I will say to the honorable Senator that I adhere to every principle and every position in those resolutions, and I have done so throughout the war.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I am more than delighted to hear that approbation, because I shall soon expect the honorable Senator to range himself on our side. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAVIS. I shall show you where I stand in a day or two. [Laughter.]

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. My purpose was in part to compliment the Senator for his intuitive sense of the rights of the Government and for his elaboration of those rights in the form of a statement so early as 1862, and to give him the full credit of having been the originator of congressional reconstruction. Precisely the state of things which he contemplated in these resolutions came to pass. He then said to the rebels: if you resist my admonition, if you continue fighting, if you bring on general war, if you put yourselves in the attitude of public enemies, not only pains and penalties shall come to you, not only forfeiture of property and of civil and political rights, but when the great destruction of State constitutions, when the day of subversion comes, then the nation will interpose and it will be the duty, nay, the necessity, of the nation, to interpose, to do what? to "reconstruct," readjust the disordered parts, reconstruct State constitutions in harmony with the changed state of things produced by the war. That is what the honorable Senator then foresaw, and that, by the blessing of God, is what we are now trying to do. He saw with clear vision what the results would be if they continued in their resistance to the Government until the Government was obliged to exercise its supreme authority of war, so that it should destroy slavery, State institutions, constitutions, Governments, and general disorder should ensue. Then, under the constitutional provision which guaranties to the people of each State a republican government, it would be the duty of the Government of the United States—not of the President, but of the United States—to step in and restore them. How? By restoring the old State governments? No such thing was contemplated, no such thing was dreamed of, but to restore order by an adjustment of the parts, adjusting the nation to its changed condition by reconstruction.

Let me read one of these resolutions again. The Senator will excuse the satisfaction I take in this early part of his labors here. My especial interest centers in the last resolution. My admiration of it is unbounded. [Laughter.] I have kept it by me constantly, and have admonished the honorable Senator from time to time, as I thought he needed, that his record was against his present position, that he was doing violence in these latter days to his former good works and ways, that his early record was sound, logical, and right, but that his speeches of late, for some reason or other, were doing great violence to it. Now let me read the emphatic parts of the last resolution:

"That the United States Government should march their armies into all the insurgent States and promptly put down the military power which they have arrayed against it, and give protection and security to the loyal men thereof."

Give protection to "the loyal men," carry the sword for the rebels, the olive branch for the loyal men. That is what we are doing now.

Mr. SUMNER. And the phrase is "loyal men," without distinction of color. [Laughter.]

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I did not notice that, but of course "all loyal" men, of necessity, includes the colored men.

Mr. SUMNER. Of course. [Laughter.]

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. And the resolution proceeds:

"Give protection and security to the loyal men thereof."

To what end are you to give security to the loyal men?

"To enable them to reconstruct"—

That is it. There is the word—

"to reconstruct their legitimate State governments."

Now, what if they do not do it?

"And if the people of any State cannot, or will not, reconstruct their State government and return to loyalty and duty, Congress should provide a government for such State as a Territory of the United States."

It was never proposed to treat them absolutely as Territories on this side of the Chamber. I think, after that declaration, it is hardly worth while for us to speculate about "States in the Union or out of the Union." If as early as 1862 the honorable Senator from Kentucky contemplated that in the progress of events these States would be in the position of territories. Then it would be proper for the Congress of the United States to treat them as Territories and give them governments as Territories, I am inclined to think it is hardly worth while for us to quibble on nice points. All I have to regret about this is that while I am disposed to immortalize the Senator from Kentucky in the history of the country, I am afraid it will derogate from the record of my honorable friend from Massachusetts. [Laughter.] I have always supposed, and I think the general impression is, that the Senator from Massachusetts was the originator of the idea that these States were remitted to territorial rights, and should be treated as Territories.

Mr. DAVIS. If the honorable Senator will allow me I will present him with the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts, offered about three days before my series, and to which mine was a response. There was not a voice in favor of his except his own when they were offered in the Senate.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. He could not have got a patent right for his. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAVIS. Will the honorable Senator allow them to be read?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. No; I shall want to look at them. I do not desire to get up any antagonism between the honorable Senator from Kentucky and my friend from Massachusetts. I prefer to leave them to fight it out. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAVIS. I will take a hit or two at you as I go along. [Laughter.]

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I understand the honorable Senator from Kentucky to intimate that he is prepared on this point. I am glad to hear it. If the Senator believes, as he professes to, that Congress in its "reconstruction policy" is making war on the Constitution of the United States, it is obvious that his record here places him on the skirmish line, at least.

Enough, Mr. President, and more than enough I am sure, upon this great question in this case; the point which underlies the whole of it, and upon which policies of restoration and reconstruction must rest is that by the war, through the war, and on account of the war, the southern States lost their State government and with them all the rights of States and all the rights of individuals, and were in the power of the General Government at the close of the war and must look to the General Government for the restoration of their rights, including the rights of government, amnesty for the great crime they had committed during the war, and for the future of their States. If I have demonstrated this proposition there is nothing left for the nation except the policy of Congress, reconstruction, not restoration—"reconstruction" against "restoration."

Now, sir, the only question left on the merits of the case, to which I shall barely refer, not to argue it, not even to state it, is whether Congress has performed its duty wisely and well; whether the reconstruction policy embraced in the several acts now before Congress, and those which have antedated them, are a wise discharge of the great duty devolving upon the Congress of the United States at the close of the war to reconstruct these States in harmony with the national life? What have we done? I am not to enumerate, but will simply state, the substance of the acts under consideration.

First, our military bill, so much denounced as establishing military despotism, is simply an interposition of a police force to preserve order and the agency by which reconstruction is to be consummated. That is all it is, and I defy the ingenuity of Senators to make it either more or less in its essence, in its provisions, or in its purposes.

Mr. President, I desire briefly to advert to the position taken in the debate by Senators on the other side of the Chamber. I begin with the Senator from Maryland. For his record on reconstruction I have little but approbation. I have the highest consideration for his character, his talents, his patriotism, and his public services. I could not say less to do justice to my own feelings and my own sense of the public record of that Senator. I understand that for all practical purposes, and for the highest objects to be obtained by Congress in its policy of reconstruction, the honorable Senator from Maryland stands with Congress—I do not mean to say that of his constitutional and legal opinions, but of that legislative record of the Congress of the United States which will stand out in history as the grandest legislative record in all time—the Senator from Maryland stands peerless and alone on that side of the Chamber.

Now, sir, the reconstruction policy of Congress is a complex policy. It is not embraced simply in the bills to which I have alluded, but it covers the whole period of the war. We began to reconstruct as soon as we began to conquer.

The great measure which will stand out in history as the most sublime, not only of this war, but of all time, which is to make this country illustrious among the civilized nations, which gave us success in war at home and honor and credit abroad, was the emancipation proclamation and the anti-slavery amendment to the Constitution of the United States. On that question, I am happy to say, the honorable Senator from Maryland was not only on the side of Congress, but conspicuous. I shall never cease to remember, with the utmost pleasure and delight, the speech, remarkable for its eloquence and power and pathos and dignity, of the Senator on that occasion. I had to thank him for it then, and I am not less grateful now. So on the corner-stone of reconstruction the honorable Senator from Maryland stands with Congress and against those who voted against the inhibition of slavery, the cause of rebellion in the American States. This was the first step in reconstruction. Here Congress began to put the nation in harmony with the changed state of affairs brought about by the emancipation proclamation of Mr. Lincoln, which had subverted State governments, changed slave States into free States, and necessitated radical reconstruction.

SENATE.

Reconstruction—Mr. Morrill.

But that is not all. The honorable Senator voted for the civil rights bill, the complement of the anti-slavery amendment of the Constitution—a bill made necessary by the fact of emancipation. He saw, as others did not, that when the slave was emancipated, when the shackles fell from his limbs, when he became a "freedman," he must become a freeman. The President of the United States, whose vision was dim about those days, said he was a "freedman," nothing more; he was of an unprivileged class in our system; he was a serf; he had ceased to be a slave to his old master to become a slave to the State. The Senator from Maryland, rising in his place here in the Senate, maintained his citizenship; according to the logic and the principles of the Constitution there was only one class of persons in this country, the American people, and they were all citizens now. The condition of servitude which was the exception to the general American principle had passed away, and now every native-born person was a citizen, and, being a citizen, he was entitled to all the privileges and protection of a citizen of the United States; and the Senator, leaving his associates, gave his voice and vote to this great bill of rights for the American citizen and against the objections of the President of the United States.

But more; the Senator from Maryland was for suffrage, the crowning act of congressional reconstruction. It did not seem to be so at first, but in the end the great necessity of congressional reconstruction, without which reconstruction in the southern States was impossible under the present state of things, was the ballot. The ballot in the hands of the negro became as much the necessity of reconstruction of republican States and their restoration as the bayonet in his hands was the necessity of the war. I do not mean to say that the honorable Senator from Maryland thought that was so in the beginning. I think he did not. I do not mean to say that he thinks it the most advisable thing possible to be done now; but sinking his constitutional doubts in what he conceived to be the great emergency of the Republic, to reconstruct, he yielded all his opinions, all his constitutional doubts, and gave not to faction, but to country, to liberty, to human rights, and to the peace and restoration of the country the doubts he might entertain on that subject. For that I honor him.

The clear sense of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCKALEW] enables him to see distinctly enough in this debate that the States lost their governments; that the State constitutions were subverted; that the war was attended with decisive results; that the nation was victorious, was the conqueror, and had the rights of a conqueror; that our enemies lost all; they went in for the ruin of the nation and lost their rights, many of them their lives. He sees that, and so when I propounded the question to the honorable Senator whether the guarantee of the Constitution applies to the State governments that antedated the rebellion his frank and characteristic reply is, "of course not; they were destroyed." I have no occasion to pursue the honorable Senator's argument after that concession. That brings him in principle on the side of Congress; he stands for reconstruction. If they were destroyed they must be reconstructed. I know that the honorable Senator, from those relations which are common to all of us, feels a little delicacy in avowing it quite as emphatically as I do; and perhaps he will not thank me for doing it. But his principles place him on our side. His opinions bring him with us. He must be respectful to his party relations, and so the honorable Senator says in his speech that he does not exactly approve of what we have done; he rather prefers what Mr. Johnson has done, although he does not undertake to defend it on principle. To the question whether he thought the constitutional guarantee applied to the Johnson organized governments he declined to say that it did. He thought that Mr. Johnson's policy was to be preferred over that of Congress, because Mr. Johnson had allowed the people of those States to organize State governments, and for that reason he was disposed to accept them. If I had the time and he and the Senate the patience to listen, I could show that the premise on which he puts his adhesion to the Johnson policy is fallacious. Mr. Johnson did not allow the States to form these governments. He dictated to these States. He told these States on what conditions and on what conditions alone they might form State governments. He told them who might and who should not exercise the elective franchise, who should and who should not be electors of the convention, and when they were in convention, what they should and what they should not do. Remember that he said that as Commander-in-Chief of the Army; remember he had these communities in his power; remember his military lieutenants were there, and he had declared martial law to be the supreme law of the States. He said to them, "Take these terms and be reconstructed." More, sir, he undertook to say that a portion of the rebels should reorganize those governments, while a majority of the people, the loyal people in some of those States, were utterly excluded from all participation in the government. If that commands his policy to the Senator from Pennsylvania, while he is with Congress in principle, all I can say is that he must follow the President on a policy that ignores his principles.

I now turn to the honorable Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. DOOLITTLE.] That Senator agrees with Congress in principle that the rebellion destroyed the States; that at the close of the rebellion there were no State governments in existence; that they needed reconstruction, must be reconstructed; but he contends that Congress is concluded from any participation in it, because the President of the United States has assumed jurisdiction and Congress is estopped. I do not propose to argue this point, because it has been better done by others than I could hope to do. The Constitution, I believe, provides that if States are to be reconstructed or guaranteed, "the United States" are to do it. By what logic the honorable Senator from Wisconsin understands that the President of the United States is "the United States," when by the Constitution he is only one coördinate branch of three, he has not told the Senate in his late speech, and I do not know that he ever has.

I pass to other considerations upon which the honorable Senator from Wisconsin took his departure from the congressional policy and joined himself to that of the President of the United States.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I do not desire to interrupt the Senator—

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It is no interruption.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. But I wish simply to state that, as regards the view which I entertained in relation to the effect of the rebellion upon the States of the South, I discussed that question at considerable length in January, 1865, and stated my views on that subject. I refer the honorable Senator to my speech at that time. In my speech of the other day I did not go into a discussion of the effect of the rebellion upon the States, their governments or constitutions. I was discussing more the question of the true policy of reconstruction to be pursued by Congress.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. So I understood, and therefore I do not address myself to that part of the Senator's speech, but was about to proceed to the question of policy to which he objects.

On the question of emancipation the Senator was sound. He went for the proclamation of emancipation. On the question of the anti-slavery amendment of the Constitution the honorable Senator stood by Congress and congressional reconstruction. Here, I am sorry to say, he stopped. He had freed the slave, and, in the spirited language of the President of the United States, he proposed to let him take care of himself. Mr. Johnson had organized these States. He had put the old slave-masters exclusively in power. They had enacted vagrant laws to take possession of the negro bodily. The courts of the slave States were closed against the negro. There was no course of administration of justice in all the southern States for the negro. The Senator knew that. He knew that under the laws of the southern States there was no such thing as protection to person or property or redress for grievance for colored men, no courts in which the negro could be permitted to tell the truth in vindication of his own rights, and that the heel of oppression was on the neck of the former slave. He was held to be a "freedman," belonged to a subordinate and inferior race, and that his status was a question exclusively belonging to the States.

Under these circumstances, the Congress of the United States introduced a bill to protect him in his civil rights; a bill which assumed that, having freed him, we are bound to protect him; a bill which in equity and good conscience I think the world approves. Not to have done it would have been infamy in the American Congress. To free him and leave him to the domination and tyranny and oppression of the old master would have been a cruelty. This is what that bill contemplated; and when we came to that the honorable Senator voted no. What is the justification for that? Has the honorable Senator ever explained it? Is it explainable? Is the denial of protection to an American citizen explainable in law, in equity, or in good conscience? Sir, it would have been a shame to the nation and it would have become a by-word and a hissing in the general judgment of the nations of the earth if it had failed to vindicate its authority and its sense of justice. Here the honorable Senator breaks away from congressional reconstruction and stands on the message of the President of the United States, who says it is no concern of Congress what becomes of the negro; he is an inferior man, as if that was an argument justifying oppression.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. As the honorable Senator is not stating my position—

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. No; I am stating what the President said.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The honorable Senator referred to me.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I am stating what the President said, and what the Senator indorsed by his vote.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If the honorable Senator will allow me, I simply desire to say in relation to that matter, that I did not maintain that no duty was imposed on this Government under the constitutional amendment to secure the freedom and the rights of the negro; and I introduced a bill on that subject myself into the Senate, which I have no doubt was constitutional. On the other hand, I have never doubted that certain clauses in the civil rights bill were unconstitutional, and therefore I voted against it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Of course. The point is known; the honorable Senator voted against it. That is my argument. The civil rights bill shows for itself. It was protection to the freedmen. It was in the first place, in its preamble the sublimest declaration in legislation in this country or any other, as I remember it. It commenced with a declaration which I am happy to say found a response in the argument of the Senator from Maryland, "that every native-born person is an American citizen." I say it is the sublimest declaration in all history. Up to that hour such a declaration by the American Congress were a legal impossibility; but old things had passed away in the progress of the events of the war; it had acquired the authority, and it embraced the first opportunity to announce it.

But the honorable Senator from Wisconsin has another difficulty about the reconstruction policy. He is afraid of the effects of negro suffrage on the "Caucasian." The Caucasian, he says, is the superior of all human type. The Caucasian is the historic man. He is lord on this continent. He is the man on horseback who has a right to dominate all other classes. Sir, I doubt whether, in a nation that gathers its population from all the tribes and nations and kindreds and families of men this doctrine will gain the popular favor. How many "Caucasians" of pure blood are there here? We have gathered our population from all the nations of the earth—Celts, Moors, Spaniards, &c.—and it is supposed there are some Anglo-Saxons. I never saw one; but there may be some of the pure blood. In such a nation as this it is supposed that under our principles of government somebody who is whiter than another has a right to rule all the rest; and, in the instance of the honorable Senator from Wisconsin, it is the Caucasian. It has been suggested to me that if the Circassian were here the Caucasian would have a competitor and a rival. The Circassian thinks he is the better man altogether. I tell the honorable Senator if one of the finest specimens of the Circassian were here he might find a rival in beauty and form and grace which I am afraid the ladies might prefer. [Laughter.]

But, Mr. President, this idea of race in the Government of the United States is an absurdity. There is no such thing. Is there any race or color in the Declaration of Independence? Is there any race or color in the Constitution of the United States? Was there any race or color in the American constitutions of the several States which were formed during the revolutionary era? One sublime doctrine underlay the whole of them—equal rights to all, except as to the condition of servitude, and all free-men stood upon the platform of equality before the law.

Then, Mr. President, I must notice, also, that the honorable Senator from Wisconsin has another—what with great respect to him I must denominate—political infirmity. He has an apprehension which controls his political conduct, his policy as a statesman and American Senator; an apprehension of "the antagonism of races." It is the burden of his speech—a frightful antagonism of race to be brought about by what? By putting the ballot into the hands of the negro. What is he going to do with it? Beat out the brains of the Caucasian? [Laughter.] Dominate over him? Rule him, with all his intellectual and numerical superiority? About half a million of blacks will have the ballot, and that half million are going to dominate the American people, thirty-five million in number, and rule them!

The honorable Senator from Wisconsin would put the Senate of the United States in the bad eminence of saying that we have overthrown the Constitution of the United States in "order" to inaugurate negro domination. Now, I want to know if he believes that? Is not that a vagary of an excited imagination? Is that an American sentiment? Is it logic? Is it sense? Is it history? Is it anything recognized among sensible men anywhere as a basis of legislation? We are to legislate on an apprehension, and the apprehension explained is, that half a million of negroes, if they are allowed to vote in a particular locality, will dominate the land. This is really the position of the Senator in his recent speech. It will never be believed by posterity, of course; at least I hope not; but it is in the speech; and Congress is arraigned by that Senator and the speech is published and sent out to the nation to prove that we are overturning this Constitution—that is our purpose, that is our intent, that is what we mean, and in this way—"to put the negro in power."

Mr. FESSENDEN. By the bayonet.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Yes; by the bayonet. I forgot that. We mean to do it by the bayonet. The honorable Senator from Wisconsin is so frightened from all sense of propriety that he rises in the Senate and says he trembles for his country; the Caucasians are to be subjugated. Now, sir, is there any such antagonism anywhere in the races as the Senator supposes? If there is, will the honorable Senator begood enough to tell me whether it is an inherent principle in man; whether the Almighty Maker of heaven and earth, the Parent of all of us, implanted in our innermost being a principle of destruction so that it should come to pass that whenever we came in contact we would fall upon each other like beasts of prey?

The honorable Senator very properly, but very frequently, appeals to his conscience and to the principles of Christianity as inculcated by Him "who spake as never man spake." That is all well; but does this antagonism of race harmonize with the doctrine of Christianity? If I remember anything about the doctrine of Christianity, that which underlies the whole system, that which is itself the gospel of good tidings to man, ignores the whole of this, treats it as a mean, low prejudice, to be put away, and proclaims "God has made of one blood all the families of men to dwell upon the face of the earth." Nay more; it inculcates the brotherhood of the race. It preaches the good tidings that men are brothers; that the inherent tendencies of their being is love and good will; that if they were properly indoctrinated by the sublime doctrines of the Gospel, they would fraternize; that it is only heathenism that hates; it is only the narrow and mean prejudices of men. Talk about the antagonism of the races!

Sir, I commend the honorable Senator to his Bible, to his closet, to meditation, and to prayer to be relieved from the unworthy prejudice of the antagonism of races, which does not exist, which is rank infidelity. Legislate on an apprehension and keep the negro in bondage! Why? Because if you let him at large, he will fly in the face of the white race, and then comes destruction! Who will get hurt? He is afraid the negro. The negro is willing to take his chance. I confess to a willingness to see the experiment tried—all parties having fair play. [Laughter.]

But these notions of the honorable Senator are disclosed in many ways. It is not new, not peculiar to this case. We had this question in another shape early in 1862 on the emancipation of the slaves in the District of Columbia. The Senator was exercised with the same apprehension then; and it showed itself in an amendment that these negroes must be deported if they were freed. Why? "There would be murders in the streets of Washington, vagrancy, disorder."

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The honorable Senator will allow me to state that it was another Senator who moved the amendment to the bill that those who were emancipated must be deported, and I moved an amendment to the amendment that none should be deported unless they were willing to go.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The Senator voted for deportation.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Of those who were willing to go; not for their deportation unless they were willing.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Does the Senator suppose his qualification changes the principle of which I have been speaking? If he cannot stay with safety he ought to go. Why the necessity of his deportation? Because it is not safe for him to be here. Then he ought to go, whether he is willing or not. That is the answer to that argument. But I remember the honorable Senator's argument on that occasion very well. It was to show the inferiority of the negro; that he could not live in the presence of the white man; that he was perishing, dying out, and had better be carried out of the country. The honorable Senator has many times repeated it here since the war, that his belief was that two million of them, I think—a very large proportion of them, at any rate—had perished during the war.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. That is true.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Nothing further from the truth. The records of the Freedmen's Bureau show that they have not decreased, and there is a very good reason for it. They stayed at home out of danger, to a very great extent, owing to the circumstances under which the war was conducted. But that is not to the purpose further than to show how unfounded is this apprehension under which the honorable Senator labors, which controls his action and his votes here, and binds him to the policy of the President of the United States.

I have a few words of reply to the honorable Senator from Indiana, [Mr. HENDRICKS.] He very properly opposes congressional reconstruction on the opinion he entertains. He believes in the "abiding rights of the States." He believes with that famous body of men which convened at Philadelphia in 1866 to enforce the policy of the President, and who were touched even to tears, it is said, by the thought that the day when all men were to be of one mind politically and of their way of thinking, would become affectionate and kind to each other, was fast dawning. They resolved that the rights of the States were "abiding rights;" that they existed in the beginning, during the whole war, and at its conclusion. Having thus resolved they proceeded, in a qualified way, to indorse President Johnson, whose policy was based upon exactly the reverse of that doctrine. I have always supposed that if that convention had acted at all consistent with their opinions they would have recommended the President to Congress for impeachment; but neither they nor the President made a point of the principles of either. The President, the late rebels, the anti-war Democrats, had an issue of reconstruction of rebel States with Congress and with the great Union party of the war; and being agreed in the purpose of getting into power again in the nation, what were principles?

The honorable Senator from Indiana stands on the doctrine which he enunciates that the State governments, through the war, lost no rights; that they "brought all their constitutions with them through the conflict." But the honorable Senator indorses the policy of the President. In this the Senator will allow me to say that I think he is not consistent with himself. I propose by the exhibit in open court of his record and that of the President to force him to the abandonment of his position. Whether he will come to our side or not I do not know; but that is a matter of which he must judge. It may be the honorable Senator will take the side of his Democratic friends in the South, who would rather have military despotism than reconstruction under Congress.

The honorable Senator assumes that the policy of President Johnson was based upon the recognition of the existence of the State governments. If that is so, the Senator is right in supporting it. If it is not so, he will agree with me that there is no foundation for his faith. In the first place, it should be observed that the Senator from Indiana undertakes for support to connect the policy of Mr. Lincoln with the policy of President Johnson. He says the two are identical; and that Mr. Johnson inherited this policy from President Lincoln; that they were both founded upon the idea that the States had not lost their organizations; and both went upon the policy of restoring the old State governments. Let us see how that is. The first act on record, as I remember, of President Lincoln on this subject was his proclamation of the 8th of December, 1863, in which he proposes organization for the States there, as he supposed, in the military possession of the armies of the United States. In this proclamation in which he introduced the subject of the condition of these States, is this language:

"Whereas a rebellion now exists whereby the loyal State governments of several States have for a long time been—"

What?

"subverted."

Subverted, overthrown, destroyed. That is the Lincoln policy, flat and square. And further, in some directions to the military authorities with regard to resuscitating these States, he uses this language:

"And being a qualified voter by the election law of the State existing immediately before the so-called act of secession, and excluding all others, shall—"

What? Be restored? No.

"shall reestablish a State government."

But a more significant fact still is this, that in 1865, just before the death of President Lincoln, at the surrender of Lee, when the rebel authorities of the State of Virginia, "all having come through the war," according to the Senator, their organizations all complete, legal States, all ready for readmission, restored to the Union by the surrender of Lee, undertook to exercise State authority. The President issued his order repudiating their action. He denied their authority, and held that all their powers were lost in the rebellion.

But the honorable Senator thinks he finds plenary proof, which concludes Congress. To use his own words, "Congress is concluded on this question." Congress in 1864, just before the adjournment of the session of that year, passed a bill for provisional governments, sometimes called the Winter Davis bill, which provided for the reconstruction of these States, and the honorable Senator tells us that President Lincoln did what would seem to be quite an unseemly thing; that he was so determined that Congress should not interfere with his prerogative that he "flung the bill" defiantly in the face of Congress, as much as to say, "Attend to your own affairs; I am the United States; I claim the right to reconstruct or reorganize these States; Congress has nothing to do with it; I defy Congress." I denounce Congress, would be the implication fairly from the language of the Senator. "It is none of your concern whatever; it is my business; and in due time I will restore, as I am restoring, the States." Now, what was the fact?

President Lincoln did not "sign that bill." Why? "It was sent to him only an hour before the adjournment." He had had an idea that some of these States might be brought in in another way; he had experimental organizations in Louisiana and in Arkansas, and was embarrassed on that account. How were those governments organized? Were the old State governments recognized? No, sir; Louisiana was organized on the basis of one tenth of her population, with a new government in all respects, and that government was organized at New Orleans while the rebels were carrying on their "old State government" in two thirds of the entire territory of that State. And yet the Senator from Indiana rises here and tells the Senate that we are concluded on this question; that President Lincoln had intended to restore "the old State governments." The President, in words altogether decorous, as was his wont, said to Congress, that while he could not, without embarrassment, sign the bill, that he had no objection to the policy, and in the future would observe it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Will the Senator allow me to ask him one question?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Yes, sir.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to know if President Lincoln, in that proclamation, while he referred to the case of Louisiana and Arkansas, did not expressly say that he was unprepared by a formal approval of that bill to be inflexibly committed to any single plan of restoration; and did he not in the same proclamation say that he was pleased well enough with the plan suggested by Congress, but that he would not be bound to it as a law would bind him; but that, if the people went on with the work of the restoration of their States, the Executive would recognize the governments made by them, and would guaranty them in their republican form?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I think he said something to that effect; but that is not the point to which I am adverting. He said he did not wish to be bound to any definite plan for all the States; but he did say, in so many words, as the Senator will find, that he had no objection to this plan, and would observe it in the future, not for all the States, because he had two States he meant to except. He always intended to restore, if it were practicable, in his own way, the States of Louisiana and Arkansas. He felt committed to it. He felt that his faith was involved in it, although they were based on a principle anti-American and anti-republican, which never could have been recognized by an American Congress, that one tenth of the loyal voters should organize a State. Still the President was attached to it, and that was the principal reason for his dissent from that bill.

But it is said now for President Johnson's policy that it is identical with that of Mr. Lincoln. If it is, then, it is not in harmony with the opinions of the honorable Senator on the record, and so not entitled to his support. The first act of Mr. Johnson's Administration upon the event after he came into power is a significant one, and is conclusive, I think, on the point raised by the honorable Senator. I think Lee surrendered before President Johnson was sworn into office, and General Johnston surrendered a short time afterward.

Mr. CONKLING. On the 18th of April, 1865, and President Lincoln was killed on the 14th.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The country knows that on the surrender of General Johnston a proposition was made by which all the southern States, in the language of the honorable Senator from Indiana, were to be recognized as having brought through blood and peril of civil war their constitutions and State governments, and they were to be offered as a living sacrifice on the altar of the Constitution of the United States, and to be introduced into the Union with all their rights, privileges, and dignity unimpaired, as the phrase is. Did the President assent to it? He issued an order repudiating it absolutely, declaring that it was a proposition not to be entertained, not to be considered. Sir, does that look like recognizing and restoring these "old State governments?"

But the proclamation which the honorable Senator has quoted from and commented upon, and which he asserts binds President Johnson to the policy of guarantying the old State governments, is most important to my purpose. I will read what the honorable Senator said, so that I may do him no injustice:

"In the first place, I will state that he directed each of the departments to extend its operations into the southern States."

There is a recognition, says the honorable Senator.

"Then he goes on with the work of providing for restoration: and what propositions does he lay down? First, he recognizes the old State government of North Carolina, just as he had done in Tennessee, just as Congress did in admitting Tennessee, with the recitals in the preamble; for, after appointing a provisional governor and giving him instructions, he says—"

Here is the proof—

"A convention composed of delegates to be chosen by that portion of the people of said State who are loyal to the United States, and no others, for the purpose of altering or amending the constitution thereof."

He quotes further, as follows:

"And with authority to exercise within the limits of said State all the powers necessary and proper to enable such loyal people of the State of North Carolina to restore said State to its constitutional relations to the Federal Government."

And there it stops. There is a period. That is the full sentence. That is the complete expression of the President of the United States, as the honorable Senator quotes it to the Senate, and as he intends it shall go to the country to prove his position. Now, what is the whole of it?

"And with authority to exercise within the limits of said State all the powers necessary and proper to enable such loyal people of the State of North Carolina to restore said State to its constitutional relations to the Federal Government, and to present?"

Here is the point—

"and to present such a republican form of State government as will entitle the State to the guarantee of the United States therefor, and its people to protection by the United States against invasion, insurrection, and domestic violence."

There the sentence ends. The Senator finds it convenient to sustain his argument to divide the sentence, to break off in the middle of the sentence; so that where he makes it end it means one thing, and where it does end it means another and quite the reverse. Where it does end it means the reconstruction of a republican government. Of course, the Senator did not see that it had that effect. He quoted it altogether inadvertently, I am bound to believe. The honorable Senator, of course, in the hurry of the discussion, under the impulses of the moment, intent on proving his point, quoted enough to prove the point, and forgot, omitted, overlooked, did not see the significance or relation of the rest of the sentence.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Will the Senator allow me one moment?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Certainly.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not choose to accept the defense made by the Senator for me. I understood exactly what I was saying. The point that I was making was this, as the Senator has stated: that, notwithstanding the contradictory statement in the preamble in that proclamation, in the body of the bill, if I may so express it, the President authorized the provisional governor to call a convention, and that convention to amend the constitution. My argument was, that if the President did not recognize the old constitution as an existing thing it could not be amended; that the doctrine that the State government had gone out of existence and that the constitution had ceased as a law would have required the President to call for a convention to make a State government; but that when the President proposed an amendment to the State constitution he recognized that instrument as an existing thing. Therefore I think that my quotation for the purpose of establishing that proposition was full, ample, and complete, and that the residue of the sentence does not interfere with the logic of the position I assumed.

SENATE.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. My point was to show the Senator that the President of the United States did not recognize the existing State governments.

Mr. HENDRICKS. That is your proposition.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. And that the quotation of the Senator, ending where it did, seemed to prove that he did; and ending where it really ends, repels that inference. I think whoever reads the speech and sees the comments which the Senator makes upon it will find that he is impaled exactly on that last clause, which he did not quote. Of course I attribute nothing except what is honorable to him. I relieve him of all embarrassment of intention on this subject; but in the way he quotes it, he will allow me to say, it bears a false light to the Senate and the country; it is tampering with the witness in open court; it makes him say what he did not intend to say. That is the way it stands, and I leave the Senator to his explanation.

If it were necessary to press that argument any further I could find the reply to it in another part of what the Senator has undertaken to prove by the policy of Mr. Lincoln. Of course he is supposed to know all about President Johnson's position on this subject, whether he believed the States came through the civil war or not. Since he has become in some sense, some very important sense, his champion and defender on this floor, he is supposed to be conversant with his opinions and sentiments on this subject. He says, in "the first place," that the President of the United States "recognizes the old State government of North Carolina as existing." Let us see what he does recognize. This, mind you, sir, is a proclamation addressed to the people of North Carolina with the view of recognizing their State government. What does he say of its condition? Of course he must have had in his mind when he issued his proclamation the condition of the State—whether it was a State government to be recognized or whether it was a State government to be reorganized and reestablished. Among the "whereases" setting out the general condition of affairs, among other things attributable to the war, he says:

"And whereas the rebellion, which has been waged by a portion of the people of the United States against the properly constituted authorities of the Government thereof in the most violent and revolting form, but whose organized and armed forces have now been almost entirely overcome, has in its revolutionary progress—"

The Senator did not notice that word "revolutionary," I greatly fear. "In its revolutionary progress" it had done what? Revolutionized, of course, subverted, overthrown. "In its revolutionary progress" what has it done? "Brought the old State governments through the war," says the Senator; but the President says it has "deprived the people of the State of North Carolina of all civil government." Did he use that language unwittingly? The Senator says it is a preamble. Well, the preamble is a recital of facts. That is the object of a preamble. It is put in to give solemnity to the event, to bring the subject matter distinctly before the body that is to act upon it. The President says that in the revolutionary progress of events the rebellion has destroyed all civil government in North Carolina, every vestige of it; there is nothing left. Did he make a mistake about that? Let us see. I find in the report of the Committee on Reconstruction language used by Mr. Johnson, in speaking of the effects of the rebellion, to Mr. Stearns:

"The State institutions are prostrated, laid on the ground"—

"Come through?" What must be done with them?

"And they must be taken up"—

And what then?

"And adapted to the progress of events."

What does that mean? To restore the old State governments? No, sir; but they must be reorganized and reestablished and reconstructed and put in harmony with the revolutionary progress of events. That is what he said. I should like to hear the Senator explain the meaning of those words.

Mr. HENDRICKS. What do you read from?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I am reading from the report of the Reconstruction Committee. They found that to have been a fact and reported it to the Senate.

Now, Mr. President, I am done with the honorable Senator from Indiana. My only object was to satisfy him that his adhesion to the policy of the President of the United States was upon a mistaken state of facts altogether, a misconception of his principles, and that he is at perfect liberty to abandon his policy; and I submit to him whether he is not in duty bound to abandon his policy, now that he sees that it is absolutely inconsistent and incompatible with the principles which he avows and maintains; that the surrender of Lee was the restoration of the Union; that these States were entitled by that surrender to be recognized by the Government of the United States with all their rights, privileges, and dignity unimpaired.

A single reflection and I shall relieve the patience of the Senate. Senators on that side of the Chamber all close with a solemn prediction that reconstruction by Congress would prove a failure. If it fails it is to fail for what? Because it is not in harmony with the principles of our institutions? Because it is repugnant to the principles of American liberty? Because it is not consonant with the principles of justice? Because it is likely to be oppressive to any class of the community? Is it obnoxious to any of these suggestions? Does any Senator rise here and say that this is an absolute injustice to any class of men? It is said, sir, that it outlaws certain rebels. No, sir; to assert that is to talk inaccurately; it outlaws nobody. It enfranchises everybody except the guiltiest of the guilty. Their war on the Union disfranchised the people of these States. Their war on the Government of the country they were bound to honor, to love, and maintain "outlawed" them. They lost all their rights by rebellion and civil war. We have magnanimously enfranchised all but the few leaders steeped in guilt. We enact no bills of pains and penalties, decree no forfeitures. We restore them to all their rights of person and property. We give them their rights as American citizens to the fullest extent. We are willing to forgive the masses of the people; but as to those men who committed the unpardonable political sin of having sworn to support the Constitution of the United States and then conspired against it, made causeless war upon it, they may not again be intrusted with power. Other nations in other times would have hung, drawn, and quartered these men or driven them from the country. Davis is abroad, fêted, feasted in northern cities. A great and magnanimous people can endure these things, but cannot agree to confide offices of trust and power to men who have once betrayed it, unless it would consent to have secession, insurrection, and civil war reenacted. These men regret nothing but their defeat.

One significant fact stands confessed, that the Johnson States are neither in form or in effect republican States; that those States disqualify and hold in a state of total civil and political disability an entire class of citizens of the United States. In some of the States a majority of the citizens of the State within their limits, men declared to be citizens by the Constitution of the United States, are utterly disfranchised and denied all civil rights. Is that a republican State according to the formula of American States? Is that a republican State in essence and in effect according to the American principle? I deny it.

I have to say to my honorable friend from Maryland that I have very strong reasons to suspect that the State which he represents will be found to fall in the category of anti-republican States. Of course I venture no opinion on that subject, not now before the Senate; but I am so thoroughly impressed with its anti-republican character that I take this occasion to say that it is not easy for me to understand how that State can lay claim to be republican either in form or in fact. She enfranchised all her citizens in 1865, I think, when her constitution was changed to conform to the Constitution of the United States. Last year it was made to disfranchise all those people who had been theretofore enfranchised. She has, by her constitution, reduced to practical vassalage and excluded from the privileges of citizenship one-fifth of her entire population, and all citizens of the United States. I repeat, sir, is that a republican State which disfranchises so large a portion of her citizen population?

And that is not the worst of it; as is suggested by my honorable friend from California, [Mr. CONNESS,] it is hardly to be denied they have done that in order to give the disloyal element in that State the absolute supremacy. It bears rule there to-day. That element which would have overthrown this Government with pleasure and delight during the war is in power in Maryland to-day. Her militia offered to some extent by those who served in the rebel army during the rebellion. She sends to her Legislature those who are in sympathy with, and who served in the rebel ranks and with the rebel forces. Nay, sir, she would send to this Hall men who deserted their trusts rather than support the Government of the United States, if she could. There is no more conclusive evidence to my mind of her absolute disloyalty in fact and in purpose than the fact that the honorable Senator from Maryland, who patriotically stood by the country during the war, standing for the Government always, receives but a single vote in the Legislature, while those who would not serve the Government, those who sympathized with the rebellion, are asking admission to this Chamber, under her authority and as her choice.

Nay, sir; from what I see announced in the public journals, and not denied, she has given full evidence of the anti-republican and anti-American spirit that animates her. In all the bills of rights that preceded the constitutions of the several American States inaugurated during the Revolutionary era, you will find the great American doctrine which was most conspicuous in the Declaration of Independence, which underlies the Constitution, set forth as the prominent and fundamental doctrine on which American communities and American institutions were to rest, that "all men are created equal." That was the doctrine of the Declaration of Independence and was copied into the bills of rights of all the States. It was in the bill of rights of Maryland. Where is it now? Expunged from the declaration of rights; and in what spirit? The spirit of disloyalty to the sentiments of the Declaration of Independence and the American Constitution: the spirit that is anti-American; the spirit that is anti-republican—such a spirit cannot fail to brand her as an anti-republican State and an anti-American State not worthy of the companionship and sisterhood of American States.

Southern Land Grants.

SPEECH OF HON. GEO. W. JULIAN,

OF INDIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 4, 1868,

Concluding the argument on the bill (H. R. No. 267) to declare forfeited to the United States certain land grants to aid in the construction of railroads in the States of Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Florida, and for other purposes.

Mr. JULIAN said:

Mr. SPEAKER: If the House will give me its attention, I promise not to detain it long in concluding the argument in support of this measure. It has been extensively debated already, and the discussion has taken a remarkably wide range. We have talked about the Dubuque and Sioux City railroad, about negro suffrage in Montana, about the confiscation of rebel property, and the inferiority of the negro race. I doubt whether a debate ever occurred in this House which was diversified by a richer variety of topics or a wider departure from the real question in dispute.

I propose, therefore, in conclusion, as the House is already weary and the day nearly spent, to deal only with the naked question presented by this bill. And let me remark, in the outset, that there is no question here as to the revival of railroad land grants in the South or in the North. This bill does not tender that issue in any form. Neither the rebel governments of the South nor their rebel corporations have presented that question. It is not before us, and no argument addressed to it is in order. When it comes here I propose that we shall deal with it upon its merits.

Neither is there any question here about the forfeiture of these railroad lands. No, sir. The lands are forfeited to the United States already; and the simple and sole issue is whether we shall open up these lands of the Government to settlement and tillage by the loyal poor who long for them, or allow them to remain in the remorseless grasp of rebel monopolists.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Let me ask the gentleman a question right there.

Mr. JULIAN. I have not time to be interrupted. I must therefore decline.

Mr. Speaker, that is the simple and only issue; and I am surprised, therefore, and I confess myself disappointed quite as much as surprised, at the opposition to this measure which has been volunteered on both sides of this House. These rebel corporations, with the single exception of the New Orleans and Opelousas Railroad Company, have not asked any help at our hands. They are not before us save in the accounts we have of their disloyal conduct during and since the war. It will not do to say that they are not represented on this floor, for the right of petition is and has been all the time freely open to them and to the people of the South, and they might at least have had the decency to ask us if they desired our interposition.

But we are told that we ought to wait until these States have representatives in Congress who can be consulted respecting a measure of so much moment. Why, Mr. Speaker, this is a very strange argument in the mouths of gentlemen on this side of the House. Sir, during the progress of this war we did not wait until representatives came here before we abolished slavery in this District, repealed the fugitive slave law, broke up the coast-wise slave trade, and abolished slavery itself. We did not wait for rebels to be represented here before we passed the constitutional amendment wiping out slavery in the Republic forever, nor did we consult them about the reconstruction of their governments and the conditions on which we would allow them to resume their place in the Union. Why, then, stay our hands in dealing with these corporations on the pretext that no one is here to speak in their behalf?

I know, Mr. Speaker, that there is a pretty well-known individual at the other end of the avenue who has told us for years past that we ought not to legislate here in the absence of ten States of the Union; that it was unconstitutional to deal with their interests until they could be heard in the Senate and the House by their representatives; but this Congress for the last seven years has systematically turned a deaf ear to all suggestions of that character. We have assumed the right to deal with these rebel districts because their people rebelled, and because the loyal element within them had the right to protection at our hands, which could be given in no other way.

Besides, Mr. Speaker, we do not know when these rebel States will be reconstructed. Alabama, it is thought, will be here in a few weeks; but we do not know this. And when will Louisiana and Mississippi and Florida be here? It is quite uncertain; while the multitudes who want homes on these fertile lands of the South cannot afford to be postponed. Certainly they ought not to be, in deference to rebel monopolists, or for any but the strongest of reasons. None such have been given or can be urged. As to the building of these roads by and by, it should be remembered that the settlement and improvement of the country through which they pass will help, and not hinder, such enterprises. When the States shall ask our aid large quantities of coal and iron lands will remain, which cannot be used for agricultural purposes, and are not therefore subject to settlement under the homestead law; and if proper to do so, Congress can grant pecuniary aid, as we have done in other cases.

But it is said, in declaring these lands forfeited and open to settlement, we are making an exception to the ordinary policy of Congress in reference to land grants. Sir, I deny it. We propose no exception by this bill, for the reason that an exception always implies an existing general rule, and there has been no general rule as to the renewal of land grants to rebellious States. If munificent grants of land had heretofore been made to States which thereupon rebelled against the Government of the United States, and we had revived the grants notwithstanding their rebellion, then the forfeiture declared by this bill might be pleaded as an exception to such action. No such case has ever been presented to Congress, and therefore no exception to such supposed action of Congress can be urged. If Michigan, Wisconsin, Minnesota, and Iowa had received grants of millions of acres of land to aid them in building railroads, and following those grants they had turned upon the Government and sought its life, and if especially, the loyal and homeless people of those States had demanded the right of homestead upon the land granted, will any gentlemen opposed to this bill pretend that Congress would not have discriminated in favor of loyal men by opening such lands to settlement and tillage? That, sir, is the only thing proposed by this bill as to these southern lands. Disregarding the wallings of rebel States and corporations, we simply ask, in the interest of the loyal poor, that four or five million acres now criminally withheld from them shall be carved into homesteads and made the basis of productive wealth.

Considerable quantities of these grants are to-day in the occupancy of loyal men, many of them having settled upon them prior as well as subsequent to these grants. These settlers are now at the mercy of rebel capitalists and corporations, and some of them are being driven from the homes on which they have settled and made their improvements in good faith. Shall we, having the power to prevent it, allow these men to be ejected? Is Congress ready to join the President in making treason respectable and giving loyal men the back seats?

But we are told there is no difficulty in getting lands in these regions, and therefore there is no necessity for this enactment. That is the cry which is raised here on both sides of the House. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BLAIR] tells us squarely that any man in these States who wants a home can get it, and that there can be no monopoly of the lands of the United States, with our millions of unoccupied acres. Why, sir, I am astonished at the statement of the gentleman. It is not only in the South, but in the North, also, that difficulties in the way of acquiring homesteads exist.

And I desire to state right here some facts in illustration of this point. According to the last report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, we have granted to the different lines of the Pacific railroad one hundred and twenty-four million acres; and under a recent ruling of the Interior Department double that quantity of land, including an entire belt of forty miles on these several routes, is interdicted from settlement. This makes two hundred and forty-eight million acres. Add to this some fifty-seven million acres which have been granted to other railroads, and we have an aggregate of three hundred and five million acres, being nearly one third of the entire public domain of the United States. This is exclusive of agricultural college scrip, which will amount, when given to all the States, to over nine million acres, and which is rapidly passing into the hands of monopolists. We should add to this the great but indefinite monopoly of the public lands effected through military land warrants, and some seventeen million acres granted for canals and other public improvements, besides over forty-three million acres in all granted to the States as swamp lands, and which have largely gone into the hands of speculators and monopolists. But I wish to speak now especially of our immense grants to railroads. The extent of these grants ought to excite the general alarm of this country. Sir, the railroad power of the United States has no rival to-day among the great forces which govern the country, unless it be in the whisky power, whose remarkable sway is confessed both by the Government and the people. No difficulty in getting homesteads, says the gentleman from Michigan! Sir, I have letters from reliable and prominent men in the Topeka land district in Kansas, stating that the Indian reservations there, as now administered by the Government, and the railroad grants to which I have referred, have made it next to impossible for settlers to acquire homesteads in that district upon any land that is really desirable. Under the prodigal policy of the Government it is every day becoming more and more difficult to acquire a homestead, and I am surprised that gentlemen from the West should not see and confess the fact. And, to make the matter still worse, the Attorney General of the United States has not long since given an elaborate opinion that settlers on the public lands, under the preemption laws, are mere tenants at will, who may be lawfully ejected by the Government at any moment. This opinion, which has been accepted by the Interior Department of the Government as law, puts in peril every preemption and homestead claimant throughout the entire territory of the United States; and I brand it as a flagrant outrage upon justice and a burlesque upon the very name of law. But I return to the question of homesteads in the land States of the South, and to show the difficulty of acquiring them in that section I ask the Clerk to read an extract from a letter I have recently received from Mississippi.

The Clerk read as follows:

"The disadvantages we labor under and the obstacles we meet can never be imagined by one who has not witnessed them. First, the extreme poverty of all Republicans; second, the fact that not one in a hundred live in their own houses and are not at liberty to entertain Republican canvassers; third, not one precinct in a hundred has a house of any kind where Republican meetings can be held; fourth, our enemies, bitter as ever they were during the war, own all the lands and most of the bread, and will try to starve us to vote their way. They are brave men who will fight against such odds."

Mr. JULIAN. That letter shows that in the very region in which the gentleman from Michigan says any man can find a home who wants it, the lands and the bread are in the hands of the rebels. I ask, in the name of humanity, and of common sense, how can the homeless and starving poor acquire homes under such circumstances? The government there, the ruling class, and the railroads are against them, and I call it a mockery to ask these helpless people to fight their battle unaided.

Any man, we are told, who wants a homestead can find it. I ask the gentleman from Michigan to remember, I ask this House to remember, what I said the other day, that of the agricultural regions of these States more than fifty-two million acres are in the hands of monopolists; that fourteen fifteenths of the people of these States, outside of their cities and towns, are without homes of their own, and to a great extent without the ability to acquire them; that some twenty-six million acres heretofore granted to these States as swamp lands have been bought up and are now held by the leading rebels of the South as a frightful monopoly from which all loyal men are excluded; and that the great body of the lands subject to settlement under the southern homestead law are almost worthless for tillage. If lands were as abundant in the South as gentlemen have attempted to show, the fact would destroy their strong argument against this bill; for the forfeiture of the few millions which it proposes would leave an ample supply for the railroads. Sir, the opposition to this bill proves that I am right in my statements.

Why, sir, the evidence comes to us through every newspaper from the South and every letter from the South, which speaks of the condition of the poor, that the sacred right of homestead is resolutely denied to the loyal masses, who are thus reduced to a condition of servitude and helplessness. The rebel landowner will neither sell his lands in small homesteads nor rent them on the shares, nor lease them in any form, unless he does it as a means of compelling the poor to renounce their loyalty. In this connection allow me to read extracts from two letters which I find in the huge volumes of southern correspondence with the Congressional Executive Committee, on file in their rooms:

"The rebels are using every means in their power to oppress and distress the freedmen. They are swindling them in every conceivable way, and turning them adrift without a mouthful to eat and nowhere to go. They say to these persecuted and outraged people, 'You have brought all this misery and distress upon yourselves by voting for the damned Radicals. Go to the damned scoundrels and see what they will do for you. We have the land and they have none. You may starve and go to hell, where we intend to send you and your damned rascally, Radical, scoundrel friends.' Hunger and starvation are hard masters. Notwithstanding all this outrageous and oppressive treatment, these old rebel tyrant masters are not able to seduce any of them from their tried and faithful loyalty to the Government. Should these true, loyal, and suffering supporters of the Government be left to the mercy of these traitors, or be left to starve on account of their loyalty and faithfulness to the Government? I am in hopes that Congress and our radical Republican friends in the North will take our situation and condition under consideration, and devise some means to render us immediate relief."

Mr. Speaker, this letter comes from Mississippi, one of the States named in this bill, and I commend it to the consideration of gentlemen who think the poor of the South abundantly able to take care of themselves. "We have the land," say the rebels, and "you may starve and go to hell." And will gentlemen on this floor and on this side of the House espouse the cause of railroad corporations which are controlled by such men? The writer of the letter I have read expresses the perfectly reasonable hope that "Congress and our Radical Republican friends in the North will take our situation and condition under consideration, and devise some means to render us immediate relief." Sir, that is just what I propose by the measure before us, so far as it may be possible, and I cannot believe that this House will be found wanting in its duty. Let us not dishonor the record we have made in uniformly standing by the rights of loyal men in their struggles against their rebel oppressors.

Let me read an extract from one other letter:

"You will see by this letter some part of the condition of our vicinity. The freedmen held a meeting to-day, but framed no resolutions, for the reason that the landowners or the employers are turning off a majority of the freedmen. They do not intend to work for $100 a year and board themselves. The trouble is, the rebels will not employ those in the leagues or those who voted for a convention. What we are to do the Almighty only knows; but we will lay hold of the strength of our God and go forward, for He has blessed our cause. The employers have taken every grain of corn from the poor freedmen, besides all the cotton. There are a great many now homeless and destitute, without corn and without anything. The prospect is gloomy. Unless something is done starvation is inevitable; while on the other side they have plenty to live upon. Some few are renting their lands to the freedmen for a third share, but they have to get something to plow with and provisions where they can. Major Drake's and Henry Roger's tenants have told me that they were stripped of all corn and cotton and left to starve. The poor whites are faring no better. There was a poor white man in the neighborhood taken sick; he was a league man and favored a convention. They sent for three physicians; none attended him; the poor man suffered and died, and was buried. Major Drake said, 'dig a hole and put him in it.' We give only an outline of the treatment by the rebels. If they are not brought down we shall have a worse time than we have ever experienced. Since I commenced this letter we have been informed by James Peterkin's tenants that he turned them off without anything. We have not time to state the injustice and unrighteous conduct of the able class of people who oppress the poor and treat them with contempt and disdain. Every stumbling-block is thrown in the way, if possible, to subjugate the laborer. It is tax-gathering time. The freedmen are willing to pay their taxes if they had the means, but as everything has been taken from them they have nothing to pay with. When the deputy finds one able to pay he takes advantage of him."

Mr. Speaker, this letter speaks for itself, and is a single specimen of the many which find their way from the land of starvation and misrule, pleading for the interposition of Congress. Shall we turn a deaf ear to this general cry of distress? Shall our action here, speaking louder than words, admonish these homeless people that they "may starve and go to hell?"

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. In connection with the branch of the subject now being discussed by the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands he will allow me to say that I have caused to be prepared from official sources in the General Land Office and Census Bureau a table showing the amount of land subject to homestead entry in Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Florida; the number of homesteads at eighty acres each, with population, &c., which will show to some extent the necessity of the bill under consideration.

From this table it will be seen that if all the land subject to homestead entry is arable and accessible in three of these States the number of male citizens needing homesteads exceeds the number of homesteads. Thus the number of male citizens needing homesteads and the number of homesteads are as follows:

	Number of citizens.	Number of homesteads.
Alabama.....	86,024	86,437
Mississippi.....	86,439	61,625
Louisiana.....	118,904	82,275
Total.....	291,367	230,337

This leaves sixty-one thousand and thirty citizens unprovided with homesteads. To supply these would require 4,882,400 acres. The amount of land certified to these three States for railroad purposes is 3,112,565 acres, still leaving a deficiency if all the railroad lands could be appropriated for homesteads.

But it is well understood that not one half of the lands now subject to homestead entry can be located for that purpose. Much of it is mountainous or barren sands, incapable of cultivation. In any event, many deserving and needy citizens must be left without homesteads.

If the lands shall be located for homesteads the wisdom of this bill will be demonstrated. If lands are left unentered, when we come to consider the propriety and the terms of land grants to railroad companies we can then decide what ought to be done.

I will ask to have the table incorporated with this debate in the Globe.

Mr. JULIAN. I shall be quite willing to have these facts go out with my speech.

Mr. BLAINE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a single question?

Mr. JULIAN. No, sir; I have not time.

Mr. BLAINE. Then I object to that table going in the Globe.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Then I ask to have it read as a part of my remarks.

The Clerk proceeded to read the table, but after some minutes was interrupted by Mr. BLAINE, who said: More time has been consumed in the reading than my question would have occupied. I will now withdraw the objection.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I renew it. I want to hear the table read.

The Clerk then concluded the reading of the table, which is as follows:

States.	Acres, subject to homestead entry.	Number of homesteads of eighty acres each, can be located if all the lands are suitable.	Males over twenty-one.		Total over twenty-one.	Farms of three acres and over.	Males not owning farms.

Mr. JULIAN resumed the floor.

Mr. INGERSOLL. If the gentleman will yield to me, I will move that the House adjourn, as it is getting late.

Mr. BLAINE. Let the previous question be seconded before we adjourn.

Mr. JULIAN. I am willing to go on now if the House wishes it. [Cries of "Go on."]

Mr. INGERSOLL. The best way to see if the House wishes it is to let the motion to adjourn be put.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. We are very anxious to hear the speech of the gentleman from Indiana.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the time occupied in putting the motion to adjourn will come out of the time of the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. JULIAN. Very well; I will proceed now and will not occupy much further time.

But it is further objected to the passage of this bill that the great want of the people of these States is education, knowledge, and this point was particularly emphasized by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BLAINE] the other day. He argues that if you give a man education he will know how to acquire a homestead. Mr. Speaker, I agree that an educated man will be much able to acquire a home and to make his way through the world than one who is without education; I concede that, of course. But in the name of decency I ask how are the landless poor of the South, who, as I have already shown, are at the mercy of the rebels, to acquire an education? That is the previous question before this House, and I beg that it may be remembered.

"It is idle," says a leading London newspaper, "to talk of secular education, it is idle to talk of religious instruction, while the great mass of the people have no homes. How are we to teach, how are we to instruct; what can the schoolmaster achieve, what the preacher, when the intellects which the one would clove and the hearts which the other would teach are left to the cruel training of the streets." Sir, the immediate want of the people of these States is not education, but homes. They need their natural rights. Education and morality and the soundest orthodox preaching will be palliatives at best. They want independent homesteads, and bread—as the beginning and grand condition precedent of all other blessings. As I argued on this floor years ago, "Labor must be rendered honorable, and gainful by securing to the laborer the fruits of his toil. Instead of the spirit of caste and the law of hate, which have so long blasted these regions, we must build up homogeneous communities in which the interest of each will be recognized as the interest of all. Instead of an overshadowing aristocracy, founded on the monopoly of the soil, and its dominion over the poor, we must have no order of nobility but that of the laboring masses of the country, who fight its battles in war and constitute its glory and its strength in peace."

Sir, I agree with the gentleman from Michigan that the poor should be taught to help themselves; and to this very end I would, as far as possible, secure to every poor man a home. Just so far as this can be done will the way be opened for the establishment of common schools and the education of the whole people; but it is nonsense to talk about general education when the policy of independent homesteads, guarded by law, is superseded by the monopoly of the soil in the hands of a few.

Why, sir, look at England, where a single landholder can mount his horse in front of his dwelling and ride a hundred miles in a straight line to the sea on his own land; and not only owning the soil, but the laborers who till it, and governing them according to his absolute will. This system of English serfdom is scarcely less galling than was our own system of chattel slavery; and it must be broken up as the preliminary to any educational policy which can really reach the mass of the people. The landless millions of England must have their God-given right to homes upon her soil; and just so far as this shall be done will education be brought within the reach of the people.

Sir, to taunt these helpless loyalists of the South, as has been done by gentlemen on this floor, to say to the poor freedman down there that all he wants is to learn how to take care of himself, is to trample justice and humanity under our feet. It is to insult those who have no power to resent what we do. It is like telling a drowning man, gasping for life, that his duty is to learn how to save himself instead of throwing out a plank for his rescue. The loyal millions of the South, who have been true to the Government under the greatest of trials and sufferings, deserve to be met in quite a different spirit. We have no right to exhort them to take care of themselves while we systematically withhold from them the means of asserting their rights as American citizens.

Mr. Speaker, I do not propose, in view of the present temper of this House and the lateness of the hour, to prolong this argument further. I intended to do so, but I trust it is not necessary. The simple question is, as I have said, between rebel corporations on the one hand and loyal settlers on the other, as to who shall possess and control four or five million acres of land. That is the issue; and to say that you will discriminate in favor of the rebel corporations at the expense of these loyal settlers is to go counter to the whole policy of Congress for the last six or seven years. That policy has been to discriminate on the side of loyalty; and it is just as needful that we should break up these rebel corporations as it was to break up the rebel State governments of the South. The power of a rebel railroad corporation may be less than the power of a rebel State government, or it may be greater, but both should be dismantled, and for precisely the same reasons; and I am astonished that gentlemen on this side of the House should be so ready to rush into the service of these corporations, at the expense and in forgetfulness of the rights of loyal men, and of the record they have made here since the beginning of the late war.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him one more question?

Mr. JULIAN. Certainly.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I would be glad to know of the gentleman whether these railroad corporations are not now in the hands of men who, if they continue to control these lands, will refuse to allow any of them to go into the hands of the freedmen of the South.

Mr. JULIAN. I can certainly answer that question in the affirmative, and have already submitted proofs of it. Those corporations, with perhaps one or two exceptions, are in the hands of the enemies of the loyal people of the South, the enemies of reconstruction, the enemies of the Government; and as evidence of that fact I had read by the Clerk the other day the official statement of Captain Hamill, transmitted to this House by General Grant, showing that during the war all the machinery of these infernal organizations was welded incessantly on the side of the rebellion. That fact is shown also by the testimony taken by the committee on southern railroads, which is now placed on the desks of members.

The policy of these corporations has been that of the rebel element generally, that of oppression, misrule, and starvation, as means of swerving loyal men from their faith. This I have shown already, and in the very nature of things it must be the fact. It is a part of the logic of baffled treason.

Mr. Speaker, having indicated what I think and how I feel on this question, let me say one word respecting a motion which I understand is to be made, and then I will submit the question to the judgment of the House. I learn that a motion is to be made by some gentleman to lay on the table the motion to reconsider the recommitment of this bill, which motion, if carried, would send the bill back to the Committee on Public Lands and kill it; for I say to this House (and I know something about the order of its business) that if the motion to reconsider be laid on the table and the bill is thus recommitted there will be no hope of its resurrection during this Congress, or at least during the present session. It has been whispered to me that the interests of the Republican party require that we should postpone action on this subject till December, and I know that that is the object of the motion. So far as that issue is concerned, let me say that I would a hundred times rather shoulder the responsibility of giving homes to these landless loyalists than vote down the proposition in the interest of rebels, or for any reason that has been given to this House. Let us do right, and not fear that the heavens will fall as the result. As to the motion to lay on the table, I ask gentlemen to take notice of what I again repeat, that to lay on the table is to defeat the bill. The country shall be advertised of that fact, and I am sure will not be misled respecting it.

I now demand the previous question.

It was seconded, and the bill was passed.

Report on Southern Railroads.

HO. OF REPS.

igation required by the following resolution, December 4, 1866:

"Resolved, That a committee of five be appointed to examine into and report to the House of Representatives, at the next session of Congress:

"The past and present relations existing between the Federal Government and the railroads in the States lately in rebellion;

"The amount of money expended by the United States authorities in constructing, repairing, equipping, and managing said roads;

"The amount of money each of said railroad companies is owing to the Government, and all other facts that may be deemed of importance in connection with these subjects;

"And they shall also report what, in their opinion, would be the proper course to be taken by the Government in regard to such railroads or railroad companies.

"The committee shall be authorized to send for persons and papers, and, when thought necessary by them, may employ a clerk, and may report progress at any time."

On the 12th July, 1867, the duties of the committee were enlarged by the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the select Committee on Southern Railroads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill declaring forfeited to the United States all lands granted by Congress in the year 1856 to Mississippi, Alabama, Florida, Louisiana, and Arkansas, to aid in the construction of railroads, which grants have now expired by limitation."

Upon this resolution, as to the forfeiture of lands in five of the late rebel States, the committee do not now report, as the information sought by them through the War Department has not yet been furnished. And this subject will require another and separate report.

The testimony upon the other subjects referred to the committee on which the present report is based, is comprised in two volumes, to wit: Report No. 34, House of Representatives, second session Thirty-Ninth Congress, referred to this committee, and Report No. 8, first session of Fortieth Congress, made by this committee; to which references are made in this report, as detailing facts more minutely and sustaining its more general statements and the conclusions to which the committee have arrived.

The magnitude of this subject and importance of the principles involved have rendered it extremely difficult to confine a report within the usual limits; but it will be as concise as possible for a proper understanding of the subject, without imposing the necessity upon others of reading two volumes of testimony.

Acting under your instructions the committee take up the various branches of the subjects in the order in which they are presented in the resolutions.

PAST AND PRESENT RELATIONS.

First. "The past and present relations existing between the Federal Government and the railroads in the States lately in rebellion."

To speak in general terms, as the Federal arms were victoriously extended over States and portions of States lately in rebellion the railroads, with few exceptions, were seized and possessed, and thereafter during the rebellion, and for some months after the cessation of hostilities, occupied the relation to the Government of captured property and were used for military purposes in the transportation of troops and supplies.

To define this relation more fully and, at the same time, to disclose the testimony, if testimony apart from the familiar history of the country be needed, the committee here give statements of distinguished witnesses, both as to the facts and their opinions of the law. On pages 238 and 269 of Report No. 34, above named, are words of Hon. E. M. Stanton, Secretary of War, as follows:

"The seizures of the railroads in the rebel States and the theater of war were regarded by me as acts of war under the war power, and as being among what has always been regarded as the most important measures of war." "The seizures were made by the commanders in the field without reference to any other consideration than depriving the enemy of their use and applying them to their own, so far as I have any knowledge." "I conceive that the military commanders, as the agents of the Government, had the undoubted right to seize the roads exactly as they would seize any other property of the enemy in time of war, either for the purpose of injuring the enemy or for the purpose of using them themselves."

And Secretary Stanton (see page 271 of Report No. 34) when asked "in regard to the act of Congress under which the roads were taken possession of throughout the Union," replied:

"I do not regard that act of Congress" [of January 31, 1862] "as applying to any case except the cases in the loyal States."

And on page 212 of Report No. 34, President Johnson seems to have entertained the same view, as the president of the East Tennessee and Virginia Railroad Company says:

"The President declines to appoint the commissioners under that act, on the ground that the act does not apply to railroads in the rebellious States."

On page 256 of Report No. 34, Quartermaster General M. C. Meigs uses these words:

"I have always thought that our right to take and use this property during the war arose from the general law of war, the same as taking a battery of artillery. I cannot compare a railroad to anything more properly than to a battery of artillery, or rather to a park of artillery, as it is a most powerful and efficient auxiliary or instrument of war against an opposing force."

On page 14 of Report No. 34, Colonel A. H.

Markland testifies he "was, as special agent for the Post Office Department, with the advance of the Army from the time General Grant first moved until the Army was disbanded," and says:

"We took possession of them and used them for the benefit of the Army. We also took possession of the rolling stock and whatever appertained to the railroad as a matter of military necessity." "I know every railroad we did capture we used as a matter of necessity; frequently fighting for a piece of railroad to use it."

On page 25 of Report No. 34, General L. S. Trowbridge testifies:

"It was necessary for the Government to use these roads for military purposes. They were indispensable to the Government; it could not get along without them."

On page 236 of the same report General E. R. S. Canby testifies:

"They were held as captured property and for the benefit of the Government, and so used in any way they could be used."

On page 169 of the same report General Philip H. Sheridan testifies:

"They were treated as captured property; that was my idea; and therefore rightfully belonged to us; and we used them as we pleased; destroyed or repaired them as occasion required."

The committee might be regarded as under-estimating the intelligence of the House and the country were they to do more upon this point than add the words of Secretary Stanton, page 269 of Report No. 34:

"Nobody doubts my opinion that these seizures were a legitimate exercise of the rights of war."

It appears from the testimony of General M. C. Meigs, on page 255 of Report No. 34, that the matter of southern railroads became a subject of consideration, more or less, from the beginning of the rebellion, and that "the system grew up gradually to meet necessities as they arose" in connection with the quartermaster's department.

This system became so immense that it was familiarly called the military railroad department.

To the officers connected with this department the committee are much indebted for the information which they are here enabled to give in a more condensed form.

Other testimony corroborating the reports of these officers, introduced as testimony, show that forty-two railroads were seized and operated by the United States Government in the late rebel States, the names of which roads here appear, with the terminal stations, their length, the dates at which possession was taken, and when they were returned to the companies:

After the close of the war, by the suppression of the rebellion by force of arms, the railroads so seized and used were restored to the original railroad companies respectively at the respective dates just named. They were no longer regarded, or at least treated, by the Administration at Washington as property belonging to the Government, and, being restored to the original companies, their relation to the Government became changed. The Government fetters were relaxed, and, like slaves coming up from chattels into life with souls breathed into them, they became parties to contracts. They became purchasers of certain property, principally of what is familiarly called "rolling stock," from the Government, which had been during the war purchased by the Government from northern railroads and manufacturers. Not being able, or, at least, after the necessary ravages of war, presumed not to be able, to pay ready cash for said property, they became debtors to the Government and gave bonds, each for the amount of its respective purchase. From the relation of captured property belonging to the Government they thus occupied the relation of debtors to the Government with its military grasp relaxed. Such is the relation they now, with some few exceptions, sustain.

BAD FAITH.

These debtors have generally (with a few honorable exceptions, which the committee will with pleasure mention) failed to meet their obligations promptly. Some have unbecomingly broken faith with the Government, have falsified their promises, and have presumed to bring forward as offsets, or rather as overshadowing claims, accounts against the Government for the use of the roads by the Government after their capture during the rebellion.

With life restored for the time being by the Government which they, as mighty and "efficient instruments of war," had been attempting to destroy, they again seek its vitals by attempting to absorb its material lifeblood, its financial substance. Callous to all feelings of gratitude, they assert claims against the Government for the use of the roads, which very use had become necessary in order to suppress the very rebellion against that Government which they themselves had been, so far as testimony will show, the willing instruments in sustaining. The red-handed criminal, or, using the mildest language the committee can think at all proper, the particeps criminis, claims compensation for losses incurred in consequence of his own crime.

These facts will necessarily lead the committee to further statements and remarks on this point before they shall have closed this report. They have now merely stated "the past and present relations" of these captured railroads in general terms.

MONEY EXPENDED.

The next branch of the subject presented to the committee is—

"The amount of money expended by the United States in constructing, repairing, equipping, and managing said roads."

This information the committee have obtained, so far as possible, and present in the testimony. They would have been pleased to have procured information to enable them to report the amount of money expended on each of said roads, but, as will be seen on page 307 of Report No. 34, "the reports of the military railroad department give the totals of expenditures and of receipts for each department or military division, but fail to show the precise amount expended upon or received from each road," arising "partly from imperfections in the reports and partly from the fact that much of the expense was in common to all the railroads or those of one department." Major General George H. Thomas, (see page 307 of Report No. 34,) under executive order of 8th August, 1865, "caused tabular statements of expenditures and receipts to be prepared of each road in the military division of the Tennessee;" but it will be observed that "they were made up in a great measure from estimates, not from actual figures; and these statements are carried back only to August 1, 1863, while some of the railroads included in them were used at an earlier period." "As to the railroads other than in military division of the Tennessee, there was at Quartermaster General's office no ascertained record of the expenditures and receipts of each railroad prior to the inquiry of this committee."

"The report of Colonel Crilly supplies the information as far as ascertained; but the records of the military railroad department cover but a portion of the period during which these railroads were held by Government."

"The military commanders who first seized and held them have furnished but imperfectly, if at all, either through direct reports or those of their quartermasters, the data for ascertaining the expenditures and receipts upon each railroad."

And your committee can very readily understand why commanders did not require these accounts to be kept separate and distinct for each road; because it did not enter into their minds to conceive that it could ever be contemplated by a Government to pay enemies for the use of captured property that had been used against that Government.

But as the committee are only instructed to give "the amount of money expended by the United States authorities in constructing, repairing, equipping, and managing said roads," they state the aggregate amount, so far as estimates have been made in the quartermaster's department. As per statement No. 5 on page 326 of Report No. 34, the aggregate "cost of constructing and operating United States military railroads during the rebellion," being "the amounts expended for labor and materials," is $45,367,480 27.

In the estimates of expenditures for "labor" it should be borne in mind that the evidence discloses the fact that the pay of soldiers who performed "labor" on roads is not included.

MONEY OWING BY EACH RAILROAD.

This brings the committee to the next branch of the subject as presented, to wit, "the amount of money each of said railroad companies is owing to the Government."

To impart the fullest information the Committee here copy tabular statement from pages 327 and 328 of Report No. 34.

QUARTERMASTER GENERAL'S OFFICE, November 26, 1867.

Showing the indebtedness of each road on the 1st day of November, 1867, amounting in the aggregate to $4,884,500 62, this being the most recent date up to which information on this point could be obtained.

The committee are next required to report "all other facts that may be deemed of importance in connection with these subjects."

DEBTS CREATED FOR GOVERNMENT PROPERTY.

This indebtedness of said railroads, as already stated, accrued for "Government property," purchased from the Government at prices and for amounts ascertained and agreed upon, and for which bonds were given by the roads.

This is shown by both documentary and oral testimony. Therefore the committee here give copies of two executive orders, which may be found on pages 259, 260, and 261 of Report No. 34, as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
WASHINGTON, August 8, 1865.

GENERAL: It having been determined by the Government to relinquish control over all railroads in the State of Tennessee and their continuations in adjoining States that have been in charge of or are now occupied by the United States military authorities and no longer needed for military purposes, you are hereby authorized and directed to turn over the same to the respective owners thereof at as early a date as practicable, causing, in all cases of transfer as aforesaid, the following regulations to be observed and carried out:

1. Each and every company will be required to reorganize and elect a board of directors, whose loyalty shall be established to your satisfaction.

2. You will cause to be made out in triplicate, by such person or persons as you may indicate, a complete inventory of the rolling stock, tools, and other materials and property on each road.

3. Separate inventories will be, in the same manner, made of the rolling stock and other property originally belonging to each of said roads and that furnished by and belonging to the Government.

4. Each company will be required to give bonds satisfactory to the Government that they will in twelve months from the date of transfer as aforesaid, or such other reasonable time as may be agreed upon, pay a fair valuation for the Government property turned over to said companies, the same being first appraised by competent and disinterested parties at a fair valuation, the United States reserving all Government dues for carrying mails and other service performed by each company until said obligations are paid; and if, at the maturity of said debt, the amount of Government dues retained as aforesaid does not liquidate the same, the balance to be paid by the company in money.

5. Tabular statements will be made of all expenditures by the Government for repairing each road, with a full statement of receipts from private freights, passage, and other sources; also, a full statement of all transportation performed on Government account, giving the number of persons transported and amount of freight, and the distance carried in each case—all of said reports or tabular statements to be made in triplicate, one for the Secretary of War, the military headquarters of the department, and the railroad company.

6. All railroads in Tennessee will be required to pay all arrearages of interest due on the bonds issued by that State prior to the date of its pretended secession from the Union, to aid in the construction of said roads, before any dividends are declared or paid to the stockholders thereof.

7. Buildings erected for Government purposes on the line of railroads, and not valuable or useful for the business of said companies, should not form a legitimate charge against such companies, nor should they be charged for rebuilding houses, bridges, or other structures which were destroyed by the Federal army.

8. You are authorized to give any orders to quartermasters within your division which you may deem necessary to carry into execution this order.

By order of the President:
EDWIN M. STANTON,
Secretary of War.

Major General GEORGE H. THOMAS,
Commanding Military Division of the Tennessee,
Nashville, Tennessee.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
WASHINGTON, D. C., October 14, 1865.

GENERAL: The provisions and benefits of the executive order of 8th August are hereby extended to all railroads within the limits of your command desiring to purchase railroad rolling stock and materials from the United States, for the purpose of repairing the losses of the war.

You are also authorized to direct the sale to any such railroads of rolling stock now within the limits of your command and not needed by the United States for actual use, upon the following conditions, if they are preferred to the terms of the order of 8th August, and the individual security required by you under that order.

You will take care that this property is distributed among the several roads in proportion to their actual needs, and that none is sold to any railroad in excess of the reasonable requirements of its business, or to be used for purposes of speculation, sale, or hire to other roads.

You will require from all such railroad companies satisfactory bonds, in the form herewith included, binding them to the payment to the United States of the full appraised value of the property sold to them, in equal monthly instalments, with interest at the rate of seven and three tenths per cent. per annum, within two years, credit being allowed to them on the first of each month for any service of military transportation rendered by them during the preceding month, at the established rates now allowed to northern railroads for such service.

Full reports of all sales under this order will be made to the War Department from time to time, as required by existing orders.

The serviceable railroad iron in possession of the quartermaster's department at Chattanooga and Nashville is excepted. It will be sold only for cash, at the prices fixed by the War Department.

By order of the President:

EDWIN M. STANTON,
Secretary of War.

Major General GEORGE H. THOMAS,
Commanding Military Division of the Tennessee,
Nashville, Tennessee.

The following is a copy of the bonds required under said orders, the amount in each case to be double the valuation of the property sold and delivered, and which will be found on pages 461 and 462 of report No. 34, to wit:

Bond.

Know all men by these presents that the ——— Railroad Company, duly incorporated by the act of the ——— of the State of ——— by ———, its president, acting for and in behalf of said railroad company, do hereby acknowledge itself and its successors held and firmly bound unto the United States of America in the full and just sum of ——— dollars, lawful money of the United States; for which payment, well and truly to be made to the disbursing quartermaster of the United States military railroads at his office in Nashville or to such other disbursing quartermasters may be designated by the War Department within two years from the date of these presents, the said railroad company, by its president, hereby binds itself and its successors firmly by these presents.

Sealed with its corporate seal, attested by the signature of its president, and affixed by the express authority of its directors, this ——— day of ———, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty, (186.)

The nature of the above obligation is such that, whereas the above bounden railroad company has purchased and received, or shall receive, from the War Department of the United States, rolling stock, iron rails, cross-ties, chairs, spikes, timber, and other materials for repairing and operating its railroad, in quantities, at prices, and to an amount and value, which shall be evidenced by the receipts given for the same by the said railroad company to the proper officer of the said War Department upon a credit of two years from the date of these presents, payable in equal monthly installments, with interest, at the rate of seven and three tenths per cent. per annum, within the said two years, either in cash to the disbursing quartermaster of the United States military railroads at his office in Nashville, or to such other disbursing quartermaster as may be designated for this purpose by the War Department, or in transportation of the troops or military supplies of the United States, under the orders of the proper military authorities, at the rates of fare and tolls allowed for such service to northern railroads; and

Whereas the said railroad company desires, and by these presents intends, to secure to the United States the complete and punctual payment as aforesaid of the amounts which may be due for the said materials received or to be received by it from the United States:

Now, therefore, if the said railroad company shall well and truly pay as aforesaid, either in cash, in equal monthly installments, or in transportation as aforesaid to the United States within two years from the date of these presents, all that shall be due as aforesaid to the United States on account and in payment for all the materials received as aforesaid from the United States, then this obligation shall be void and of no effect.

But if the said railroad company shall fail to pay to the United States all or any portion of what may be due to the United States on account of the said materials received from the United States within two years from the date of these presents either in cash as aforesaid, or in transportation as aforesaid, shall fail to pay any of the monthly installments aforesaid punctually when due, then this obligation shall remain in full force and effect to the extent that may be necessary to fully repay to the United States for the full amount which may be due on account of the said materials so received as aforesaid, and all loss or damage which may have been incurred by the United States by reason of the said railroad company's failure to pay for the same what shall be due therefor when the same shall be due; and, as a further security for such payment and indemnity to the United States, the United States shall have a lien upon the property sold to said company, and in default of such complete and punctual payment of all moneys which may be due on account of the aforesaid purchase of materials, be fully authorized to take possession of and sell said property, and also to place in charge and control of the said company's railroad an agent of the said United States, who shall be fully empowered, and by these presents is fully empowered, in case of such default as aforesaid, to collect all the revenues of the said company, and apply the same to the payment to the United States of all the moneys which shall be due at the time of such application of such revenues to the United States for any such materials which shall have been delivered by the United States to the said railroad company, or by reason of any loss or injury to the United States resulting from such default in payment of the same. And the said company shall have no authority to sell or convey out of its possession, without the consent of the United States first in writing obtained, any of the property referred to in this agreement; but shall hold and retain the same to the exclusive use of said company in carrying on the business of transportation of persons and property over its line and road until the whole is fully paid for as aforesaid.

In witness whereof, the corporate seal of said railroad company is affixed hereto, by authority of its directors, and attested by its president.

Witness: ———

The executive order of 14th October, 1865, modifies that of 8th August by dispensing with individual security which had been required by General Thomas, and extends its provisions from "railroads in the State of Tennessee and their continuations in adjoining States to all railroads within the limits of General Thomas's command," which was the department of the Cumberland.

And on page 275 of Report No. 34 Secretary Stanton testifies:

"I think all the railroads in the rebel States have been surrendered under the executive order of August 8, 1865, and its modifications which appear in the Quartermaster General's report."

And on page 38, Report No. 34, General McCallum says:

"The United States military railroads were transferred by executive order of August 8, 1865, to the original owners."

From paragraph three of said executive order of 8th of August, 1865, it will be perceived that "separate inventories" were required "of the rolling stock and other property originally belonging to each of said roads" and "that furnished by and belonging to the Government;" and, from paragraph four, that "each company was to be required to give bond for payment of a fair valuation of the Government property turned over." Therefore that order contemplated that property "originally belonging to said roads," although captured property, should not be considered "Government property," and it was not included in the amounts for which bonds were required and given.

J. B. Hoxie, superintendent of the East Tennessee and Virginia road, on page 39 of Report No. 34, testifies:

"The stock that had originally belonged to the companies was very much mixed up and scattered about over the country." "The companies were allowed to go and get it wherever they could find it." "In every instance where we could prove it satisfactorily to the Government those cars were struck off the list charged against us."

On page 148 of Report No. 34, Brevet Colonel Francis J. Crilly, assistant quartermaster United States Army, Washington city, testifies he had "charge of turning over the roads in the military division of the Mississippi;" was "on duty then as chief quartermaster of military railroads in the Southwest," and that "the property, such as engines, &c., that could be identified as belonging to a particular road, was returned."

Assistant Quartermaster S. R. Hamill, Washington city, who, as assistant chief quartermaster at Nashville, Tennessee, assisted in turning over said property to the railroad companies, testifies on page 179 of Report No. 34: "The bonds were for property turned over merely, exclusive of improvements."

"The roads were simply surrendered to the owners and they were charged with such property as they chose to buy and give bonds for."

On page 278, Report No. 34, Michael Burns, president of the Nashville and Chattanooga road, and likewise of the Nashville and Northwestern road, testifies:

"They (the Government) restored everything I could claim or swear to."

On page 5 of Report No. 3 the president of the Richmond and Danville Railroad Company, and also the president of the Richmond and Piedmont Railroad Company, testifies:

"From fifteen to twenty-five locomotives were on the road prior to our purchase from the Government; some of them had been for ten years on the road, and on the termination of the war they were given back to the company without any equivalent or consideration." "The rolling stock of the company taken by the United States Government and restored again must have been worth from three to four hundred thousand dollars, exclusive of what was on the Piedmont road and returned."

Although the testimony is very full and clear on this point, the committee will not here quote more, as it cannot be denied that all railroads and railroad property were restored and no compensation required by the Government. But for the benefit of those who desire to read interesting statements on this point the committee refer to the following additional pages of Report No. 3, to wit: 6, 8, 10, 14, 17, 18, 21, 23, 24, 27, 30, 33, 40, 41, 45, 53, 64, 75, 76, 107.

FAIRLY VALUED.

The testimony discloses the fact that this "Government property" sold to the roads was appraised by experienced railroad men at a fair cash valuation. On page 84 of Report No. 34 Major General George H. Thomas testifies:

"I selected three of the most distinguished railroad men throughout the country that I knew of, with an officer of the Army, and a recorder, who was also an officer of the Army, to make this appraisal," &c. "I have every reason to believe that the appraisal was very fair."

FREELY RESTORED.

Thus this fact is arrived at: that twenty-five hundred and thirty-eight miles of railroad track, originally belonging to forty-two different railroads in the late rebel States, actually seized, possessed, and used, together with a very large amount of rolling stock, all captured property, that had been used against the Government, have been restored, freely, without money and without price, to those enemies who had so used it against the Government; and that over seven million dollars' worth of rolling stock (almost seven and a half millions) to equip their roads, has been sold by the Government, for their promises to pay, to those who had so used their former means. "Treason is made odious" by a surrender, a restoration of this vast amount of wealth, of productive wealth, to the most influential participants in the rebellion; not only productive wealth, but, in the language of General Meigs, "most powerful and efficient instruments of war"—to the traitorous enemy from whom they were seized because they were powerful and important instruments of war; to an enemy, conquered to be sure, but still claiming the right to rule in the Government they had then but recently failed for want of strength to destroy.

WERE USED IN AID OF THE REBELLION, AND VOLUNTARILY.

It is an important fact that should not be lost sight of, not only that this vast amount of property restored had been used in aid of the rebellion, but used voluntarily by and for those in sympathy with the rebellion, of which, apart from the familiar history of the war, there is abundant testimony.

To substantiate this statement, the committee extract the following testimony, from Report No. 3, of railroad officers, directors, &c., in the South, summoned as they could be found, to wit:

On page 2 the president of the Richmond and Danville Railroad Company, and also of the Richmond and Piedmont Railroad Company, testifies:

"So far as I am informed all railroads in the South were used in aid of the rebellion." "I think the companies were all disposed to aid, as far as I know."

On page 7, the general superintendent of the Virginia Central railroad testifies:

"I do not think there were any roads in Virginia taken charge of, but continued to be operated by the regular officers." "I presume the service rendered to the confederate government was voluntary." "I believe in my mind that all the railroads were heartily in that matter." "I know (page 9) all railroad men in Virginia, some in North Carolina, a few in Tennessee, and I meet a few other southern railroad men occasionally." "None of them would admit, during the war, that they were loyal to the United States Government. Some of them were accused of

it. I was accused of it myself, but I know I was not. Those parties here who are now loudest in their professions of Unionism were as active confederates as any during the war. Of course there are some exceptions."

On page 12 the president of the Virginia Central railroad testifies:

"Employment, so far as the confederate government was concerned, was the transportation of troops backward and forward and munitions of war." "It was never a question whether the companies were willing or not." "I cannot say I know an instance where the services had to be compelled by the confederate government." "I have a general acquaintance with railroad men in Virginia." "I do not think I know any leading railroad men, presidents and other officers, who were called during the rebellion loyal to the United States Government."

On page 18, the treasurer of the Richmond and York River railroad testifies:

"I think the service was voluntary." "They performed for the confederate government every service they could possibly perform in the transportation of troops and munitions of war."

On pages 16 and 17 the superintendent of the Richmond, Fredericksburg and Potomac railroad testifies:

"Southern railroads were operated by the managers of the roads in the transportation of troops and munitions of war." "I think, as a general thing, the service was voluntary."

On page 19 the president of the Richmond and Petersburg railroad testifies:

"As to services being voluntary the question was never brought up. There was no resistance whatever. The general impression in Virginia, as a matter of course, was that every individual owed his allegiance to the State first of all, and therefore when the State gave instructions our citizens gave the matter acquiescence."

On page 22 the treasurer of the Richmond, Fredericksburg and Potomac railroad testifies:

"The roads of the South during the rebellion were in charge of their officers," &c. "All the services were rendered to the confederate government that were required of them in the transportation of troops and munitions of war." "It may be said to have been done voluntarily." "I know nearly all railroad officers in Virginia and some in other States." "I do not know any who were regarded as loyal to the United States Government during the rebellion."

On pages 23, 24, and 25 the president of the Northeastern railroad, South Carolina, testifies:

"Southern railroads were left entirely under the direction of their officers, more or less under military supervision. The roads were used for the purpose of general transportation as well as in the transportation of troops and supplies." "It was never necessary for the confederate authorities to resort to force to compel service." "I am familiar with railroad presidents and officers of railroads in this State, more or less." "I do not think I am acquainted with any who were considered loyal to the United States Government during the rebellion."

On page 29 the superintendent of the Charleston and Savannah railroad testifies:

"I do not know that I can mention any instance in which resistance was shown by those who controlled the roads." "I do not know that I know of any men here connected with railroads who were loyal, in your meaning, to the United States Government."

On page 32 the president of the South Carolina railroad testifies:

"The roads were not taken out of the hands of their owners." "The services rendered for the rebel government were the transportation of troops, supplies, and munitions of war." "I do not know any instance in which resistance was manifested by those controlling the roads to those requirements." "My company rendered (page 36) a cheerful acquiescence to all the requirements of the rebel authorities." "My acquaintance (page 34) is reasonably extensive with railroad officers in this and in the adjoining States." "I do not know a railroad president who was not doing precisely what I did."

On pages 39, 40, and 42 the president of the Georgia Central railroad, at Savannah, Georgia, testifies:

"So far as I know, southern railroads were operated during the rebellion by the officers of the companies elected by the stockholders." "They transported troops and supplies upon the orders of the then authorities." "I cannot state any instance in which service was refused by any road because the officers of the road were opposed to the rebellion." "I cannot say that I can give the name of any officer of a railroad who was considered or called loyal or known by general reputation to have been during the rebellion loyal to the United States Government." "I do not know any stockholder who did not generally acquiesce in the action of the State after it had decided on its course; but I do know stockholders who were opposed to the rebellion and who never believed that it would succeed." "But they afterward acquiesced in the rebellion." "These were what we understand here as Union men." "I take it for granted that those in the North were loyal to the United States Government. Those in the South, I presume, were as the southern people generally were."

On pages 43 and 44 the secretary and treasurer of the Atlantic and Gulf railroad testifies:

"During the rebellion the road was operated by the company exclusively." "Performed all the services required of it in the transportation of troops and supplies." "There was nothing compulsory." "I do not know any railroad officers who were loyal to the United States Government during the rebellion."

On page 48 the master of transportation of the Georgia Central railroad testifies:

"I can hardly say I know of any opposition ever having been manifested to a military order of the rebel government for railroad service in consequence of opposition to the rebellion." "I cannot say I opposed the rebellion." "I have an extensive acquaintance with other railroad officers in this and the adjoining States." "I know many who thought that the rebellion was a very indiscreet thing; but I do not know that I can say exactly that they were loyal to the United States Government." "So far as I know there was a general acquiescence in the rebellion." "I do not mean to say a general sympathy, but a general acquiescence."

On pages 51 and 52 the President of the Macon and Western road testifies:

"The road was used in the transportation of supplies for the confederate government and for whoever desired it to do business for them, just the same as before the war." "I know of no instance in which it was necessary to use force." "We were willing to take all the freight offered to us." "An account was kept with the confederate government, but very little of it was paid."

On pages 55 and 56 the president of the Southwestern railroad of Georgia testifies:

"I do not remember any case of any resistance having been made to the rebel government by any of the roads." "We transported provisions for the confederate government." "You will find all railroad men were opposed to secession." "They were very quiet." "Certainly, they all acquiesced."

On pages 57 and 58 the president of the Macon and Brunswick railroad testifies:

"At the beginning of the rebellion their services were rendered voluntarily; no doubt about that." "In the transportation of troops and supplies." "I really do not know of any railroad officers who were loyal to the United States Government during the rebellion."

On page 60 the master of transportation at Atlanta of the Western and Atlantic railroad testifies:

"No; it was not necessary to resort to force to secure their services." "It transported troops and munitions of war," &c. "My acquaintance is extensive with railroad officers in this and adjoining States." "I do not think I do know any who were loyal to the United States Government during the rebellion."

But why quote more testimony on this point? It is invariably of the same import, if not the same language, from railroad officers, &c., who resided during the rebellion in the late rebel States. The committee have quoted on this point, as the testimony presented itself, in Report No. 3; and the curious may proceed and will find the remaining testimony of the very same character on this point; and they refer to pages 62, 63, 74, 77, 78, 79, 81, 86, 92, 96, 105, 106, 110, 115.

This positive and uncontradicted testimony as to the use of this property in aid of the rebellion, voluntarily on the part of presidents, directors, and stockholders of railroads, removes the necessity for relying upon the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States expressed in the prize cases, 2 Black, pages 666, 667-8, that—

"Persons residing in the rebel States at any time during the civil war must be considered as enemies during such residence, without regard to their personal sentiments or dispositions."

WHO RESPONSIBLE?

It may be well for the House to know who is or are responsible, directly or indirectly, to be charged or to be credited, in public estimation, for these orders restoring such property.

The first record correspondence on the subject of the surrender of captured railroads and rolling stock to the original companies is a letter of Quartermaster General M. C. Meigs to Hon. E. M. Stanton, Secretary of War, dated 19th May, 1865, which is here copied from pages 451 and 452 of said report of testimony, No. 34, as follows:

Letter of the Quartermaster General, dated May 19, 1865, proposing and recommending to the Secretary of War a plan or basis upon which the transfer of United States military railroads might be effected.

QUARTERMASTER GENERAL'S OFFICE,
WASHINGTON, May 19, 1865.

* * * * *

The question of the disposition of the railroads in the States lately in rebellion is a large one, and after reflection I have the honor to advise that the following principles be established to govern the action of the quartermaster's department and of the military authorities in disposing of all of them.

1. The United States will, as soon as it can dispense with the military occupation and control of any road of which the quartermaster's department is now in charge, turn it over to the parties asking to receive it, who may appear to have the best claim and be able to operate it in such manner as to secure the speedy movement of all military stores and troops; the Quartermaster General, upon the advice of the military commander of the department, to determine when this can be done, subject to the approval of the Secretary of War.

2. No charge to be made against the railroad for expense of material or expense of operation.

3. All materials for permanent way used in the repairs and construction of the road and all damaged material of this class which may be left along its route, having been thrown there during the operations of destruction or repair, to be considered as part of the road and given up with it.

4. No payment or credit to be given to the railroad for its occupation or use by the United States during the continuance of the military necessity which compelled the United States to take possession of it by capture from the public enemy. The recovery of the road from the public enemy and its return to loyal owners, with the vast expenditure of defense and repair, are a full equivalent for its use.

5. All movable property, including rolling stock of all kinds, the property of the United States, to be sold at auction, after full public notice, to the highest bidder.

6. All rolling stock and material, the property before the war of railroads and captured by the forces of the United States, to be placed at the disposal of the road which originally owned it, and to be given up to those roads as soon as it can be spared and they appear by proper agents authorized to receive it.

7. When a State has a board of public works able and willing to take charge of its railroads, the railroads in possession of the quartermaster's department to be given up to the board of public works, leaving it to the State authorities and to the judicial tribunals to regulate all questions of property between rival boards, agents, or stockholders.

8. Roads not being operated by the United States quartermaster's department not to be interfered with unless under military necessity. Such roads to be left in possession of such persons as may now have possession, subject only to the removal of such agents, director, president, superintendent, or operative who has not taken the oath of allegiance to the United States, which rule should be rigidly enforced.

9. When the superintendents in actual possession decline to take such oath some competent person to be appointed as receiver of the railroad, who shall administer the affairs of the road and account for its receipts to the board of directors, who may be formally recognized as the legal and loyal board of managers. This receiver to be appointed, as in the case of other abandoned property, by the Treasury Department.

10. I recommend that the Governor of the State of Virginia be informed that the War Department will interpose no obstacle to the board of public works of the State taking possession of all the railroads in the State not in use and occupation of the military forces of the United States by the quartermaster's department, and that as soon as the military occupation of any of these roads can be safely dispensed with the road will be transferred to the charge of the board of public works.

In some of these States the State is a large bondholder in the roads, and though there may be in such States no board of public works, it is probable that the State authorities will be willing to receive and take charge of the road; if not, receivers should be appointed by the Treasury Department, upon application of the War Department, to take charge of them as abandoned property.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully,
M. C. MEIGS,
Quartermaster General and Brevet Major General.
Hon. E. M. STANTON, Secretary of War.

A true copy.
ALEXANDER BLISS,
Brevet Colonel United States Army.

The next correspondence is a letter from same Quartermaster General to same Secretary of War, dated 17th July, 1865, as appears on page 458 of Report No. 34, as follows:

QUARTERMASTER GENERAL'S OFFICE,
WASHINGTON, D. C., July 17, 1865.

SIR: I submit herewith an estimate for funds required by the disbursing officer for railroads at Nashville, Tennessee.

HO. OF REPS.

Report on Southern Railroads.

40TH CONG. ... 2D SESS.

The remittances to Nashville on account of railroads in the southwest in 1865, are as follows namely:

	Estimate.
In March, on the November, 1864.....	$1,805,500 00
In March, on the December, 1864.....	1,000,000 00
On May 2, on the January, 1865.....	1,400,000 00
On May 2, on the February, 1865.....	1,400,000 00
On May 30, on the April, 1865.....	1,400,000 00

$7,005,550 00

The estimate for March was held back by General McCallum, it being supposed that the sums required on the previous estimates and on that of April would be sufficient to pay off all his indebtedness to the 30th of June, owing to expected reductions in the establishment.

General McCallum reports, on the 3d instant, that $1,000,000 will be sufficient, on the estimate for March, to enable Captain Crilly to pay off his indebtedness.

It will be perceived from the foregoing statement that these railroads have been costing, during the present year, upwards of $1,300,000 monthly, and the expenditures are still going on.

These expenditures were necessary during the war, but it appears to me that the Government should be relieved from this heavy expenditure by the restoration of the railroads to the companies, and I recommend that this be done as soon as it is possible to make arrangements for the transfer on the basis of my report of 19th of May last.

The appropriation for transportation of the Army is exhausted, and there is no money in the Treasury for Army appropriations against which requisitions can be drawn.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

M. C. MEIGS,

Brevet Major General U. S. A., Quartermaster General.
Hon. E. M. STANTON, Secretary of War,
Washington, District of Columbia.

Which last letter was indorsed as follows:

The recommendation of the Quartermaster General is approved, and he is directed to turn over the roads immediately.

By order of the Secretary of War:

THOMAS T. ECKERT,

Acting Assistant Secretary of War.

WAR DEPARTMENT, July 21, 1865.

The following order, as appears on page 450 of Report No. 34, was then issued, to wit:

QUARTERMASTER GENERAL'S OFFICE,
WASHINGTON, July 27, 1865.

Respectfully referred to Brigadier General D. C. McCallum, general manager military railroads, together with a copy of the report of the Quartermaster General of May 19, 1865.

General McCallum will at once transfer all the railroads in the military division of the Mississippi which are controlled at Nashville, in accordance with the recommendation of the Quartermaster General, as approved and directed by the Secretary of War.

General McCallum will please report what railroads will remain in the possession of the military authorities when this transfer shall have been accomplished.

By order of Quartermaster General:

ALEXANDER BLISS,

Brevet Colonel United States Army.

These orders were next followed by executive orders of August 8 and October 14, 1865, as heretofore copied into this report.

It will be perceived that the recommendation of the Quartermaster General to sell the property of the United States at public auction was not adhered to in the executive order, but the companies were permitted to purchase at a fair valuation, which is believed by the committee to have been the better plan, provided the policy of returning the roads to the companies were the correct one.

The essential and very important difference between the recommendations of the Quartermaster General, approved by the Secretary of War, and the executive order of August 8, is that, while the Quartermaster General recommended, as per paragraph four of his letter, "no payment or credit to be given to the railroad for its occupation or use by the United States during the continuance of the military necessity which compelled the United States to take possession of it by capture from the public enemy," the President required, as per paragraph fifth of 8th of August order, "tabular statements to be made of all expenditures by the Government for repairing each road, with a full statement of receipts from private freights, passage, and other sources; also, a full statement of all transportation performed on Government account, giving the number of persons transported and amount of freight, and the distance carried in each case." While in the former, the Quartermaster

General's recommendation, no payment was to be made to the captured roads for their use, in the latter, the President's order, it is apparent that it must have been contemplated that, at some future period, a general settlement would be made with the roads, and that the evidence should be preserved of their use, with receipts from all sources and charges for all transportation credited to the roads and all expenditures "for repairing" charged.

This belief is strengthened by the fact, as disclosed in the testimony, that when extensions of payments on bonds maturing were sought by various roads, and the President saw proper to order payments to be unconditionally suspended, claims were then distinctly made against the Government for the use of the roads. Michael Burns, president of two of those roads, as hereinbefore stated, testifies on page 278 of Report No. 34 that he "got possession of those two roads in 1865, by an order from the War Department, at Washington, through General Thomas."

A second question brought the reply that it was "the order of August 8, 1865."

On page 280, Report No. 34, to the question, "Have you paid up your indebtedness to the United States, from time to time, according to the terms of your bond?" he replied:

"I have carried the mails, troops, supplies, &c., faithfully, in accordance with my agreement, and any other work I was called on by the Government to do."

A second question on this point seemed to be necessary—the answer related to the Nashville and Chattanooga railroad. To the question, "Did you pay any of your indebtedness in money?" he replied—but before giving that reply it may be well to state that the value of property sold to this road and amount secured by its bond, in 1865, was $1,566,551 73; and that its indebtedness on 31st January, 1867, was $1,532,740 60; and on the 1st day of November, 1867, $1,556,893 57—he replied (page 280, Report No. 34) on 25th day of February, 1867:

"I paid, I think, $67,000; I was led by the order of August 8 to believe I would get a just settlement. The Government is indebted to the company $3,766,915 64, as shown by the Quartermaster General's account."

To the question, "What is your claim for?" he replied, "For the use of the road during its occupancy by the United States."

Mr. Burns also testifies, on page 283 of Report 34:

"That the Government is indebted to the Nashville and Northwestern road $818,160 over and above the work done in completing the road," "for property used, property taken, and property destroyed."

He likewise testifies, on page 290, Report No. 34:

"I came myself to Washington to see about this debt, and to get the time extended for payments; and the company have employed agents from time to time for that and other purposes."

With what success Mr. Burns met may be seen in order on page 221, Report No. 34, of which the following is a copy:

QUARTERMASTER GENERAL'S OFFICE,
WASHINGTON, D. C., May 5, 1866.

CAPTAIN: An order of the President of the United States, dated April 25, 1866, and referred to this office by the Secretary of War April 30, 1866, directs that collection be suspended until further orders of the indebtedness of the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad Company to the United States. You will be governed accordingly. By order of the Quartermaster General.

Respectfully, your obedient servant,

ALEXANDER BLISS,

Brev. Col. and A. Q. M., in charge of Fourth Division.
CAPTAIN S. R. HAMILL.

Assistant Quartermaster, Nashville, Tennessee.

All railroads were restored to the original companies, under executive orders of August and October, 1865, or under orders substantially the same as hereinbefore shown.

Orders issued by commanding generals prior to executive order of 8th of August, 1865, under which some roads were restored, were subsequently modified to conform to its requirements.

For instance, it appears on pages 237 and 238 of Report No. 34, that General Canby, then in command of the military division of the west Mississippi, by orders ratified by General Grant as early as June, 1865, relinquished some roads to the companies upon conditions different and more favorable to the Government, and more in accordance, as the committee believe, not only with rights growing out of the laws of war, but with principles of justice and considerations of the future safety of the country.

General Canby testifies:

"They were turned over to the companies provisionally, subject to the condition that the right of confiscation was reserved, and that all the property to which the Government had title by capture or otherwise should be paid for by the companies."

The evidence shows that General Canby's orders were afterwards modified, by orders through the Quartermaster General, to conform to that of August 8.

VALUE OF RESTORED PROPERTY.

It is interesting and not unimportant to know the value of the property restored, that the loyal people may know whether to say of those who have been intrusted with their interests "Well done, good and faithful servants," or no.

On page 325 of Report No. 34 Colonel Alexander Bliss's report shows that one hundred and twelve engines and five hundred and ninety-one cars captured by the United States were returned to former owners. The committee, therefore, present a statement of the value of such property as appears from the report of the military railroad department to have been returned, to wit:

2,538 miles of railroad, worth $30,000 per mile.....	$76,140,000
112 engines at $15,000 each.....	1,680,000
591 cars (91 at $2,000; 500 at $400).....	382,000
A total of.....	$78,202,000

In addition to this a very large amount of property once possessed was suffered to fall back into the hands of the original owners of which the committee can find no account in detail, such as shops and contents at Knoxville, Nashville, and Chattanooga, Tennessee, and Savannah, Georgia. The very extensive workshops at Savannah alone were worth millions of dollars.

But it is sufficient to add to the amount just named..... $78,202,000 the amount expended in labor and materials on said roads to suppress the rebellion, aided by their officers, directors, and stockholders..... 45,367,480 to make..... $123,569,480 which could have been rightfully demanded or obtained under the laws of war by right of capture, but which was freely restored.

TO PAY FOR USE OF.

But large as the amount is for an apparent reward to those who had struck down three hundred thousand defenders of the Government, and incredible as it is that high Government officials, who were in such position as to be compelled to witness the heavy drafts for men and money upon the Government, should approve and advise such reward to treason, it was left for President Johnson to take the initiative, in his order of August 8, for paying for the use of such property. Forty-five million three hundred and sixty-seven thousand four hundred and eighty dollars and twenty-seven cents were expended in "labor and materials" on said roads. Four million seventy-nine thousand five hundred and eleven dollars and thirty-three cents were expended upon the Nashville and Chattanooga road. That road claims $3,766,915 64 for the use of the road by the Federal Government. The other roads claiming in the same proportion would bring the Government, after the $123,569,480 surrendered and relinquished, in debt to this portion of her conquered enemies for use of this property alone, $41,889,266; that being $34,445,192 over and above the seven or more million dollars' worth of rolling stock sold the roads on credit.

If the justice of such claims be recognized by allowing one, all the roads will press their claims, although some railroad officers testify they do not contemplate doing so.

Again, if repairs should be charged to roads on a settlement with credit given for their use by the Government, then under the same principle, and with manifest justice, charges should be made for repairs in cases where no use has been made of a road.

Still the testimony discloses the fact that that policy was not adhered to; and that accounts for repairs done have not been made against the roads by the Government when the repairs overbalanced the use. As one illustration of this the committee refer to the testimony of Major General Sheridan, page 168 of Report No. 34, who states that "the New Orleans and Opelousas road is eighty miles long;" that "we used it and it was under military control and was run by the quartermaster;" that "all the bridges had been repaired by the Government after having been destroyed by the enemy, and the road was put in very good repair;" that "he turned it over, under order of August 8, 1865, making no account whatever for the work that had been done on the road in putting it in repair;" that, in fact, he "took a road that had been destroyed by the enemy, put it in good running condition, and, when done with it, handed it over, taking no account of it so far as the road was concerned." No parallel can be found for such action; repairing and restoring to an enemy property which he himself had destroyed.

NO CHARGE FOR REBUILDING.

But of the same nature as this monstrosity, a most extraordinary rule for government in these cases is laid down in the President's order of 8th of August, 1865, which appears in the last clause of the seventh paragraph, as follows:

"Nor should such companies be charged for rebuilding houses, bridges, or other structures which were destroyed by the Federal Army."

In other words, the order is this:

"Houses, bridges, and other structures should be rebuilt without charge for such companies as had voluntarily engaged in the rebellion, and had made their destruction a necessity."

If this theory be correct, then the railroads themselves of the enemy destroyed by the Federal Army should be reconstructed and restored without charge, or the companies should be paid the cost of reconstruction. What would be that cost?

It would be well for the representatives of a loyal people, heavily taxed to pay bounties and pensions to those and their representatives whom a grateful nation will ever honor; heavily taxed in consequence of the crime, among others, of the stockholders, directors, and officers of railroads, to look at the inevitable result of a recognition of such a traitor-favoring policy. No one can fail to see it would be just what the enemies of the Government desire—its bankruptcy.

Take, for instance, the Georgia Central railroad, running from Savannah to Macon, one hundred and ninety-two miles; of that road the president testifies, on page 40 of Report No. 3 of Fortieth Congress,

"It was almost completely destroyed by General Sherman;" "I spent about two million dollars in repairing it since I have had charge of the property."

The president of the Virginia and Tennessee railroad testifies, on page 91 of Report No. 3:

"Of the damage by the United States forces I can only judge from the amount already expended, that it was about six hundred thousand dollars."

On page 167, Report No. 34, Major General Sheridan testifies:

"The roads to Charlottesville and Gordonsville we found in good condition. They were destroyed by our troops. I think I burned every bridge from Lynchburg to Richmond on the Lynchburg and Gordonsville road, and from Gordonsville to Richmond on the Central road; also, the Fredericksburg road. I tore up the track at Charlottesville; I spent two days in destroying the track, and destroyed, I think, about eight miles of the road pretty thoroughly; I destroyed the road at a great many points," &c.

In addition to these, calculate the amount of destruction to other roads in Georgia than the one named, and in the track made desolate by Major General Sherman's army in its march that caused the rebels of the Carolinas to experience the realities of war; apply the principle of seventh paragraph of 8th of August order and then ask can the nation endure the taxation to pay for such destruction. But this is not all. Upon such a theory other property of rebels than railroad property should be paid for. The places where now along that track of desolation from Chattanooga to Atlanta, from Atlanta to Macon and Savannah, and from Savannah to Columbia and Petersburg, the hand of an angry God has placed the blight of His withering touch, and almost every mile the saddened traveler sees but naked chimneys to mark the abodes of former affluence and contentment; but where the disposition to oppress predominates there can be no true refinement, and where wealth is wrung from the tears of the enslaved no true contentment. The committee say, upon such a theory, those waste places, cursed by God, must be built up from the national Treasury.

Who can calculate the amount of taxation? And if the powers of calculation be not exhausted they may be extended to the property of rebels elsewhere destroyed and of other kinds.

LOYALTY.

But the subject of loyalty necessarily enters into this report, because the President, in the first paragraph of Executive Order of 8th of August, 1865, says: "Each and every company will be required to reorganize and elect a board of directors whose loyalty shall be established to the satisfaction of" the commanding general; and, further, because the committee are desirous that the principle be recognized, so far as it can be in legislation, that loyalty and the right of protection to life and property by the national Government are inseparable; and still further, because remarks made on the floor of the House on the 12th day of July last plainly indicate that it is to be contended that "northern capital," though invested in roads used in aid of the rebellion, should not be confiscated, because it is northern capital, as though "loyal" and "northern" are synonymous.

Upon the last idea presented the committee are content to say that history shows that, while loyalty to the United States Government most abounds in the North and disloyalty in the South, the one is not indigenous to the North or the other to the South, but that conspicuous exceptions can be found in either clime.

Those at all cognizant with such investigations of loyalty know they are the merest farces. The notorious ease with which sympathizers, who secretly encouraged rebellion, but committed no public act, were able to prove loyalty and the freedom with which they swore to loyalty caused a suspension of the law paying loyal slaveholders for slaves enlisted into the Army.

But in the case now presented, it appears to the committee that there is a most glaring attempt at deception. That property is to be restored by a "loyal" directory is calculated to draw attention from the fact that it was to be restored to disloyal stockholders.

As to "loyal" boards Major General Thomas, on pages 83 and 84 of Report No. 31, testifies:

"I required the President to report the names of the directors, and then I made inquiry among those persons on whom I could rely as to the political status of the persons named." "I think some of them were not very loyal; but in the majority of the cases they complied with the terms laid down for them." "The men generally selected were men who, I think, were honestly supposed to be fair men if they were not truly loyal."

General Canby testifies on page 238 of Report No. 34:

"I required as a necessary antecedent condition that they should conform to the President's order of April 29, 1865, by taking the oath of allegiance prescribed in the regulations under the order." "At some time subsequently General Beauregard was appointed chief engineer or superintendent of the New Orleans and Jackson railroad until such time as he became president, some time in 1865."

On page 45, Report No. 3, the secretary and treasurer of the Atlantic and Gulf railroad testifies:

"I know the whole of the directors took the oath of allegiance—the amnesty oath. There was a general order given by General Gilmore, the commander of the district at the time, to restore the road to the directors."

On page 42 of Report No. 3 the president of the Georgia Central railroad testifies:

"Under these conditions [of loyalty] there remained directors and officers who managed the road who were also directors and managers during the rebellion;" "and who had been true to the rebel government."

Such is uniformly the character of the testimony on this point.

But the committee submit that it would be a difficult task to select a loyal board from disloyal presidents, directors, and stockholders; and repeat that the effect, if not the object, was to restore captured property to disloyal stockholders.

DISLOYAL STOCKHOLDERS, ETC.

In Report of Testimony No. 3, Fortieth Congress, the following testimony appears on pages as named, to wit: The president of the Richmond and Danville, and Richmond and Piedmont roads, on pages 3 and 4, testifies:

"Nine tenths of these roads is chiefly owned in the State of Virginia, the greater portion of it in the city of Richmond and along the line of road." "The State of Virginia owns three fifths of the stock." "I do not think the State owns quite that proportion of all the railroad stock of the State." "She does in all the leading roads—the costliest roads." "I have no doubt there are some loyal, but I cannot recall them now." "I am not aware of any of the stock of the company being now held in the North."

On page 9 the general superintendent of the Virginia Central railroad testifies:

"The stock is principally held in Virginia. The State owns three fifths and private stockholders own the rest. I do not think that $50,000 is held outside of the State." "I should suppose there are very few compared with the large mass of stockholders who were called loyal during the rebellion to the United States Government."

On page 15 the treasurer of the Richmond and York River road testifies:

"The stock of the road is principally held in Tidewater, Virginia." "Some of it is held in Baltimore." "Virginia owns five sevenths really" &c. "I really do not think I do know any stockholders in that road who were called loyal to the United States Government during the rebellion."

On pages 17 and 18 the superintendent of the Richmond, Fredericksburg, and Potomac road testifies:

"The majority of the stock is owned in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania; two fifths of the stock of the road between Richmond and Fredericksburg is owned by the State of Virginia." "I am not aware of any protest or remonstrance on the part of the northern stockholders against the use of the road in aid of the rebellion."

On page 19 the president of the Richmond and Petersburg road testifies:

"A large portion of the stock is held in this State, (Virginia)." "There is a very appreciable amount held in Philadelphia; a portion in New Hampshire, some in Georgia, and I think some in New York. The State of Virginia owns more than one third of the whole stock."

On page 25 the president of the North-eastern road, South Carolina, testifies:

"The stock of the road is owned entirely in the State and in Charleston." "The State owns $225,000 of it." "There is not a dollar of northern capital in any way invested in the road, that I am aware of."

On page 29 the superintendent of the Charleston and Savannah road testifies:

"The stock is entirely owned in the city of Charleston." "There is a little of it owned in Savannah, Georgia."

On page 40 the president of the Georgia Central road testifies:

"The stock is principally held in Georgia, and there is some of it held in the northern States." "I take it for granted that those in the North were loyal to the United States Government; those in the South, I presume, were as the southern people generally were."

On page 44 the secretary and treasurer of the Atlantic and Gulf railroad, Georgia, testifies:

"The stock is principally owned in Georgia. There are only a very few shares held at the North; I think only about twenty." One million dollars was owned by the State."

On page 51 the president of the Macon and Western railroad, Georgia, testifies:

"A very large portion of the stock is owned in the northern States, principally in New York; a portion in Charleston and Savannah; a little in the State of Georgia, and a good deal in Europe."

On page 55 the president of the Southwestern road, Georgia, testifies:

"The stock is owned principally in Georgia."

On page 57 the president of the Macon and Brunswick road testifies:

"The stock is owned principally in Macon. The city is a large stockholder in the road."

On page 60 it is in testimony that "the stock of the Western and Atlantic road is owned entirely by the State," and of the Montgomery and West Point road "in Alabama and in Georgia entirely."

On page 62 that the stock of the Atlantic and West Point road:

"Is owned by the Georgia Railroad Company and by individuals in Augusta, Georgia, and a good deal on line of road between Atlanta and West Point."

Pages 91, 96, 106, and 110 are also referred to; all which show that the stock in the roads in the late rebel States is owned principally in the South by those disloyal during the rebellion.

And, in connection with this subject of loyalty, the committee would direct attention to a few roads in Tennessee, in the interests of which, it seems, from the testimony, that claims are to be pressed based to some extent on loyalty. It has been the duty of the committee to scrutinize the testimony in these cases, that justice may be done both to the roads and to the Government; and that, if the claims are unjust in these few cases, in which alone it is presumed that claims can be established on the ground of loyalty, they may never be allowed to open wide the door to the national Treasury.

First. As to the East Tennessee and Virginia railroad.

Brigadier General L. S. Trowbridge, late of Knoxville, Tennessee, on page 23 of Report No. 34, testifies that "He had been appointed a commissioner, by the Governor of Tennessee, to aid in procuring against the bonds of that road, and the East Tennessee and Georgia railroad in favor of the Government, officers."

and that, in case of the East Tennessee and Virginia road—

"the offset is for material and supplies turned over by the road to the Government when General Burnside occupied East Tennessee, and for the use of rolling stock which was turned over at that time for the transportation of troops and other Government business, and for damages done to the road in the destruction of bridges and track. There are two accounts, the first one for materials, supplies, &c., which is $210,000; and the other for damages to the road, which is $276,000." The Government received materials, rolling stock, &c., to that value, voluntarily turned over to the Government by the company."

It is worthy of notice that to press the claims of the two roads just named a commissioner is sent to Washington, and that a former United States volunteer general officer becomes that commissioner. The testimony may disclose the fact that very unreasonable views were entertained as to the justice of such claims and the policy that should be pursued.

On page 24 of Report No. 34 this former general officer testifies:

"I have no doubt that the damages were sustained, because I helped to do a great deal of it myself. It is for the destruction of large bridges," &c.

He testifies further, on same page:

"My own judgment would be in the matter, so far as this road was concerned, (the East Tennessee and Virginia road,) that it ought to be paid, because they have pursued such a just course towards the Government, and therefore ought to be treated with much consideration. The fact that they retained all their rolling stock at Knoxville, furnished General Burnside with all the rolling stock he had, and which was the salvation of our troops there. He would not have had any rolling stock except for these cars retained by the president and Mr. Hoxie. This account is made up of large items for the destruction of large bridges, and amounts to $276,000. I have no doubt of the correctness of the account."

This commissioner bases this claim upon "the just course pursued toward the Government," and that "just course" is in having "voluntarily" turned over property to the Government and retained rolling stock and supplied General Burnside with the same. And to prove the correctness of his statement that such a just course was pursued he testifies on page 23 of Report No. 34:

"It was all voluntarily done; when General Burnside came into East Tennessee the directors of the East Tennessee and Virginia road held a meeting and resolved to retain all the rolling stock at Knoxville, and not to run it off. I have a copy of that resolution."

The same is found on page 23 of Report No. 34, as follows:

"The following is a true copy of the preamble and resolution passed at a meeting called by John R. Branner, president of the board of directors of this company, held at Rogersville Junction, September 2, 1863:

"Whereas the president and directors of the East Tennessee and Virginia Railroad Company, having met for the purpose of taking into consideration our duty, under the present condition of the country, have come to the following conclusions: That whereas the road-bed, rolling stock, with all the fixtures appertaining thereto, belong to the stockholders, a great portion of whom reside in East Tennessee and on the line of the road, and that we are nothing more than their trustees; and, unless instructed by them or compelled to do so by military authority, we do not feel authorized to remove the rolling stock or fixtures off of said road; and whereas we are to-day informed and believe our machine-shops, tools, &c., in Knoxville, are in the hands of the Federals: Therefore,

"Resolved, That we deem it impossible, under these circumstances, to run our trains upon said road, and now suspend the running of them for the present; and, in the event it is possible and prudent to run said road or a portion of it, the president and superintendent are authorized to resume it and suspend as the emergency under the circumstances requires."

The committee earnestly ask attention to this resolution and the statements of the witness. The resolution does not read, as witness says; "it is resolved not to run off the rolling stock;" but "we do not feel authorized to remove the rolling stock," &c. The resolution does not read: "it is resolved to retain all the rolling stock at Knoxville;" but "we are to-day informed and believe our machine-shops, tools, &c., in Knoxville, are in the hands of the Federals."

The committee see in this resolution no evidence of a "just course," "no voluntary act." The recollection of the witness, based on this resolution, is not sustained by the resolution itself, for it shows that machine-shops, &c., "were believed to be in the hands of the Federals, and that it was deemed impossible to run trains," &c.

And the testimony of another witness, although an interested one as superintendent of the road, is, on page 37 of Report No. 34, to the effect that the cars and locomotives were in Knoxville when it was captured by General Burnside; for he says:

"I was in Knoxville when General Burnside entered, and we succeeded in turning over to the Federal authorities thirty-six cars and five locomotives."

This would seem to be a good reason why it was deemed impossible to run trains. And the committee would suggest that in a manner very similar to this General Lee succeeded in turning over to General Grant a very large amount of munitions of war and a large number of prisoners.

The committee certainly have no disposition to do injustice to any individual or to any road, and would most gladly recognize loyalty where ever it may be found, and doubt not history will disclose many individual cases of self-sacrificing devotion to the flag of their country in the mountain regions of East Tennessee; but at the same time they are desirous, for the future safety of the country, of elevating the general standard of loyalty, that after generations may discover that even interest points to that loyalty which is shown by works and aids in the active defense of the Government when it is attacked. In other words, the committee would compensate that loyalty only which has been proven by works.

Therefore, and as the testimony is convincing that the first and great effort is to come from the State of Tennessee to obtain pay for property destroyed or damaged that had been used in war against the Government, and for the very use of such property by the Government, the committee think it important to investigate somewhat further the subject of loyalty in connection with this East Tennessee and Virginia road, in favor of which a more plausible argument may be made than any other.

The testimony inclines the committee to the belief that the president of this road, Mr. Branner, and the superintendent, J. B. Hoxie, preferred the United States Government, under the circumstances, to the rebel government; but there is an entire absence of testimony to show opposition to, or even open disapprobation of, the rebellion or earnest sympathy with the United States Government.

Take the resolution, which has been copied, of the board of directors, and it contains no words offensive to rebels. It speaks of duty "under the present condition of the country," the Federal arms, for the time being, being victorious. We find no words of greeting for the flag of the Union, for that would be offensive to rebels, but we "believe our shops, &c., are in the hands of the Federals." Had a reverse in arms occurred and the "Federals" been driven from Knoxville, a resolution of the same board that "under the present condition of the country we deem it our duty to run trains," &c., would not have been inconsistent.

And General Trowbridge, on page 23, Report No. 34, testifies that the above resolution was adopted "when General Burnside came into East Tennessee," while the resolution itself shows that it passed at a meeting held September 2, 1863. That was after the evacuation of Knoxville by the rebels, the "American Conflict," by Horace Greeley, page 428, showing that the Federal cavalry advance occupied it on the 1st of September.

Mr. J. B. Hoxie, superintendent, appears so anxious to be regarded as having been thoroughly loyal that on page 37 of Report No. 34 he testifies:

"Immediately after General Burnside entered he appointed me military superintendent of the road."

While history furnishes the fact that General Burnside entered Knoxville in person on the 3d of September, amid great demonstrations of loyalty, and on page 27 of Report No. 34 it will be seen that Mr. Hoxie was appointed on the 9th of September.

Looking a little further at the subject of loyalty and at facts connected with this road, apparently more loyal than any other, on page 36, Report No. 34, J. B. Hoxie is seen to testify as follows:

"My residence during the war was at Knoxville." "A portion of the time I was an engineer connected with the road." "During the rebellion we were engaged in carrying troops, munitions of war, and everything else that was offered," "by the direction of the officers of the road."

On page 51, Report No. 34, Mr. P. Dickinson, a stockholder and director in this road, testifies:

"Before Burnside came he [Mr. Branner, president of the road] was at home." "His road was run under his own control." "In the transportation of troops for the rebels from one part of the country to another, and their supplies," &c. "He pursued the same course in regard to the road that he did for the Federals, that is, he permitted the road to be used by the rebels in the same way that he permitted Burnside to use it; he allowed it to be used by the power that held the country." "Burnside took the road out of his possession, and he had nothing to do with it after Burnside arrived there until it was returned."

This is certainly an instance of submission to "the powers that be." Whether the governing spirit was a Christian one or the prevailing desire was to save property remains to be seen. On pages 52 and 53 of Report No. 34 John Williams testifies:

"Mr. Branner was, I unhesitatingly say, a Union man in his sympathies. "I was a Union man myself, and he expressed himself very freely to me." "Besides I have knowledge of his having done some acts there as a railroad president that no man would have done had he been in sympathy with the rebellion. I think, so far as Mr. Branner was able to do so he had Union men on his road in his employment. He could not, however, fill all the places in that way, because some of them were in there when the rebellion commenced; and if he had turned them out it would have looked as if he had done so because they were rebels, and he would have been charged with being a Union man, and in all probability had his road taken away." "Mr. Moxie was situated in this way. He is a northern man, and, as you know personally and by proof, there are a great many of these northern men in Tennessee who had to get along with the rebels the best way they could. He was very quiet." "There were some persons in East Tennessee who were real Union men at heart and yet who played rebel during the rebel occupancy of that country. They did so for the purpose of protecting themselves and their property."

So here we have Union officers running their road more than two years in aid of the rebellion in such manner as not to be charged with being Union men, in order to protect themselves and their property.

They were "very quiet." This brings to mind the Christian who says nothing for his Saviour, but is ever ready when about to fall into the hands of the devil, to say, "Old fellow, I am glad to see you; I have been doing all I could for you on these low grounds of sorrow."

The committee would ask: Is the country prepared to say Union men are justified in aiding the rebellion to save their property? The committee think not. And this is the most favorable aspect of this case.

The committee would say there may here be evidence of neutrality—of indifference, except as to saving property. But is the country prepared to call neutrality loyalty—such loyalty as must be rewarded by a remuneration for losses incurred in consequence of their own lukewarmness to the Government? If so, patriotism is a mockery, and it is more than folly to pay bounties to those earnest men who stood by the country in its danger or to acknowledge our debt of gratitude by paying pensions to the bereaved survivors of her defenders.

If neutrality be loyalty then the Claib Jackson administration in Missouri, which said, "not a man nor a dollar to aid in the unholy war," was loyal.

If in religion such neutrality, lukewarmness, caused mere professors, "neither hot nor cold," to be spewed out of the mouth, so should it be in cases of neutrality toward the Government.

The committee take the position that active loyalty alone is that genuine loyalty that should be recognized and rewarded.

But the committee would pursue the loyal branch of this subject further and investigate this East Tennessee and Virginia road, as the testimony will not admit of an argument for a moment in favor of the loyal sympathies of the directory or of the stockholders of any other road during the rebellion, except only one short road, the Rogersville branch of the East Tennessee and Virginia road.

This professedly loyal railroad president, Mr. Branner, does what? Complies with the executive order requiring a bond to be given for the payment of the debt contracted by the purchase of rolling stock to the amount of $265,655 65; but complied, as the testimony discloses, to violate it, having obtained the advantage of the Government.

On page 203 of Report No. 34 it appears that this railroad president "represented that for various reasons it was impossible for him to commence and continue regularly the monthly payments, but that he would be able to do so after July, 1866;" and that thereupon General Thomas ordered that—

"In view of the statements made, the time for paying the first monthly installment be extended until the first day of August, 1866, when it is expected that they will be ready to commence their payments and continue them regularly thereafter, according to the terms of their bonds."

It will be perceived, on page 327 of Report No. 34, from statement heretofore copied into this report, that this road had, on the 30th June, 1866, paid but little more than half the interest due and none of the principal, the payment on the interest being by an account for transportation, and therefore that the debt had increased between six and seven thousand dollars.

It will be seen on page 204 of Report No. 34 that this railroad president had no regard to his promise "to pay after July" and to General Thomas's order to pay 1st August: but that on 22d August, 1866, it became necessary for Major S. R. Hamill, chief quartermaster United States military railroads, to notify him that the time granted had expired. This caused Mr. Branner, as seen on same page, to address Major Hamill by letter, 29th August, 1866, presenting considerations which he trusted would "be sufficient to induce the United States Government to act with patience, lenience, and liberality:" among which considerations are expenditures for the road in its repairs, &c., and having "met the interest due July 1, 1866, on State aid furnished the road."

The committee here only remark that the bond of the road to the Government is violated and promise disregarded partly to pay interest on obligations to the State of Tennessee, entered into prior to its act of secession.

This letter was referred to General Thomas, and in due course to the Quartermaster General, for the orders of the Secretary of War; and for a more satisfactory understanding of the case the committee here give the various letters of transmittal, to be found on pages 205, 206, 207, and 208 of Report No. 34, as follows:

DEPT. OF THE TENN.,
CHIEF QUARTERMASTER'S OFFICE,
U. S. MILITARY RAILROADS,
NASHVILLE, TENN., August 31, 1866.

Respectfully forwarded to Brigadier General W. D. Whipple, Chief of Staff, Department of the Tennessee.

When the time for the payment of the first installment due from the East Tennessee and Virginia Railroad Company was extended until August 1 the major general commanding directed me to insist upon prompt payment of all installments due after the extension should expire. No arrangement was made by the East Tennessee and Virginia Railroad Company to meet the amount due August 1, 1866, nor did they even express their disability to pay until after I had notified them that unless they took immediate steps to make the payments due I should enforce the penalty of the bond. The extension was granted by the major general commanding upon terms proposed by Mr. Branner himself, and upon the same reasons shown in his present letter.

It will be noticed that Mr. Branner mentions no time when he expects to be able to commence the payment of the installments due. Under the circumstances I do not feel authorized to recommend the extension; but being firmly convinced that it is the settled policy of this as well as of other roads to postpone the payment of the sums due the United States indefinitely, hoping eventually to have the whole indebtedness cancelled by legislative enactments, I, on the contrary, recommend that further extensions be not granted, unless the claim of Mr. Branner for supplies furnished General Burnside be considered a valid one. Regarding the merits of this claim I have no information.

I would respectfully urge a more decided policy toward these companies who fail to make payments even under the extended terms granted by the Government, for the following additional reason:

Roads which are financially in as bad condition as those to which extensions have been granted, but which have succeeded in making payments promptly as they become due, without in any manner crippling the operations of the roads, learning the terms granted to other roads, or that payment is not exacted from them, claim, with truth, that they are entitled to the same terms.

I cite, as an illustration of this, the case of the Nashville and Decatur railroad line, which has paid promptly, while other roads, possessing greater facilities for and doing a larger business, have made no payments except in transportation, which barely absorbed the interest due, if it even did that, as is the case with the East Tennessee and Virginia railroad.

The original purchase charged against this road amounted to $265,655 65. It will be seen by reference to the inclosed statement of account that the amount now due from this road is $273,286 58.

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF THE TENNESSEE,
NASHVILLE, TENNESSEE, September 3, 1866.

Respectfully forwarded to the Quartermaster General United States Army, for the orders of the honorable Secretary of War.

W. D. WHIPPLE,
Brev. Brig. Gen. and Acting Adj. Gen., (in absence of the Maj. Gen. Commanding.)

QUARTERMASTER GENERAL'S OFFICE,

WASHINGTON, D. C., September 18, 1866.

SIR: I have the honor to forward herewith the application of the East Tennessee and Virginia Railroad Company for an extension of its time of payment of its debt to the United States, transmitted from headquarters Department of the Tennessee, through this office, for the orders of the honorable Secretary of War.

This railroad leads from Knoxville to Bristol, Tennessee, and is one hundred and thirty miles long. It is charged with $265,655 65 for material purchased of the United States in September and October, 1865, under executive orders of August 8 and October 14, 1865, for the prompt payment of which in equal monthly installments within two years, with interest at the rate of seven and three tenths per cent. per annum, the railroad company, through John R. Branner, president, has given bond, December 9, 1865, to the amount of $500,000. The time for the collection of the first monthly installment, payable per terms of bond December 1, 1865, was deferred to August 1, 1866, by Major General George H. Thomas, to whom the executive order committed the transfer of railroad rolling stock in the southwest.

A second indulgence is now asked, no time being stated when the road will commence payment of installments due. Major General Thomas, in granting the previous extension, directed that prompt payment of all installments due after its expiration should be insisted upon. This application has not received the recommendation of Major General Thomas.

The application is forwarded by Brevet Major S. R. Hamill, in charge of United States military railroads, Nashville, Tennessee, with a statement of the indebtedness of the road on August 31, 1866, showing it to be $273,286 58, or nearly eight thousand dollars greater from accumulation of interest than the original debt. I invite attention to the report of Major Hamill and concur in it.

No disposition whatever appears to be evinced by this road to meet its engagements with the United States, (the comparatively small sum paid ($2,341) being an account for transportation, which the company had no choice but to place to the credit of their account with the United States. It would be, I think, to the detriment of the interests of the Government to encourage the non-compliance with the obligations voluntarily and formally entered into with it, and would cause other roads which now manifest a willingness to abide by their obligations to complain of partiality and to fail, also, hereafter in the discharge of them.

I respectfully recommend that the application be not granted.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
M. C. MEIGS,
Quartermaster General U. S. A. and Brevet Maj. Gen.

Report on Southern Railroads.

40TH CONG....2D SESS.

CHIEF QUARTERMASTER'S OFFICE,
UNITED STATES MILITARY RAILROADS,
NASHVILLE, TENNESSEE, October 16, 1866.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose herewith a statement of the indebtedness of the East Tennessee and Virginia Railroad Company to the United States on account of purchase of material under executive orders. You are respectfully informed that your application for a second extension of time in which to make payments of interest and installment, having been referred to the honorable Secretary of War, has been returned to this office disapproved.

My orders in the premises are imperative, and no further delay pending application for extension of time can be allowed; and you are further informed that unless the payment of all arrears from the expiration of your extension ~~are~~ provided for by the 27th instant I shall proceed to enforce the terms of the bond executed by your company.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

S. R. HAMILL,

QUARTERMASTER GENERAL'S OFFICE,
WASHINGTON, D. C., October 24, 1866.

MAJOR: You will report without delay the amount claimed by the East Tennessee and Virginia Railroad Company to be due them for transportation services not credited, and what portion thereof should be credited on their account.

By order of the Quartermaster General.

Respectfully, your obedient servant,

ALEXANDER BLISS,

*Colonel Quartermaster's Department,

Brevet Major S. R. HAMILL,
Assistant Quartermaster, Nashville, Tennessee.

A true copy:

S. R. HAMILL,

Brevet Major, Assistant Quartermaster.

In which correspondence it will be perceived that Major S. R. Hamill says:

"Under the circumstances I do not feel authorized to recommend the extension; but, being firmly convinced that it is the settled policy of this as well as of other roads to postpone the payment of the sums due the United States indefinitely, hoping eventually to have the whole indebtedness canceled by legislative enactments, I, on the contrary, recommend that further extensions be not granted, unless the claim of Mr. Branner for supplies furnished General Burnside be considered a valid one." "I would respectfully urge a more decided policy toward these companies who fail to make payments even under the extended terms granted by the Government."

And Quartermaster General M. C. Meigs, in his letter of transmittal, remarks:

"I invite attention to the report of Major Hamill, and concur in it. No disposition whatever appears to be evinced by this road to meet its engagements with the United States. It would be, I think, to the detriment of the interests of the Government to encourage the non-compliance with the obligations voluntarily and formally entered into with it, and would cause other roads which now manifest a willingness to abide by their obligations to complain of partiality and to fail, also, hereafter in the discharge of them."

The recommendation of the Quartermaster General was approved by the Secretary of War.

Mr. Branner, president of the road, was duly informed that the application for a second extension of time was disapproved. This was under date 16th of October, 1866; and he was also then informed by Major S. R. Hamill that "unless payment of arrears should be provided for by the 27th of that month, he would proceed to enforce the terms of the bond."

On 23d of same month the President directed proceedings against that road to be suspended until further orders.

On 24th January, 1867, (see pages 209 and 210, Report No. 34,) Secretary of War E. M. Stanton addressed a communication to the President, reiterating the facts upon which was based the recommendation of the Quartermaster General, approved by the Secretary of War, that the extension requested should not be granted, and recommending that the case be referred to Major General Thomas for report, whether any, and, if so, what further, extension should be granted.

This reference to General Thomas was approved by the President. It was in due course referred to Mr. Branner, president of the road, and by him replied to on the 19th February, 1867. (See pages 211 and 212 of Report No. 34.) This reply of Mr. Branner was referred to Major S. R. Hamill, and by him, on 4th March, 1867, returned to Major General Thomas (see pages 213 and 214 of Report No. 34) with a report. In that report Major Hamill says:

"There is abundant reason to believe that the East Tennessee and Virginia Railroad Company is able to pay at least a large portion of their indebtedness, nor is such ability denied by Mr. Branner. To make such a settlement as is suggested by Mr. Branner with any of the railroad companies of the Southwest without doing gross injustice to the Government is absolutely impossible. The only manner to make such settlement without stultifying and disgracing the Government would be to pay each stockholder, upon proof of loyalty to the Government, the amount of his individual loss as a member of the corporation, and let the disloyal submit to at least one of the just results of treason and rebellion. If this claim is admitted as an offset to the indebtedness the precedent will not only impede but stop collections from every railroad in the Southwest, and render treason not only respectable but pecuniarily advantageous. Mr. Branner's present letter is only a repetition of that of August, 1866, in detail; and I can see no reason for changing my recommendation. I respectfully recommend that no further extension be granted, but that payment be exacted."

The committee have been able to find no revocation, in consequence of the recommendation of Major Hamill, of the President's order directing proceedings to be suspended; but that order of 23d October, 1866, is still in existence, with all the virtue it ever had.

And how hopeful Mr. Branner is of ultimate success may be readily seen by a reference to page 89 of Report of Testimony No. 3, of Fortieth Congress, and heretofore copied into this report, where it appears that that road had reduced its indebtedness on 1st November, 1867, to the Government only $6,500, leaving a debt, originally $265,655 65, of $259,154 51.

But it may be well to notice the testimony of this railroad president, who claims to have been loyal. On page 115 of Report No. 3 he testifies:

"I do not deny but I played sometimes to save my road and myself a little secession, as we all did down there. There is no secret about that. Every prominent man had to do so who staid there."

How easy it is for one who "played secession" to save his property to play Union likewise when interest dictates we can understand when we find this witness and railroad president testifying on page 118, Report No. 3:

"My feelings and sentiments were Union, and all prominent Union men in the country knew it;"

and on page 115, Report No. 3, presenting a copy of an account of his road against the United States, of which $276,726 are for destruction of bridges, rolling stock, depot buildings, &c.; and on page 117, Report No. 3, replying, in answer to questions:

"I suppose we ought to entertain, in addition to these accounts, at some time or another, an account for the use of the road by the United States Government."

The committee have spoken thus at length of this East Tennessee and Virginia road because the indications are that Tennessee roads will be used in the attempt to open the way to the United States Treasury for the payment of such claims as have been alluded to. Should it be contended that such accounts should be allowed, and especially of this road, because of the loyalty of stockholders, the testimony of Mr. Branner himself, whose neutral position certainly does not entitle him to the character of a competent judge of the loyalty of others, shows that a portion of them were disloyal. (See pages 115 and 116, Report No. 3.) Neither are prominent men of Tennessee united in their opinion as to the loyalty of Mr. Branner, for, while Joseph A. Cooper, general commanding State militia, on page 86, Report No. 3, testifies:

"He [Branner] was a Union man at the breaking out of the war, and so continued during the war;"

Major Samuel Hunt, on page 79, Report No. 3, testifies:

"During the rebellion I resided a portion of the time in East Tennessee, and I was a portion of the time a private soldier, and a portion of the time major of the ninth Tennessee cavalry;"

And—

"I have understood, since the Federal Army came into East Tennessee, that during the rebellion Mr. Branner was not considered a Union man. I never heard any one accuse him of it."

And it is well to remark here that this witness, who proved his loyalty by risking his life, does not agree with Mr. Branner, an interested witness, in his opinion as to the loyalty of the stockholders of this road. On page 79 of Report No. 3 he testifies:

"The majority of them were not loyal, but participated in and sympathized with the rebellion. I apply this to the directors, officers, and stockholders of the road."

THE EAST TENNESSEE AND GEORGIA ROAD.

But the importance of this subject compels the committee to direct attention to another road—the East Tennessee and Georgia—that it may be seen how formidable is the combination to press the unjust claims of these roads.

On the 20th day of November, 1867, the following joint resolution was adopted by the General Assembly of Tennessee—(see page 27, Report No. 34:)

General Assembly of Tennessee—Joint Resolution No. 1.

Whereas the State of Tennessee has invested in the East Tennessee and Virginia, and the East Tennessee and Georgia railroads over four million dollars; and whereas when the military authorities turned over these roads to their owners the companies were compelled to purchase largely of the rolling stock and fixtures, thus incurring large debts; and whereas the Government is pressing the collection of these heavy debts notifying the companies of its purpose to take possession of the roads; and whereas the companies claim that after all just credits are given for the use of these roads by the Government but little, if anything, will be owing to the Government: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Tennessee, That the Governor be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint a commissioner on behalf of the State to proceed at once to Washington, with books and accounts, to act in connection with two other commissioners appointed by Presidents Branner and Callaway, and effect a final settlement.

Be it further resolved, That the commissioner on the part of the State be allowed a fair compensation for his services, to be approved by the Governor; and that the comptroller issue his warrant for the same after said services shall have been rendered: Provided, That the Governor shall have power to appoint similar commissioners for other roads when in his judgment it is necessary: And provided, further, That the expense incurred for the pay and expenses of said commissioners shall be paid by the said roads.

Adopted by the Senate November 16, 1866.

Amended and concurred in by the House of Representatives November 17, 1866.

Amendment concurred in by the Senate November 20, 1866.

WILLIAM HEISKELL,

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

JOSHUA B. FRIERSON,

Speaker of the Senate.

And the following appointment was made, (see page 28 of Report No. 34:)

STATE OF TENNESSEE, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
NASHVILLE, November 23, 1866.

GENERAL: In accordance with the provisions of the foregoing joint resolution, you are hereby appointed commissioner in behalf of the State, to cooperate with the representatives of the East Tennessee and Virginia, and East Tennessee and Georgia railroads, in effecting a settlement with the United States Government in their accounts with the aforesaid roads.

You will at once enter upon the duties of said office and report your action to this department.

WILLIAM G. BROWNLOW, Governor.

By the Governor:

A. J. FLETCHER, Secretary of State.

So that the General Assembly of Tennessee seem to have forgotten their duty to uphold the national credit, and blinded by the investment of a few million dollars in railroads, encourage in effect the roads to dishonor their bonds when, in the words of Major Hamill, (page 213, Report No. 34,) "their execution was certainly known to be a prerequisite to the transfer of the property."

40TH CONG....2D SESS.

Report on Southern Railroads.

HO. OF REPS.

And the language of the preamble of that resolution is calculated—the committee will not say intended—to deceive. If the “companies” were compelled to purchase largely,” &c, the testimony is conclusive that the necessities of the roads, not Government officials, compelled the purchase. On this point there is nothing in the testimony as to any of the roads to contradict that of J. B. Hoxie, superintendent of the East Tennessee and Virginia road.

On pages 38 and 39 of Report No. 34 he testifies:

“They told us that any stock which we then wanted we could have, and we made a selection of such stock as we needed, and retained it.” “The prices were very high, indeed.” “We were compelled to have the property.” “We could not carry on our business without it.”

And bearing that joint resolution an ex-general of the Union Army is in Washington, January 14, 1867, as a commissioner, to effect a settlement with the United States Government; and, in behalf of a road, the East Tennessee and Georgia, that nine months after that time, November 1, 1867, is owing the Government (see page 89 of Report No. 3) $353,153 15, having reduced its indebtedness only about sixteen thousand dollars, is of course prepared to adopt the language of the preamble of the resolution which he holds in his hand: “This company claims that, after all just credits are given for the use of this road by the Government, but little, if anything, will be owing to the Government,” while on oath he testifies, page 26 of Report No. 34:

“Although I am representing the interests of the East Tennessee and Georgia road, I must say that they did run off their stock and machinery, too.”

And the committee will add, although it seems, from the testimony that the president of this road during the rebellion, Campbell Wallace, was notoriously disloyal. Of him, the present president of that road, Thomas H. Callaway, testified on page 96 of Report No. 3:

“I suppose the fact is not controverted at all that he was a rebel.”

And as to the loyalty of the stockholders of this road, Mr. Callaway, the present president, testifies on same page:

“I cannot tell with certainty as to the whole of the stockholders. There was a portion of them thorough Union men; there was another portion of them, and a large number of them, that were southern in their feelings and were for the confederacy.” “A great many of them lived in Augusta and Charleston.”

This testimony comes with much force, as it is from a railroad president as to stockholders of his own road; and from one “neither hot nor cold;” for he testifies, same page:

“Union men understood one another and talked freely,” &c.; “but they did not talk so that confederates would know and hear it.” “I was opposed to the war, &c.; still I was forced not to talk, and I had to seem to go with it at times.”

As to this road, so far as the committee have been able to procure testimony, it appears, on pages 201, 202, and 203 of Report No. 34, that after the time had expired for extension of payments on bonds, 1st August, 1866, and Major Hamill had notified the president of the road that without immediate steps for payment of the amount due he would proceed to enforce the terms of the bond, the Secretary of War, E. M. Stanton, ordered, 30th August, 1866, proceedings to be suspended until further orders. So far as the committee can ascertain there has been no revocation of that order.

NASHVILLE AND CHATTANOOGA RAILROAD.

For reasons heretofore stated, the committee must notice the Nashville and Chattanooga road somewhat further.

It has already been shown in this report that the value of property purchased from the Government, and for which bond was given, by this road in the fall of 1865 was $1,566,551 78, (page 327, Report No. 34,) and that its indebtedness on 31st January, 1867, was $1,532,740 60, (page 190, Report No. 34,) being a reduction in fifteen months of but $33,811 13, the collection having been suspended on May 5, 1866, (see page 221, Report No. 34,) by order of the President, and that Michael Burns, president of the road, was pressing claims “for its use during its occupancy by the United States.”

To fully understand the animus of Mr. Burns and the feeling of security he evidently indulged while failing to comply with his bond, the committee direct attention to the correspondence on pages 218, 219, 220, and 221 of Report No. 34, where it will be seen that three letters, bearing respective dates 31st March, 3d April, and 4th April, 1866, from Major Hamill, under instructions from General George H. Thomas, were necessary to draw from Mr. Burns a reluctant reply, as follows:

NASHVILLE AND CHATTANOOGA RAILROAD COMPANIES, PRESIDENT'S OFFICE.
NASHVILLE, TENNESSEE, April 5, 1866.

CAPTAIN: I have the honor to inform you that the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad Company will pay you one installment of the amount due the United States Government for purchases of material under the executive orders of August 8 and October 14, 1865, together with accrued interest on the amount of purchase, within five days from this date. I have further to state that as far as it is in the power of this company installments and interests will be paid in the future as they fall due.

Very respectfully,
M. BURNS,
President Nashville and Chattanooga and Nashville and Northwestern railroads.

Captain S. R. HAMILL, Disbursing Quartermaster
United States Military Railroads.

A true copy:
S. R. HAMILL,
Brevet Major, Assistant Quartermaster.

This was referred to General Thomas on same day, and on 17th of April, 1866, returned to Major Hamill with a communication as follows:

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF THE TENNESSEE.
NASHVILLE, TENNESSEE, April 17, 1866.

CAPTAIN: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of April 5, transmitting a proposition from M. Burns, Esq., president of the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad Company, of same date, to commence the payment of the monthly installments due the United States, together with accrued interest, in five days. Your letter invites attention to two facts in connection with the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad Company, the first of which is that the company has not availed itself of the act of Assembly permitting it to fund arrearages of interest upon their mortgage bonds, by doing which they would have been fully able to pay all installments now due to the United States.

The second is that at a late meeting of the board of directors the president of the road was directed to pay at once the debts incurred by the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad Company while operating within the lines of the military authorities of the late rebel government, and that the debts of this character already liquidated amount to over one hundred thousand dollars.

The major general commanding is of the opinion that these acts constitute a breach of faith with the United States on the part of the board of directors, and lays the board open to at least the suspicion of a deliberate intention to defraud the United States, when purchases were made from the latter and bonds executed to secure the payment of the debt, and the effect must be to prevent such fraud in future by compelling the regular payment of monthly installments due the United States, with accrued interest.

As the money which should have been applied to the liquidation of the debt due the United States has been paid out, and gone beyond the control of the company, we can do no better than accept the proposition of M. Burns, which you are authorized to do, and compel prompt compliance with the conditions thereof in the future.

Inclosed herewith I return Mr. Burns's letter to you, above referred to.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
WILLIAM D. WHIPPLE,
Brevet Brigadier General and Chief of Staff.

Captain S. R. HAMILL,
Chief Quartermaster United States
Military Railroads, Nashville, Tennessee.

In obedience to which, on 5th May, 1866, Major Hamill addressed Mr. Burns requesting a check for the balance due and unpaid, which was replied to by an order of same date from the President of the United States, directing that collection be suspended until further orders, &c.

There has been no revocation of that order, and the effect is that on 1st day of November, 1867, (see page 89 of Report No. 3,) this road was owing the Government $1,556,893 57, only $9,658 16 less than in the fall of 1865, showing an increase of debt in nine months preceding 1st November, 1867, of $24,152 97; this road which, as early as 5th April, 1866, “had liquidated debts incurred while operating within the lines of the military authorities of the rebel government amounting to over one hundred thousand dollars,” and which, according to the testimony of Mr. Burns himself, on page 282, Report No. 34, had paid “nearly five hundred thousand dollars interest on the bonds of the company indorsed by the State, and which were held in New York and other places during the rebellion,” “out of the net earnings of the road for the fifteen months ending on the 1st January, 1867, which was about five hundred and twenty-four thousand dollars or little over that.” There is also testimony to show that dividends have been paid to stockholders.

Of this road, Michael Burns, on page 296, Report No. 34, testifies:

“After the fall of Fort Donelson the then president, V. K. Stevenson, or the rebel so-called government of the road, took off the rolling stock down South. During the rebellion he was there; he was running this stock on other roads,” &c.

Of this road, William Spence, a farmer, residing at Murfreesboro', Tennessee, on pages 77 and 78 of Report No. 3, testifies:

“My home has been at Murfreesboro' for forty years, two and a half miles south of the Nashville and Chattanooga railroad. I was a director from the commencement of the road until 1858. I am now a director appointed by the State. If my recollection serves me right, the directors were all rebels, from the president down. I do not suppose there were ten loyal stockholders on the whole road, and of the directors every one of them was disloyal.”

Of this road, the present president, Michael Burns, testifies, pages 236 and 297 of Report No. 34:

“During the early days of the rebellion I was in Nashville engaged in the saddlery, hardware, and shoe-finding business, and remained there and in that business until the Federal Army took possession of that part of the country. I sold it all through the country. I had an extensive trade in Tennessee, Kentucky, Georgia, and Alabama. I did a very large wholesale and retail business. I declined to supply the confederate government, but I sold to persons whom I suppose sold to it. I was compelled to take confederate scrip or not sell my goods, &c. I remained at home. I was opposed to the war, and would not vote for secession because I thought it unnecessary and uncalled for. I had two alternatives—either to leave the country or stay at home. I staid at home and sympathized with the southern people, but took no active part in anything. I never took the oath of allegiance to either government during the war. I was not very violent on either side.”

Of this road's present president, Michael Burns, on page 83, Report No. 3, W. E. Gleaves, secretary and treasurer of the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad Company while down South during the rebellion and after the war for about nine months, testifies:

“Mr. Burns was a member of a vigilance committee here. This committee was to decide who was loyal or disloyal to the confederate government. This committee was appointed by the confederate government, and if they found the presence of a man objectionable in the community they could remove him. Mr. Burns also equipped an artillery company which served in the confederate army.”

And of him Mr. Spence, a resident of forty years, who testified above on another point, testifies on page 78, Report No. 3:

“I was not well acquainted with Mr. Burns's political status. When Governor Johnson was appointed military governor he sent for me and asked me several questions about Mr. Burns. He had been applying to the governor for something, and he doubted his loyalty. I could not give him the information he wanted. Afterward he told me that Mr. Burns had been a pretty bad rebel. Shortly after that he got into considerable favor with Governor Johnson and was considered a good loyal man.”

Of this road Enos Hopkins, on pages 83 and 84 of Report No. 3, testifies:

“We built the bridges, repaired the track, and put the road in running order. The bridges were all destroyed. I worked at both ends of the road. At one end the track was in very bad order and the road nearly a wreck,” &c. “When the road was turned over to the company it was in very good condition,” &c.

And on pages 67 and 68 of Report No. 3 William P. Innis testifies:

“I was superintendent from September 15, 1865, until September 1, 1867. My connection with it before that was during the war, when I built some bridges and laid the track,” &c. “Considering road-bed, buildings, and all, in the road was in better condition when restored to the company after the war than when first taken possession of by the United States troops, by $150,000.”

Ho. OF REPS.

Report on Southern Railroads.

40TH CONG....2D SESS.

Of this road the testimony is, on page 329 of Report No. 34, that "the cost of materials used and labor performed for its construction and maintenance of way," exclusive of the labor of troops, "was $4,079,511 33;" and we have already seen that rolling stock, &c., were sold to it more than two years since to the value of $1,566,551 73; and still its rebel sympathizing president testifies on page 290, Report No. 34—

"Upon a just and fair settlement the United States Government would be largely in its debt."

And on page 300—

"I made this claim to get payment for the use of the road during its occupation by the military." "The United States owes us a good deal, and we should insist on a settlement. There is no use in making payments when there is money due to you."

NASHVILLE AND NORTHWESTERN ROAD.

It would generally be presumed that even rebel shamelessness could not exceed in impudence this last demand; but the committee would present another case for the consideration of the House and of the country, that of the Nashville and Northwestern road.

From tabular statement heretofore embodied in this report, taken from page 323 of Report No. 34, of railroads seized and operated by the Government, it appears that this road was taken possession of February 4, 1864, and that the terminal points of the road operated were Nashville on the east, and Johnsonville, on the Tennessee river, on the west, and the distance seventy-eight miles.

William P. Innis, superintendent of this road, on page 65 of Report No. 3, testifies:

"The greater part of that road was constructed by me." "In the spring of 1862 I was ordered by General Roscerans to make a reconnaissance and to estimate to him what it would cost, which I did." "The road at that time was built from this end (meaning Nashville) and the track laid for a distance of twenty-seven miles. From the other end, called Johnsonville, it was laid about five miles in this direction. The balance of the road was pretty nearly graded, and the ties had been procured for it. Some, however, had been destroyed by guerrillas. Some of the bridges had been destroyed and some were not built, but the timber was ready." "I took four companies of my own regiment and two regiments of colored troops, with such civilians as I could have." "I remained in charge until General Sherman's advance on Atlanta." "At the time I left the road the bridges were nearly all built, the grading nearly all done, and the iron laid to about section thirty-four from this end. I was ordered by General Roscerans to purchase the iron for the balance of the road, about three thousand tons; and the iron was all here at Nashville at the time I was relieved." "At the time I left I estimated it would take from one hundred thousand dollars to one hundred and fifty thousand dollars to put it in order." "I do not include the labor of the troops; merely the hired labor of civilians."

Of course the iron purchased was not included, as it alone had already cost double one hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

But, without going more into details, the tabular statement on page 329 of Report No. 34, made by Colonel Alexander Bliss, in charge of fourth division of quartermaster's department, shows that the cost of materials and labor performed for construction, &c., of this road, for about forty-six miles, by the Government was $1,471,397 96.

And yet the president of this road, Michael Burns, who is also, as has been seen, president of the Nashville and Chattanooga road, claims, as seen from his testimony on page 283 of Report No. 34, "$848,160 96 over and above the work done completing the road." And on page 284 it appears that of this amount "$449,074 96 are for the use of the road and the remainder for materials taken and engines and cars used."

Let it be borne in mind that the same one who acknowledged himself a southern sympathizer is president of this road as well as of the Nashville and Chattanooga.

And as to the loyalty of the stockholders of this road, the superintendent of the road, on page 66 of Report No. 3, testifies:

"There are very few of what you call loyal men in this country, but some of them are fair men." "I do not think any of them were what you would term loyal men."

He likewise testifies, page 66, in Report No. 3:

"The stock of the Nashville and Northwestern road is owned principally in this city [Nashville] and on the line of the road."

And as still further indicating the rebel sympathies of the directors and stockholders of this road, its president, on page 277 of Report No. 34, in reply to the question, "Had any work been done on the road during the rebel occupation?" says:

"Before the fall of Fort Donelson there was some work being done by the company, but it ceased after the fall of that place."

The committee have already directed attention to the testimony that this railroad president came to Washington and employed agents to press the claim of this road against the Government and to procure extensions of payments due on the bond.

The indifference with which he treated the pressing demands for payments by Assistant Quartermaster Hamill may be better understood when the testimony shows that there is actually an increase of the indebtedness of this road under the operation of the order of suspension of proceedings against it. On page 90 of Report No. 3, in tabular statement of indebtedness of railroads on November 1, 1867, which statement is heretofore copied into this report, it will be seen that the value of property for which bond was given by this road was $525,400 26 in the fall of 1865, and that on November 1, 1867, it was $575,920 66, and that of $31,331 20 of payments in all but $1,476 82 were in cash, the remainder being by transportation accounts and mail service.

Where this railroad president finds encouragement to continue to disgracefully suffer the bond of this road to the Government to be dishonored others can conjecture as well as this committee. But it is not in consequence of inability to pay, for at a late day—30th November, 1867—this Michael Burns testified before the committee, and to the question "In regard to the Nashville and Northwestern railroad, what has been lately done in reference to its construction?" he replied:

"Since the cessation of hostilities the work from Johnsonville to the Mississippi river has been built; the distance is about ninety-three miles. There was a portion of this road built before the war and I completed the rest. The company gave $350,000 in Tennessee bonds, $100,000 in cash, and $380,000 in second mortgage bonds of the company. In March last we had a freshet and the contractors refused to work, and the company gave them $30,000 in addition to finish the work. This does not include the iron or spikes or chains; the company paid for them. The $130,000 in money were derived from the sale of Tennessee bonds partly, partly from the earnings of the road, and from some little collections made from old subscriptions. The earnings were light, and we used them in the construction of the road and in paying some old debts."

There is enough in this testimony to show that $130,000 cash have been lately expended in the construction of the road west of Johnsonville to the Mississippi river, and still an unnamed sum in paying some old debts, instead of those amounts having been in good faith applied to payment of debt due the Government; but more, it shows, also, that for this new portion of road iron, &c., have been paid for; and so far as the committee are informed for about eighty-six miles—say about six hundred thousand dollars. And this railroad president suffers the interest on the road's bond to the Government to accumulate; this president who testifies on page 291 of Report No. 34:

"As long as I represent the interests of others, if the Government should attempt to seize the road I will bring the matter into the courts, and I will go to the utmost end to oppose them."

As this president of two important roads, owing large debts to the Government, almost defies the authorities to attempt to enforce the bonds of these roads, and at the same time pays, from the earnings of the very rolling stock for which the bonds are given, debts contracted by the roads while in rebellion and interest on bonds indorsed by the State of Tennessee before the rebellion, the committee consider it their duty to present other facts, as shown by testimony, which may or may not explain his defiant and remarkable conduct. On pages 634, 635, 643 and 644 of the testimony in the impeachment investigation it appears that Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, holds $30,000 of bonds, $19,000 of which are of the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad Company, indorsed by the State of Tennessee; $1,000 of the Tennessee and Virginia road, indorsed by the State of Tennessee, and $10,000 State bonds of Tennessee; and that on the $19,000 interest from in 1861 was paid in 1866 (say for five years some $5,000) and new bonds issued for the interest on the remaining bonds. These facts, taken in connection with the sixth paragraph of Executive Order of 8th August, 1865, "all railroads in Tennessee will be required to pay all arrearages of interest due on the bonds issued by that State, prior to the date of its pretended secession from the Union, to aid in the construction of said roads, before any dividends are declared or paid to the stockholders thereof," are, to say the least, significant.

LEGISLATION NEEDED.

But it cannot be expected that the committee will take up and discuss the case of each railroad separately. That would require volumes. Enough has been presented to satisfy the House that most unjust claims are being entertained against the Government, and so far urged to at least retard or prevent the collection of debts due the Government, and that there should be at once some decided legislation on this subject, and that, even if Congress decide to pay for property captured from rebels and destroyed or for the use of such property restored, it should be made the duty of some committee or court, established or to be established, to investigate each case.

ROADS WITH INCREASED INDEBTEDNESS.

It will be perceived, from tabular statement above extracted from pages 89 and 90 of Report No. 3 that the following roads, in addition to those above commented upon, have suffered their indebtedness to increase by an accumulation of interest, to wit: Wills Valley; Edgefield and Kentucky; Memphis, Clarksville, and Louisville; Alabama, and Tennessee river; Mississippi, Gainesville, and Tuscaloosa; Alexandria, Loudoun, and Hampshire; McMinnville, and Manchester; and that the indebtedness of the following is very slightly diminished, to wit: New Orleans and Ohio, Memphis and Little Rock, Knoxville and Kentucky.

ROADS PROMPT, ETC.

It is but just to all railroads to say that those not named above as having increased or but slightly diminished debts are presumed to have acted in good faith and entirely paid, or to be giving evidence of laudable efforts to pay, their indebtedness.

CLAIMS ENTERTAINED BY OTHER ROADS.

Still, some of the companies that have paid and are paying their bonds are preserving evidence of damage to and use of their roads; and it is in the testimony that their claims will be presented and urged if Congress should adopt the policy to pay for such damage or use.

DELINQUENCY OF TENNESSEE ROADS.

And in the spirit that chastisement is most readily inflicted when deserved upon those most loved, the committee would most kindly remark that the roads of Tennessee deserve a severe rebuke; for they have not only not been prompt but lamentably delinquent, and not only delinquent but also persistent in demands which, if allowed, would lead to the payment of untold millions of money as rewards to treason.

A glance at the statement extracted above, from pages 89 and 90 of Report No. 3, will show that but five of these roads—Nashville and Chattanooga, East Tennessee and Virginia, East Tennessee and Georgia, Edgefield and Kentucky, Nashville and Northwestern—owed the Government $2,876,472 03 on 1st of November, 1867, being considerably more than half of the whole amount of $4,884,500 62 of railroad indebtedness.

The conduct of the roads in the rebel States further south than Tennessee should bring the blush of shame to their cheeks.

UNDER WHAT POWER?

This brings the committee to inquire: under what power were these millions of dollars worth of railroads and other railroad property restored to their former owners, and what is the legal effect of their restoration?

The committee find there is no authority in law for it. There being none, the right was assumed and exercised under the war power.

This is evidently implied in Secretary Stanton's reply to an interrogatory on page 271 of Report No. 34. To the question: "I understand, as the result of your statements, that in turning over these roads when you had no further use for them for military purposes, you were governed by your views of the general public policy of the country?" he replied:

"Yes, limited by what I supposed to be the legitimate powers of the War Department. I do not mean to say I had the right to assume the powers of Congress to determine the general policy; but within the scope of what I thought to be the power of the War Department I was governed by what I assumed to be the good of the country. I did not intend my authority to determine the general question of policy."

It is, in the opinion of the committee, a mistake as to the "scope" of the powers and their not confining their action within "the legitimate powers of the War Department," that render the solution of the questions in the premises now the more embarrassing, if not difficult.

The Secretary's further answer, to be after a while quoted, implies that the restoration of this property passed no title. Then the committee think their action should have been strictly confined to their "legitimate powers," because possession gives a show of title.

Those "legitimate powers" were to inflict injury in every way possible upon the enemy; to destroy, to weaken, to subdue. That is the object of a War Department.

But an enemy being subdued, there is in that department no express or implied power to make that enemy whole, to strengthen him and build up his waste places. There is no power given to this department nor to any executive officer after peace, nor is it implied to exercise discretion and to do what he or they may assume to be for "the good of the country." There is no limit to discretion. One may assume it to be "for the good of the country" to restore railroads, while another may be governed by feelings of a still larger love of country, and, with equal propriety, draw upon other property of the Government, and "for the good of the country" give forty acres of land and a plow-horse to each destitute family. Such power belongs to a monarch in an unlimited monarchy. Under our government of laws such power belongs to the people in the law-making department or branch of the Government, and, in imparting such power, they only trust themselves, represented by their own chosen agents. No such power can be found delegated under any law to any department, military commander, or civil officer, and the exercise of any power not delegated by law is an assumption by an executive officer who is chosen to execute laws, and can legally go no further than authorized by them.

Then the question arises, what right or title passed with such restoration? An illegal, unauthorized transfer passes no title. No one will venture to contend that the title to property captured from a public enemy, and especially that which had been used by that enemy for war purposes, does not vest by such capture in the captor. Therefore in the cases under consideration the title passed to the captor. And who is the captor? The Government, of course. No one will say the President or any military commander or officer of the War Department, who are merely chosen to execute laws for the Government, and whose acts without law are invalid and not binding. The act of a President unauthorized by law is as invalid as that of a private citizen. No title passes except under a law. In the cases under consideration the right vested in the Government, and could only be divested by the Government, through its laws. There being no law for it, the transfer was invalid, null, and imparted no right. The restoration, therefore, amounted merely to possession without title, with the legal right still in the Government to resume possession at pleasure.

And on this point Secretary Stanton, on page 271, Report No. 34, says:

"The question of title which the persons acquired when they [the railroads] were turned over to them was a legal question, which would have to be determined by Congress or the judicial tribunals, if any dispute arose in regard to them." "I do not mean to say I had the right to assume the power of Congress to determine the general policy."

And General E. R. S. Canby, on page 243, Report No. 34, testifies:

"We simply relinquished the military right; the civil right was in full force if the Government saw fit to enforce it."

And here the committee remark that their proposition, that "the restoration of this property amounted merely to possession without title, with the legal right still in the Government to resume possession at pleasure," disposes, without further comment, of the late argument of General J. T. Boyle, president of the Evansville, Henderson, and Nashville railroad, which is not in the testimony, but should be noticed, as it was referred, on 11th November last, by Governor W. G. Brownlow to the members of the Tennessee Legislature, and discloses the grounds upon which that State may possibly press her railroad claims to the exclusion of those of the United States.

That argument is that that State before the rebellion issued State bonds to the amount of $16,000,000, and, under the provisions of an "internal improvement law," created a prior lien upon each road to secure the payment of their respective bonds and of the interest accruing on the same, and enacted that the roads should create no other conflicting liens; that the claims of the Government of the United States are accounts for property sold to the roads, secured by bonds which are secondary, subordinate, to the State bonds; that, therefore, "the State and the railroads should refuse to pay the claims without a settlement and an allowance of what may be fairly due the State and the roads; and, if any military officer attempts to enforce the bond and remove the property or take possession of the railroads, apply to the Federal courts for injunction and for relief;" at the same time the attempt being made, on page 12 of said argument, to show the balance due the State and one road—the Nashville and Chattanooga—to be, $987,826 92 after crediting the Government, not with over $4,000,000, as estimated by the quartermaster's department, for constructing, repairing, &c., that road, but with $2,500,000 and rolling stock, purchased $1,526,578, and charging the Government with "$5,014,404 for use of the road and earnings thereof from 1st March, 1862, to 15th September, 1865."

The position of the committee goes behind all this and places the title in the Government, with the right to repossess at pleasure. These roads did not and do not belong to Tennessee, but to railroad companies, the State merely holding liens to secure her against loss. This is clearly shown in the argument of General Boyle itself.

These roads were used, as has been shown, in aid of the rebellion, by the voluntary action of presidents, directors, and stockholders, with very few exceptions, probably not ten, who could be named by all the witnesses examined from several States. They were then, after use, captured; and it is not necessary to notice the statement in that report, "that a State cannot rebel; a State cannot be convicted of treason or punished, or its property confiscated." Still, it is well to remark that the logical result of such teaching would be to induce the wealthy, disloyal, cunning, and designing, when preparing for a second rebellion, to seek security for their property under the guise of State investments. But such teachers should turn to the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States delivered in the Prize cases, and read, on page 673, 2 Black, as follows:

"Now, it is a proposition never doubted that the belligerent party who claims to be sovereign may exercise both belligerent and sovereign rights," &c. "Under the very peculiar Constitution of this Government, although the citizens owe supreme allegiance to the Federal Government, they owe also a qualified allegiance to the State in which they are domiciled. Their persons and property are subject to its laws. Hence, in organizing this rebellion, they have acted as States claiming to be sovereign over all persons and property within their respective limits, and asserting a right to absolve their citizens from their allegiance to the Federal Government. Several of these States have combined to form a new confederacy, claiming to be acknowledged by the world as a sovereign State." "It is no loose, unorganized insurrection, having no defined boundary or possessions," &c.

The committee wish it understood that they are in sympathy with the loyal people and the present loyal government of Tennessee, and prepared to aid in sustaining them and their State credit; but do not desire to do so at the expense of principles that would deprive the Government of the power of self-protection. That State should recollect it was its misfortune to have had so much disloyalty within its borders that, on the 16th August, 1861, the President of the United States proclaimed and declared that the inhabitants of this State, among others, were "in a state of insurrection against the United States, &c." It therefore becomes her to come before the parent Government in a proper spirit of, the committee will not say humiliation, but respect, asking favors and not demanding.

Then the committee suggest that it would be much less iniquitous to make the proposition recommended in said report of said General J. T. Boyle, that—"The State could memorialize Congress on the subject, and ask that the whole matter be settled by the United States donating to the State the amount of the claim she holds against the roads, on condition that the State of Tennessee shall assume and settle all the claims asserted by the State and railroad companies against the United States."

A yielding to demands contrary to law and justice opens the door for remuneration for treason; for other late rebel States are interested in railroads as stockholders, and Virginia largely.

CONTRARY TO EXPRESS LAW.

But the committee say, not only that the property in question was restored to the original owners without authority of law, but in direct violation of law, and ask attention to the act of 6th August, 1861, (12 United States Statutes, page 319,) the latter portion of the first section of which reads as follows:

"Or if any person or persons, being the owner of owners of any such property," [any property or whatsoever kind or description,] "shall knowingly use or employ or consent to the use or employment of the same as aforesaid," [in aiding, abetting, or promoting insurrection or resistance to the laws, or any person or persons engaged therein,] all such property is hereby declared to be lawful subject of prize and capture wherever found; and it is the duty of the President of the United States to cause the same to be seized, confiscated, and condemned."

In the cases under consideration the property so used and employed was seized in due course of war, but restored in open disregard of this plain provision of law and of the spirit of the law of 3d March, 1863, providing for the appointment of agents by the Secretary of the Treasury for the collection and sale at auction of abandoned or captured property, and of the spirit of the law of 2d July, 1864.

HO. OF REFS.

Report on Southern Railroads.

40TH CONG. ... 2D SESS.

AND WHEN RESTORED?

But if that law were not deemed sufficiently plain for the guidance of the executive officers of a loyal people who had, after the sacrifice of many lives and much treasure, saved their country from rebel grasp, it certainly indicated their (the people's) sentiments so clearly that the restoration of this vast amount of property at the time it was restored was an outrage upon their rights; for it was restored but a short time preceding the December session, 1865, of Congress, when they, through their Representatives, could have been consulted.

Between the time of the return of these roads and the assembling of Congress, at a regular session, only about three months and less, in the most important cases, intervened.

The amount of $123,000,000 and over would have justified calling an extra session of Congress a month or two in advance, even though the subject of reconstruction had been of no importance.

But this haste for returning property to rebel hands is somewhat attempted to be accounted for by General M. C. Meigs, who, on page 259 of Report No. 34, testifies:

"It will be perceived that these railroads have been costing during the present year $1,300,000 a month, and the expenses are still going on."

The committee submit that this only proves that the Administration gave away $123,000,000 and over of Government property to save $3,900,000, the expense of running the roads three months, until the assembling of Congress; and that it does not prove the roads could not, together with rolling stock, have been sold to companies who would have operated them profitably for themselves under the management of experienced railroad men. No one doubts they could be so sold to-day. But executive officers had no right to exercise their discretion or judgment. Their duty was to obey the law, or, in the absence of law, to inform the law-making power.

THE POLICY PURSUED.

But the committee would present the subject as they see it in the light of policy, and if the restoration of this property is both unauthorized by law and impolitic the possession could be resumed by the Government.

While the committee have much respect for the high officials who advised restoration, they are constrained to express the opinion that, in the exercise of their magnanimous liberality in the disposal of property not their own, they lost sight of justice, and were misled by too high an estimate of the character of the enemy that had deliberately assailed the Government. It should have been borne in mind that the war of rebellion was waged to perpetuate human oppression by those who, with their ancestors, had for many years gratified that disposition to oppress that destroys all the noble sentiments and feelings of the soul. This seems to have been forgotten.

The high standing socially, and, in time past, politically, of railroad presidents and directors, and the influence which wealth and intelligence ever give, seem to have caused sight to be lost of the enormity of the crime of treason, so much so that while the only horse of a poor, ignorant man, led into the rebellion by this very intelligence, is retained and never returned, when captured conveying information even that the enemy may escape death, these engines of power, this wealth, amounting to one hundred and twenty-three million dollars and over, is returned to the intelligent, wealthy, and influential, whose only magnanimity had been to surrender when they could no longer fight—returned, too, before the basis had been determined upon for their return as citizens under recognized governments of States restored to the Union—engines of power that could be used again against the Government with rebellion revived.

If desiring to renew rebellion, what more in the premises could these former enemies have desired than they have received? Roads repaired and constructed, equipped, made ready for profitable use, and returned!

An individual would consider it blind policy to put his enraged antagonist upon his feet and restore to him his deadly weapon. It would be considered madness in a keeper to turn from the cage an untamed beast, with food administered to strengthen him for another effort to take his life.

Is the life of the nation less precious, or maddened rebel enemies less to be dreaded? And those who regard oaths of loyalty as safeguards would do well to remember that almost yesterday there were in the halls of Congress those who disregarded oaths, and, by concocting treason, blackened their souls with perjury.

The policy in the past had been, with all governments, to impoverish an enemy. In the cases being considered it has been to enrich. The policy pursued can only be justified on the ground of magnanimity and charity—charity blinded to justice; and such magnanimity can only be excused, if at all, under supposition of bewilderment growing out of the magnitude of the war, and the momentous questions connected with it and growing out of reconstruction.

The desire for peace was laudable; but that had been conquered. The desire for general prosperity was praiseworthy, and may have shown goodness of heart; but justice and the security of after generations forbid rewards for treason. The "Highest Ruler," who offers mercy to all, rained fire upon the disobedient, and a Dead sea remains as a reminder.

To show utterly the failure to appreciate the disposition of the enemy that had interrupted the peaceful relations of the country and destroyed trade and commerce, and the magnanimous but ill-timed spirit manifested by high officials of our Government, the committee here quote from page 267 of Report No. 34, the words of Secretary Stanton. He testifies:

"I must say that from the moment of the surrender of the rebel armies my own consideration was earnestly directed to all measures coming within my sphere of action that would tend to promote the general pacification of the country and the restoration of its trade and commerce to its original channels. This I deemed to be not only the most effectual, but by far the most economical, system of policy that could be pursued, and also the most safe and certain in its results. From early study I had been led to the belief that one of the chief purposes for the establishment of the Union originally formed between the States was for the promotion and encouragement of peaceful commerce, industry, and intercourse between the inhabitants of the respective States, and I therefore believed that whatever would tend to that object, either in the disposition of surplus materials or in other exercise of the powers of the Government, would be incumbent upon the Executive, and of benefit to the whole nation, and none occurred to me as being more speedy in its beneficial results than at once to open the channels that had been broken up or obstructed by hostilities; and that, in comparison with the improvements that would thus result, the value of the property that might be turned over would be comparatively of insignificance."

The committee appreciate the eloquence but not the force of the argument. Under a different state of facts the argument would be good and the spirit admirable. If the Government and her enemies had been equally responsible, chargeable, for the "hostilities" that had "obstructed or broken up the channels of trade, peaceful commerce, industry, and intercourse;" if strife had been equally avoided by both sides and sought by neither; if peaceful pursuits and friendly intercourse had been sought by one as by the other, such magnanimity might have been appreciated and the return of commerce and industry would have far more than compensated for the value of the property turned over.

But the history of the rebellion shows that the hostilities that "broke up and obstructed" these channels were voluntarily brought on by one side against all remonstrance and entreaty on the part of the friends of the Union; that no terms or compromise would be listened to by those who deliberately resolved to break up those channels.

Under this state of facts, while it was "incumbent upon the Executive" and upon all others to promote and encourage trade, commerce, and industry, the committee do not come to the conclusion that this desirable object would be reached or advanced by placing what General M. C. Meigs calls "powerful and efficient instruments of war," and what the Secretary himself, on page 266 of Report No. 34, says "are of importance, in a superior degree, to the success of military operations," in the hands of those unrepentant rebels who had then but recently destroyed our trade and commerce and struck at the life of the nation, and whose only expressed regret had been the want of success.

The Administration was magnanimous, but failed to see that pearls may be thrown where they are not appreciated; and were blind to the Christian instruction that "the ruler beareth not the sword in vain, for he is the minister of God, a revenger to execute wrath upon him that doeth evil."

The committee prefer to adopt the words of another as expressing their sentiments and indicating the true policy; of another who cannot be objected to by those favoring the policy that has been pursued; words memorable as burning with the heat of loyalty and patriotism, and which electrified the loyal heart of this nation, which responded by conferring honors upon the distinguished individual.

As early as the 9th day of June, 1864, this "individual" said:

"Before these repenting rebels can be trusted let them bring forth the fruits of repentance. Treason must be made odious and traitors must be punished and impoverished. Their great plantations must be seized and divided into small farms, and sold to honest, industrious men." We get men in command who, under the influence of flattery, fawning, and caressing, grant protection to the rich traitor while the poor Union man stands out in the cold."

But, contrary to such wise teaching, these roads, that should have been sold for the benefit of poor Union men who have endured cold and heat, have been restored, in effect, to preserve the property and wealth in the hands of rich traitors and influential against the Government for which the poor have fought. And will it be denied that the officers and stockholders in these roads represent much of the social power and influence in the rebel States? Certainly not.

Hear then, again, the words of wisdom coming from this distinguished individual as late as the 21st day of April, 1865:

"They must not only be punished, but their social power must be destroyed. If not they will still maintain an ascendancy, and may again become numerous and powerful; for, in the words of a former Senator of the United States, 'when traitors become numerous enough treason becomes respectable.'"

The committee are of the opinion that not to preserve the majesty of the power of the nation, but to preserve the wealth and social influence of those desiring the nation's life, is not only to eventually destroy "trade and commerce," but to defeat the very object of government by overthrowing its free and righteous institutions. Let rebellion become a success and all is destroyed. Then the arguments as to the efficiency, economy, certainty, and safety of such policy are all together, at an end. But the testimony of some witnesses may be quoted who say the plan pursued by the Administration was "judicious."

The words of Major General George H. Thomas may be quoted against the opinion of the committee. On page 83, Report No. 34, he said:

"I think the course pursued was the most economical: that of turning over the roads to the companies and paying for transportation."

The committee would direct attention to the fact that those words were in reply to a question that presented but two plans, and he was asked which of the two would have been most judicious: one, to have kept the roads in the possession of the Government and run them for its own use; or the other, to have turned them over to the companies and let them run them as common carriers and the Government to pay them for transportation. Deciding between the two plans his answer was correct; but the question implied that there was no other plan that could be pursued. It implied the necessity for one or the other.

Now, the committee fail to see the necessity or policy of either. If the Government had the right to retain possession, which is implied in both question and answer, and which no one will deny, then she had the right to dispose. The title being in her, she could and should have sold the roads. Then, on economical ground, there could be no objection, because the purchasers would have run them, after paying millions of dollars to the Government, and would have, equally with others, encouraged the industries and developed the resources of the country.

The same implication may be drawn from the reply of General M. C. Meigs. On page 263 of Report No. 34 he said:

"If within the proper legal authority of the Administration, then I think it was wise and expedient. I think it would have been to the interest of the United States to have sacrificed every dollar of the seven millions at which it valued the rolling stock, &c., rather than to have compelled the quartermaster's department to carry on the roads to this day," &c.

Now, the committee say there was no necessity to have compelled the quartermaster's department to have run them to this day. They should have been sold.

But in quoting distinguished opinions and arguments as to the disposition of the roads, the committee give from one or two others, first remarking that those already given are from those removed from the active scenes of hostilities, and who were not, by contact, as those in the field, acquainted with the spirit of the rebellion.

General Canby, who, as has been seen, required, by an order afterwards modified, captured rolling stock to be paid for, testifies, on page 240, Report No. 34:

"After these roads passed out from under my control some questions were referred to me in connection with the New Orleans and Opelousas and New Orleans and Jackson roads, which I thought manifested such bad faith on the part of the managers of this road that I recommended a resumption of the military control of these roads and that they should be sold and the proceeds paid into the Treasury." "I thought at the time it was made that it was a good measure; but with the knowledge we have now, it would have been made on more stringent terms and more limited than it was. This right of the Government to captured property should have been enforced to a greater extent than it was. The management of the roads has been very different from what I anticipated at the time it would be."

But the committee would, on this point, quote the words of one other, who had something to do with rebels in the field, and whose ready intellect became brightened by rebel contact, as shown by his executive ability in the administration of civil affairs.

One Philip H. Sheridan, a major general in the Union Army, testifies, 11th February, 1867, on page 172 of Report No. 34, and to the question "Suppose, in taking command, you found a railroad which had given aid and comfort to the enemy, would you take it as being disloyal?" replied:

"That would depend a good deal upon who owned the road: the road could not help itself. If the road was owned entirely by loyal men in the North, it would put a new phase in it. There were undoubtedly northern interests in these roads, and that was the reason why I made the recommendation at one time to sell the roads and pay the loyal men their shares and then appropriate the balance to the Government."

And the committee would direct attention to the remarkable similarity of views of distinguished men on important questions and show how these expressions correspond with that of a distinguished individual known to fame, made on 21st April, 1865:

"I say that after making treason odious, every Union man and the Government should be remunerated out of the pockets of those who have inflicted this great suffering upon the country."

The foregoing statement of facts and opinions had prepared the committee for the submission of the resolutions that will follow, in compliance with the instructions of the House, that—

"They shall also report what, in their opinion, would be the proper course to be taken by the Government in regard to such railroads or railroad companies."

But at the very time the above was prepared there was referred to the committee other testimony, which is cumulative, upon various points heretofore submitted, and, as though by design, is overwhelmingly convincing, removing any lingering doubt as to the correctness of the conclusions arrived at as to the disloyalty of those connected with and interested in southern railroads and as to the animus of particular roads already named.

This additional testimony is Executive Document No. 74, Fortieth Congress, second session, House of Representatives, which was referred by the House on the 7th, and delivered to the committee, printed, on the 16th January, 1868. It is a report from Brevet Colonel S. R. Hamill, assistant quartermaster, who, as General Ulysses S. Grant says in his accompanying letter, "has had charge of the subject of the indebtedness to the United States of some of the railroad companies in the southern States." This report is to Major General G. H. Thomas, dated 30th September, 1867, but showing the indebtedness of railroads on 31st October, 1867, and corresponding with tabular statement already in this report. It is in due course transmitted, with letters from General Thomas, D. H. Rucker, acting quartermaster general, brevet major general United States Army, and from General Ulysses S. Grant.

As to the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad Company, the statements already made are strengthened. After a minute detail of facts as to the demands on the road for payments on its bond, its ability to pay, its broken promises, its extensions, on pages 4, 5, 6, and 7, the Report says on page 7:

"The management of this road have manifested the most contemptible bad faith in every action regarding the indebtedness, outraging every principle of integrity." "The duplicity and unscrupulous meanness of the management of this road has forfeited every claim the company could ever have upon the Government for liberality and leniency. It is only by a continual checking of their apparently instinctive tendency to rascality that the interests of the Government can be protected. As they took the lead in reason so they have always taken the lead in every scheme which would interfere with the just claims of the Government. So far from manifesting any gratitude for the leniency of the Government, they have used that forbearance to assist them in swindling it."

As to the Nashville and Northwestern road the Report says, on page 8, after a statement of facts already disclosed in this report:

"The remarks made regarding the management of the Nashville and Chattanooga railroad apply as well to the Nashville and Northwestern, the management being the same."

Of the Nashville and Decatur road it says on page 11:

"The management has been economical and judicious. The company have at all times acted in entire good faith with the Government, as with all its creditors."

And on page 12:

"In one thing only have the Nashville and Decatur Railroad Company manifested any of the antagonism to the Government common to so many of the indebted roads. Following the inducements of the Nashville and Chattanooga, and similar cases, they are about to assert a claim for use, occupation, and damage of $625,000. The cost to the Government of constructing and repairing this road amounted to $1,638,642 04. The setting up of this claim will not be matter of astonishment when it is considered that the management of the Nashville and Chattanooga, East Tennessee and Georgia, East Tennessee and Virginia, and Memphis and Charleston railroads have labored most industriously to organize a powerful combination against the Government, and have not been modest in asserting their power to control congressional action. They have repeatedly stated that prominent members of Congress and other public men are pledged to them."

Of the East Tennessee and Georgia road it says, on pages 18 and 19:

"During the time the collection was delayed the company commenced asserting a claim for occupancy, use, and damage."

In the assertion of their claim "they rely upon the success of other companies as a precedent, the loyalty of East Tennessee, and a certificate said to be in their possession given them by Major General Ambrose E. Burnside."

Of the East Tennessee and Virginia road, the opinions already expressed in this report are more than sustained. It says on pages 17 and 18:

"The East Tennessee and Virginia railroad was captured by the United States forces, under General Burnside, in September, 1863. It is claimed by Mr. Branner, in behalf of the company, that they held their rolling stock on the line of their road for General Burnside's use. The truth is that out of eighteen or nineteen engines all but three were taken inside the rebel lines, and two of these were on their way when captured, the other being comparatively worthless."

"Out of about ninety cars, five flat and two box cars only were left, the latter not being on trucks."

"All the stock was removed within the rebel lines, voluntarily, by the management of the road, several days after the evacuation of Knoxville by the rebels."

Mr. Branner and the management of the East Tennessee and Virginia railroad were not only disloyal but enthusiastically so during the time the rebellion was initiated and was in the ascendant in Tennessee, even after the line of their road was captured by the Union forces.

"Any manifestation of affection for the Union cause while in rebel lines must be considered as merely pocket-book loyalty, and attributed to the same grasping spirit that actuated others who fêted our officers and gave unmistakable (?) evidence of their patriotism, while they were investing their means and using the information they obtained within our lines to fill their coffers by blockade-running."

"Since the close of the war, there being no further pecuniary incentive to treasonable action, they have been patriots, indeed, and boast how they risked life and property in the cause of their country."

"Not content with the restoration of their property, and the munificence of the Government in extending to them pecuniary aid, they have played the same game in peace that was so profitable in war, and have used the very leniency of the Government to defeat its just claims."

"The East Tennessee and Virginia Railroad Company are abundantly able to pay, under the extended terms granted them, and could have commenced payments long since without interfering with the practical operation of the road, had they been required to do so, instead of appropriating their earnings to the payment of other claims, or instead of refusing to avail themselves of the aid they received from the State. A large amount of the bonds indorsed by the State, instead of being used for the benefit of the road, are, I am reliably informed, held as capital in a bank owned by certain of the management."

"Mr. Branner (president of the road) at first declined to confer with me regarding the indebtedness, saying that he could do better by going to the authorities at Washington; that he had been informed by persons connected with the War Department that the matter would be permitted to rest, if I 'was not continually stirring it up.' When I insisted upon his making all communications through my office and called his attention to the positive order of the major general commanding, he became excited, and replied that he did not care for General Thomas or the military; that the President was a friend of his, and he did not intend to be scared into any arrangement. I assured him that, while I had no intention of attempting to scare him or any one else, I should enforce some arrangement for payment if I could not secure one amicably. He replied that he should like to see me doing so—civil law was now supreme, and I should find myself incarcerated in the county jail if I attempted to place a receiver upon his road."

These extracts from the very able report of Assistant Quartermaster Hamill are sufficient for the purposes of this report; but the committee recommend it as most deserving of consideration.

The committee invite attention to the letter of Major General George H. Thomas, accompanying that report, as follows:

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT CUMBERLAND,
LOUISVILLE, KENTUCKY, November 23, 1867.

Respectfully forwarded to the Adjutant General of the Army.

The attention of the honorable Secretary of War ad interim is respectfully invited to this report as giving a complete statement of the indebtedness of the southern railroads to the United States at this time, and of the efforts of some of these corporations to evade or defer payments.

As, under recent instructions from the War Department, the charge of the collection of these debts is to be transferred to the Quartermaster General at Washington, relieving me from further responsibility, I can only recommend that the Government hold these railroads to their contracts—that they be compelled to liquidate their indebtedness upon the terms now granted, without consideration or recognition in the least degree of any claims for damages or use by occupation of the United States, such claims being believed to be without foundation in justice or right.

A persistent and combined effort on the part of these corporations to compel the recognition of these claims has as persistently been ignored and repudiated by me, until the efforts, from want of success, have gradually been relaxed. It is believed that now, under the prospective change of affairs, these claims will again be urged and pressed for recognition; hence this earnest recommendation.

GEORGE H. THOMAS,

Major General United States Army, Commanding.

He recommends "that the Government hold these railroads to their contracts."

Attention is also invited to the accompanying letter of Acting Quartermaster General D. H. Rucker, as follows:

QUARTERMASTER GENERAL'S OFFICE,
WASHINGTON, D. C., December 21, 1867.

SIR: I have the honor to return herewith the report of Brevet Colonel S. R. Hamill, assistant quartermaster, relative to the indebtedness of southern railroads for railroad property purchased of the United States.

This report has been carefully examined. I fully concur in the indorsement of Major General George H. Thomas, namely: "As, under recent instructions from the War Department, the charge of the collection of these debts is to be transferred to the Quartermaster General at Washington, relieving me from further responsibility, I can only recommend that the Government hold these railroads to their contracts, that they be compelled to liquidate their indebtedness upon the terms now granted, without consideration or recognition in the least degree of any claims for damages or use by occupation of the United States, such claims being believed to be without foundation in justice or right."

"A persistent and combined effort on the part of these corporations to compel the recognition of these claims has as persistently been ignored and repudiated by me, until the efforts for want of success have gradually been relaxed. It is believed that now, under the prospective change of affairs, these claims will again be urged and pressed for recognition, hence this earnest recommendation."

Under orders of the 1st ultimo, from the War Department, further measures with a view to collection of these debts were suspended, pending an examination of a committee of the House of Representatives.

In the opinion of the acting Quartermaster General, the information contained in this report and accompanying papers would be most valuable to the select Committee of the House of Representatives on Southern Railroads; it is therefore most respectfully suggested that they be furnished for that purpose. In view of such action, copies of all the papers have been retained in this office.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

D. H. RUCKER,

Acting Quartermaster General,
Brevet Major General United States Army.

He says: "I fully concur in the indorsement of Major General George H. Thomas."

PROPER COURSE TO BE TAKEN.

Thus the committee are brought to "report what in their opinion would be the proper course to be taken by the Government in regard to such railroads or railroad companies."

That opinion is embodied in the following resolutions, the passage of which they most earnestly desire:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and they are hereby, instructed to report to this House without delay a bill or joint resolution declaring in substance that no claim shall be entertained by any officer or department of the Government in favor of any railroad or railroad company in any of the late rebel States, or in favor of any such State, for the use of any such road, or rolling stock, or other property, by the Government, or for any damage inflicted by the United States military forces on such railroads, rolling stock, or other railroad property, or for the transportation of troops, Government property, or passengers or mails, for any portion of time during the late rebellion, or prior to the date of the restoration or return of any road to the original owners after the cessation of hostilities.

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and they are hereby, instructed to report to this House without delay a bill or joint resolution requiring a strict accountability from all railroads in the late rebel States; that they may "be compelled to liquidate their indebtedness upon the terms now granted without consideration or recognition in the least degree of any claims for damages by or use by occupation of the United States;" to the end that payments shall be enforced according to existing bonds, or in default thereof that the Governments shall exercise her legal right to possession and disposal.

SPEECH OF HON. AARON F. STEVENS, OF NEW HAMPSHIRE,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
February 8, 1868.

The House being in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the President's annual message.

MR. STEVENS, of New Hampshire, said:

MR. CHAIRMAN: In rising to address the committee upon some of the questions now before the country I disclaim all expectation of advancing ideas or propositions not common to the extended debate which has taken place upon these subjects in the progress of their discussion. The questions arising out of the public measures now before Congress have been discussed in all their length and breadth and presented in every light in which logic can enforce or rhetoric embellish them. But in so interesting a crisis of our legislative history I have thought it my duty, sir, to seize the opportunity of the hour and place before the committee and before my constituents, briefly and imperfectly perhaps, my views upon these questions. And I desire to say, sir, that I come to the consideration of them now with a conviction that we should meet them as practical men, that we should discuss them as questions of inexorable necessity, as questions which, like the war, have been thrust upon us by the enemies of the Government, and which are now resisted in like spirit as our arms were resisted by those enemies during the dark hours of the rebellion. I assert here, sir, without fear of just contradiction, that the Republican party of the country, represented by a majority of this Congress, is not responsible this-day for the disturbed and destitute condition of the rebel States or the burdens that in consequence of war now rest with such appalling weight on the American people. To the people of the rebel States and their allies at the North, who invited and encouraged the rebellion, are we indebted for those burdens, for that destitution, and for the thousand perils and misfortunes that still environ us. And, sir, it is a mortifying and humiliating fact that history will record these attempts to defeat the restoration of the rebel States, on principles drawn from the Declaration of Independence, as the renewal and continuation of the proslavery rebellion which four years of war and desolation could not quench or eradicate.

MR. CHAIRMAN, no government can be respectable or respected unless it possesses and exercises sufficient power to crush out and place under foot its enemies. It may, indeed, properly be generous and magnanimous to its enemies, but it must first assert and maintain its power to subdue and punish them. The imbecile and halting Administration of James Buchanan, representing for the time being the Government, was the scorn of its enemies and the shame of its friends and supporters; while the irresistible power of the nation, under the Administration of Abraham Lincoln, was its strength, its glory, and its salvation. And it is the duty of this Government now, sir, to maintain its supremacy over its enemies not only by the power of its arms but by every mode of legislation authorized or not prohibited by its fundamental law. To yield to a false sense of philanthropy, however specious or seductive, and thereby entail the spirit of rebellion upon its future career, would indeed be a blunder worse than a crime. It is, therefore, a necessity imposed upon Congress to so deal with these rebellious States that there shall be no possible recurrence of the rebellion in all time to come; and, let me add, this can only be effected by giving full development and power to that loyal element of the South which resisted the rebellion, disclaimed its theories and its acts, and which is now entitled to claim its full rights under the Constitution as it stands changed by the fortunes of war and the acts of the civil power. It is the object and purpose of the Republican party to do this in its broadest and most liberal sense. We propose to attain this purpose by acts of reconstruction in such form and of such legislative power as will meet and subdue all opposition from whatever source it may come, and erect these stricken communities once more into States in form republican and in truth free.

I am convinced, sir, that nothing can aid our policy or justify our course more powerfully than a review of our history.

The events of the last seven years have taught the world the character of the American people and the power of the American Government. Within that period we have trod the terrible paths of civil war, with divided sentiment it is true, on the cause and merits of the great controversy, but with a spirit and success which proclaim to the civilized world the resources of our Government, the irresistible power of our arms, and the great truth that it can be only overthrown by the annihilation of its citizens.

It will be acknowledged by all that the period immediately preceding the breaking out of the rebellion was marked by a wide division of sentiment in the country, upon which parties had been organized and campaigns had been fought. On the one hand was a party which had declared that slavery was the corner-stone of a free government. They proclaimed that it rested upon divine authority, and demanded its extension and protection as the price of national existence. It gathered to its support the most formidable elements of political power and the bitterest energies of avarice and lust; it sapped the foundations of public virtue by insidious yet powerful and successful approaches; it gathered at last within its terrible folds that powerful organization known as the Democratic party, and monopolized and engrossed its power to perfect measures for the perpetuity and extension of the institution.

On the other hand, there had grown up in the country a party embodying the idea and sentiment that slavery, not only abstractly but practically considered, was a moral and political evil, and that its encroachments and extension ought to be resisted by all the lawful combinations and power at the command of its opponents. This feeling was profound enough to take hold even of the religious sentiment of the country, and it culminated at last in a political organization which, in 1861, accomplished one of its main purposes in its accession to the control of the General Government.

In anticipation of this accession to power on the part of the Republican party the slaveholders of the South had declared their purpose of seceding from the Government of the United States and forming a confederacy whose corner-stone should be the favorite institution. To such an extent were they aided by the Democratic party, then holding the administration of the Government, that when Mr. Lincoln assumed the office to which he had been elected he found a pretended government in revolt against the authority of the United States and preparing to seize the forts and other public property of the Union. The rebellion had begun, and it had gained great strength and power during the last Democratic Administration. It had been almost incalculably aided by the action of that Administration. The then President of the United States, under the advice of that distinguished Democrat, his Attorney General, had declared that there was no power in the General Government, either under the Constitution or upon the principle of self-preservation, to "coerce a State;" in other words, to prevent or punish the rebellion of its citizens.

That great party whose boast it was that in the former trials of the country and in two wars it had maintained the integrity of the flag of the Union, now quailed before the advance of this rebellion, succumbed to its pretensions, asserted its inability to stem its advancing tide, and fled in dismay before its organized efforts. Here was a Democratic Administration that held in its grasp the mighty power of a great nation that would have risen at its patriotic call like a giant refreshed from sleep—an Administration possessing the prestige and example of Andrew Jackson, and sustained by a loyal and indignant people, lacking no power to preserve the Union; this Administration that might have laid its hands upon the leaders of the rebellion, have arrested and imprisoned them, and used the power of the Government—its armies and navies—for the purpose of protecting the public property and maintaining the national integrity, went down in terror on its knees before this advancing rebellion, and left to the incoming Administration of Mr. Lincoln the great task and duty of suppressing an existing rebellion by repelling the forces of the insurgents and restoring a divided country. We all know, sir, how this work has been done. We all know that from the hour that Mr. Lincoln assumed the reins of Government that great party upon whose successful tide he came into power has never failed in word or act to maintain the integrity of the Union, but has put forth the whole strength of its party organization, calling to its aid the nerved patriotism of the country, and successfully carried it through its terrible trials until it once more planted our flag high in the temple of the nations. And, sir, let me say that they have done this in defiance of all the power and the strength which the national and State organizations of the Democratic party could bring to bear in opposition to them, by voting against appropriations of money to carry on the war, and by resisting coercive measures necessary to a subjugation of the armed hosts of the rebellion. Its leaders declared all through the war that it was an unholy, unjust, and "unconstitutional" war; and solemnly averred in 1864, when the lines of Grant were encircling Richmond, that the war was a failure. This Democratic party has never ceased its opposition nor lost any opportunity of throwing the whole moral and political force of its organization in aid of the rebellion and against the Republican party and the loyal men of the country who were engaged with all their energies in attempting to quell it. Upon this point I defy successful contradiction.

40TH CONG....2D SESS.

HO. OF REPS.

Why, sir, a few months before the rebellion commenced, a Democratic ex-President, a citizen of my own State, in writing to that arch-traitor, Jefferson Davis, declared, in encouragement of the views and efforts which he was prepared to make against his country, that if there was to be a struggle over this great question of secession the first blow would be struck north of Mason and Dixon's line, and that blow would be in defense of what he termed "the rights of the South." I assert here, sir, and it is not capable of truthful contradiction, that while there were many instances of patriotism in the ranks of the Democratic party—men who rallied to the defense of their country in the hour of its peril—the leaders, the men who are now assuming to control the party and are acknowledged as its standard-bearers, were engaged in the unholy and unpatriotic work of placing every obstacle in the way of the Government in its efforts to subdue the rebellion, and were aiding the enemies of the Government in their mad scheme of separation.

And let me pause here, Mr. Chairman, to gather up a few Democratic gems by way of authority for these statements. Hear what Mr. Pendleton, who seems just now to be par excellence, if we except Mr. Vallandigham, the leader of the western Democracy, has to say on this subject of maintaining the Union at all hazards. As early as the 18th day of January, 1861, he spoke in this persuasive style:

"I beg you, gentlemen, who with me represent the Northwest; you who with me represent the State of Ohio; you who with me represent the city of Cincinnati; I beg you, gentlemen, to hear that voice. If you will not, if you find conciliation impossible, if your differences are so great that you cannot or will not reconcile them, then, gentlemen, let the seceding sisters depart in peace; let them establish their government and empire and work out their destiny according to the wisdom which God has given them."

Such was the cowardly key-note struck by this great leader when the bursting flames of the rebellion were flashing up before the eyes of a loyal and indignant people. And now, sir, as I am alluding to the western Democracy let me introduce another character—a Mr. Henry Clay Dean, from Iowa, I believe, and whom the Democrats of my State are just now patronizing, having taken him from his pleasant home in the West to aid in the Democratic education of the people who dwell in the valleys of the Connecticut and Merrimack, and by the sea. According to a circular which I have received this gentleman was present at the McClellan Chicago convention in 1864, and spoke in this wise:

"Since the day when Ahasuerus issued his edict for the murder of the Jewish nation a more gigantic crime has not been recorded than the recent edict of the ignorant baboon at Washington calling for half a million more of your sons and brothers for a fresh immolation to the abolition god."

"For over three years Lincoln had been calling for men, and they had been given; but with all the vast armies placed at his command he had failed, failed, failed! Such a failure had never been known. Such a destruction of human life had never been known since the destruction of Sennacherib by the breath of the Almighty; and still the monster usurper wanted more men for his slaughter-pens. Ever since the usurper, traitor, and tyrant had occupied the presidential chair the Republican party had shouted war to the knife, and the knife to the hilt. Blood had flowed in torrents, and yet the thirst of the old monster was not quenched. His cry was for more blood."

But I must not slight my Democratic friends in New Hampshire. In May, 1861, the Union Democrat, one of the ablest of that class of papers in the State, and then and now in regular standing with its party, gave us its sentiments as follows:

"Men talk of 'fighting for the Union.' It is likely that many believe in that remedy; but is it not possible that vengeance against the South rather than love for the Union prompts the fighting which some are so anxious to do or have done? We are very free to say that we have no faith in the remedy. Upon whatever grounds we may vindicate the war it will not be that the Union may thereby be saved, for we know better. There is not one chance in a million that it can have this effect. We will not deal dishonestly with our readers. If you think the South ought to be subjugated, call it that; that the property of the nation ought to be repossessed, call it that. Fight for what you please, but do not call it 'fighting for the Union.' For fighting is certain to destroy the Union."

And as the rebellion grew worse and tottered to its fall, and we were rallying for the final blow, the editor did not seem to get any better, for in January, 1865, he says:

"We desire to commit ourselves to the most inveterate type of hostility to this war."

And again:

"Our first impressions of facts and duties have been confirmed, and it is to us a source of pride and satisfaction that we have done nothing voluntarily to encourage and support this war."

Mr. Chairman, I might multiply these examples of Democratic obstruction in the beginning and progress of the war, but I have neither time nor taste for the task. I will, therefore, close with a couple of extracts from the leading Democratic organ in "our county of Rockingham," the States and Union, of May 13 and July 15, 1864:

"Whether Grant still thinks he can take Richmond we know not; but, to our view, his chances are not remarkably promising. We suppose the fighting may perhaps still be going on, but it is business the black infamy of which no tongue can describe."

"If there is any officer of any note in the Federal Army now invading the southern States who is not a thief and a robber it would benefit his reputation somewhat if he would stand out somewhere so the people can look at him. We have come to the conclusion that they are all very nearly alike."

I have no comments to make on these disgusting specimens of Democratic literature. They speak for themselves, and the vindication of history is the only apology I have to make for their introduction here, in this day when they are crying aloud for the aid and the votes of the soldiers of our State.

And here I might diverge from the line of my remarks to inquire of this House and of the country who is responsible for the burdens now resting upon the shoulders of the people in the shape of heavy taxation and the unsettled and disturbed condition of a great portion of our country. The answer is at hand. It is the Democratic party, under whose auspices and during whose administration this war was inaugurated, and which has persisted in its opposition to the Republican policy of reconstruction from the hour when Lee surrendered his sword to Grant on the soil of Virginia. But what do we hear said by this party at the present time? The cry of the Democratic party now is that the Republicans have caused these great burdens of taxation. But, aside from the origin of the war, let the people remember that had it not been for obstructions thrown in the way of restoration by the Democracy, we should to-day be burdened with less than half the debt that the people of this country stand bound to pay as a part of the price of their national existence. I feel justified in the light of history in declaring that this rebellion was a Democratic rebellion; that the opposition to our arms was a Democratic opposition; that the rejoicings over our defeats were Democratic rejoicings; and that the disappointments at our successes were Democratic disappointments; that our war burdens are Democratic burdens; and that the failure to restore fully the insurgent States is the consequence of Democratic opposition and obstruction.

Mr. Chairman, fortunate, indeed, would it have been for the country if this spirit of hostility to the Republican Union party and its measures during the war had ceased with the surrender of the rebel forces; fortunate if, when the rebels had confessed themselves conquered and humbled and prostrate before the proud power of the Government, and when they were prepared to accept such terms of restoration as might be dictated to them by their conquerors, we had found that spirit of loyalty and patriotism among the Democratic party and its leaders which would have united with us in just and prompt measures by which these rebellious States might have been immediately restored, and which would have made this Union safe and perpetual in all future time. But it was not so to be. That party which had opposed the coercion of their "southern brethren," opposed the emancipation proclamation, opposed the arming of negro soldiers, and which had declared the war a failure, with restless activity at once organized with the intent and purpose of undoing so far as they could what had been accomplished by the triumphal success of our arms. Sir, from that day to this no opportunity have they neglected to obstruct and hinder the restoration of these States to the Union on the plan adopted by the Republican party—a plan which aimed to render justice and give equal rights to all their citizens. I solemnly believe that the Democratic party are at this very hour prepared to renew this great struggle, even at the risk of revolution and bloodshed, to the end and for the purpose of once more attaining party supremacy in this country. And on this floor within the last few days the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] has declared the intention of his party to undo what we have done for the last three years, to send us back to the uncertainty, the anarchy, the chaos of 1865.

Mr. Chairman, we have now a new combination, actuated by the same spirit and governed by the same purposes which animated the Democratic party during the dark hours of the rebellion. It consists, sir, in the first place, of the Democratic party proper, headed by such men as Vallandigham, Pendleton, and others whom it is unnecessary to name, of the unpar-done and unrepentant rebels of the South, and last of the Administration of Andrew Johnson. Thus a new coalition has been formed for the purpose of utterly defeating the Republican policy of reconstruction. The point of their resistance at this hour is the measures which Congress by a lawful majority has adopted for the restoration of the insurgent States upon a basis of equality and justice to all loyal citizens. I need only allude to these measures, sir, for they have been before the country so long and have been discussed so thoroughly that their main purposes, as well as their principal features, are fully understood by every intelligent man. The purpose of this coalition is to wield the vast power and patronage of the Government to defeat these measures and eventually restore the rebels at the South to power, disfranchising and crushing out its loyal citizens.

Our opponents declare that we have no authority or power to legislate for these States. They place their opposition, to be sure, on different grounds, but the most specious of all is that which declares that these States during all the time they were in rebellion were in all respects still "States within the Union," their constitutions in full force, their citizens entitled to all the rights they ever had under those constitutions, and holding the same legal and constitutional relations to the Union as before the rebellion.

Now, sir, it might be sufficient answer to say that every department of the Government has hitherto disputed this doctrine both by word and act. Every department of this Government has solemnly declared that the civil governments of those States were by the acts of the citizens of the several States disturbed in their relations to the Union and had forfeited to a greater or less extent their rights as members of the Union. Why, sir, even a distinguished Senator from Indiana, who a few days since declared that the rebel States had never ceased to be States in the Union, and that their constitutions had never been abrogated by any act, and that legally their relations with the Union were undisturbed, made that declaration in the face and eyes of his own vote in the Senate less than four years ago. Let me call the attention of the House to that vote.

On the 1st day of July, 1864, the Senate of the United States adopted this resolution:

"That when the inhabitants of any State have been declared in a state of insurrection against the United States by proclamation of the President by force and virtue of the act entitled 'An act further to provide for the collection of duties on imports, and for other purposes,' approved July 13, 1861, they shall be, and are hereby, declared to be incapable of casting any vote for electors of President or Vice President of the United States, or of electing Senators or Representatives in Congress until said insurrection in said State is suppressed or abandoned, and said inhabitants have returned to their obedience to the Government of the United States, nor until such return to obedience shall be declared by proclamation of the President, issued by virtue of an act of Congress hereafter to be passed, authorizing the same."

Upon which the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] gave an affirmative vote. On the 8th day of February, 1865, he again voted for the following resolution:

"Whereas the inhabitants and local authorities of the States of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, Arkansas, and Tennessee rebelled against the Government of the United States, and were in such condition on the 8th day of November, 1861, that no valid election for electors of President and Vice President of the United States, according to the Constitution and laws thereof, was held therein on said day: Therefore,

"Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the States mentioned in the preamble to this joint resolution are not entitled to representation in the Electoral College for the choice of President and Vice President of the United States for the term of office commencing on the 4th day of March, 1865; and no electoral votes shall be received or counted from said States concerning the choice of President and Vice President for said term of office."

Thus we see, Mr. Chairman, that a most distinguished leader of the Democratic party in the Senate has declared on two several occasions that these rebellious States, so far from being sovereign States in the Union with all their rights intact and inviolate, had, in fact, ceased to be States in the Union having the right to take part in the election of President and Vice President. Sir, what kind of a State is that which has no right to share in the leading and paramount privilege which belongs to the people of every loyal State, of participating in the election of the two highest officers within the gift of the people? When the distinguished gentleman denied by his share in this solemn enactment the right of these States to participate in that election and to be counted in the Electoral College he declared in effect that these States were no longer States in full and unimpaired relations with the Union—that they had not the rights which they possessed previous to the war, but had forfeited them by the acts and treason of their citizens. Let the people of my own State, to whom this speech, I learn, is being sent by thousands, understand, when they read it by their firesides and in the light of their intelligence, that the author of it has declared by his vote in the Senate that the proposition which he now enunciates as a part of the Democratic platform has no foundation either in law or fact.

But, sir, we do not stop there. The Supreme Court of the United States has declared these States and their people to be "enemies." In the case of the Brilliant, which may be found in 2 Black, the court says:

"When the regular course of justice is interrupted by revolt, rebellion, or insurrection, so that the courts of justice cannot be kept open, civil war exists, and hostilities may be prosecuted on the same footing as if those opposing the Government were foreign enemies invading the land."

And again, in the same case, the court says:

"The law of nations is also called the law of nature; and it contains no such anomalous doctrine as they are now, for the first time, desired to pronounce, to wit: that insurgents who have risen in rebellion against their sovereign, expelled her courts, established a revolutionary government, organized armies, and commenced hostilities, are not enemies because they are traitors; and a war levied on the Government by traitors in order to dismember and destroy it is not a war because it is an insurrection."

Thus we see that the Supreme Court has declared these States and their citizens "enemies," and I ask, sir, what right has an enemy at war with this Government except the right to be treated as such according to the rules of civilized warfare; and when he surrenders to the conquering power is he not by every rule of law subject to the will of the conqueror? Can such enemy be said to be a sovereign State?

Nor do we stop here, sir. I might cite here, against this proposition of the Democratic party, the whole course of our legislation in this regard, where Congress has by repeated acts dealt with these rebellious States as public enemies in the measures which were adopted for carrying forward the war to a successful result. And if we resort for authority to the executive department of the Government, we find it enunciated with the utmost clearness and precision by the President himself that these States "are without any civil government;" for he declares in his proclamation appointing a provisional governor for North Carolina, in 1865, (and which has been more fully recited in the very valuable speech of my colleague, Mr. ELA,) that the rebellion had in its revolutionary progress "deprived the people of that State of all civil government." This is the language of Andrew Johnson, and it is perhaps as complete an answer to the positions taken by him in his last annual message as could be afforded by any official declaration. But aside from this, and as if to strengthen and intensify his expressed opinion, the very act of President Johnson in undertaking to establish governments in these rebel States by virtue of his executive authority is the strongest admission, nay, the strongest assertion, that could be derived from executive action of the abrogation of the governments which existed at the commencement of the rebellion, and of the absence of any government which, under the Constitution and laws of the United States, Congress was bound to recognize.

Mr. Chairman, I take no delight in citing these changes of opinion in high places, and especially, sir, when they relate to such important and solemn affairs of state, and touch so nearly and affect so deeply the peace, prosperity, and common welfare of our beloved country. But I hold it to be a high and solemn duty to do what I can in my humble sphere to justify and uphold before my constituents and before the country that view of public affairs and those principles of action which lie at the foundation of the measures of restoration inaugurated and sustained by the Republican party, and which commend themselves so strongly to my own judgment. And therefore I have spread out before you to-day briefly, but clearly, I trust, this record of individual and official opinion and action, which proves conclusively that we are in accord with, and that our action is based upon, the identical principle in regard to the status of these rebel States, which controlled the action of every department of Government during the war, and up to that unfortunate hour when the defection of Mr. Johnson originated motives in high places for an abandonment of this safe and constitutional rule of action. And, sir, I present this evidence of the early views and acts of the President as a complete and perfect answer to the specious reasoning, the false assumptions, and the unwarranted conclusions put forth in his last annual message.

And now, what boots it that these men have changed? Suppose the distinguished Senator from Indiana now declares, as he has in his speech, that during all the years of the rebellion these constitutions continued to exist in all their integrity, and that when peace came it found the State with its constitution and laws unreppealed and in full force, and holding and binding that State to the Federal Union. Suppose the President of the United States now asserts the same doctrine, and maintains that these rebel States are entitled to representation in Congress under their present laws, which were made in pursuance of his own authority. Suppose even the Supreme Court should decide in conflict with its former opinion to the same effect, which I do not believe they will do. This retraction of former sentiments, well considered and distinctly enunciated, is only another instance of many in the history of political disturbances of the sudden departure from first principles and first declarations. All this can furnish no reason why the Republican party should give the lie to its former utterances, should depart from its settled principles or rules of action, and by its indifference or neglect give over these rebel States and their new-born citizens, loyal as they have proved themselves to be through four years of civil war, to the tender mercies of unpardoned and unrepentant rebels.

No, sir; we see clearly in the light of this history that the legislative, the executive, and the judicial departments of the Government have heretofore united in declaring the condition of these rebel States as one of disturbed relations to the Union, as that of enemies, and as States without civil government. And now, sir, it is as clear as the light of heaven that whoever of all these high authorities shall to-day declare that the status of these States is the same that it was before the rebellion; that they have by laying down their arms been restored to all their rights as they existed before the war, and are now entitled to assume all the functions of States within the Union; are retracting their own words, faltering in their former purposes, denying their declarations, and assuming that by this great war, which has cost so much blood and treasure, unpardoned traitors and public enemies have forfeited no rights, but are still clothed in all the panoply of American citizenship. Sir, I repudiate, the Republican party repudiates, these new and false doctrines. I care not who falters, we shall not; I care not who, in this great crisis, proves false, the Republican party of Congress will prove true, not only to its own policy, but to the early declarations and policy of every branch of the national Government.

Reconstruction—Mr. Stevens.

I am aware that confusion sometimes arises out of the question which is so often put to us, "whether these rebel States are in or out of the Union." Let us not be misled or dismayed by the use of phrases in themselves figurative. I hold, sir, that it does not follow that because a State has abrogated its form of government or destroyed its domestic or municipal institutions, or by its acts become a public enemy, it is necessarily "out of the Union," as that phrase is properly understood and interpreted. It may, in fact, sever its connection and isolate its people by force of arms from the Union so far that the national Government may not be able to control its people or hold possession of its territory. Such was actually the case for a time in some of the States during the rebellion. Yet, I hold that each and all of those States, in one sense, remained in the Union, and were theoretically and legally a part of the United States. The vicissitudes of war cannot destroy the rights of the General Government any more than the civil condition of the Territory or people of a State can affect its authority, though such vicissitudes may seriously affect the condition of traitors or insurgents. Let us examine this question with a view to its answer.

A State, or, more properly speaking, the people of a State, have the power to alter, amend, or abolish their constitution. I suppose no one will deny that. But such amendments or abrogation of its constitution does not necessarily take it beyond the operation of a paramount law of the United States. We may still occupy its territory, we may still collect our duties at its ports and our taxes from its people. We may arrest, try, and punish its citizens under the laws of the United States, and do everything within its territory which is required to assert and maintain the power of the Union under our Constitution. We may say, indeed, that no State has the right to secede from the Union, and I think we may say correctly that she has no legal power to secede, which means, correctly speaking, that she has no power to take her territory or her subjects from under the control and authority of the United States and the jurisdiction of the Constitution and laws thereof. In that sense the people of a State remain in the Union. But I think it a gross absurdity to say that the people of a State may not by their own acts—by violence against the General Government, by resisting its authority, by confederating for its overthrow—become a public enemy, interrupt their relations with the General Government, thereby forfeiting their rights to share in the administration of its affairs, and become the objects of just and proper force and legislation in order to restore them to obedience and enable their loyal citizens to resume their proper position in the national family. Sir, these rebel States may be dealt with as conquered enemies or as communities who by their own acts and crimes are "deprived of civil government." The people of the State "are in the Union," subject to such legislation as may be necessary to their restoration to a republican form of government.

I desire to add here the suggestion made by my distinguished friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAMS] in a very able speech made by him in this House February 10, 1866. In speaking of the condition of the States in regard to their civil government at the close of the rebellion and the ambiguity of expressions and phrases used to designate that condition, he says:

"The difference is perhaps only the result of a want of precision in the use of terms or a diversity of opinion in regard to their meaning. Mr. Burke has furnished us with a distinction here that meets the case precisely. "The word State," he remarks in his letter to Sir Hercules Langrishe on the subject of the extension of the elective franchise to the Irish Catholics, "is one of much ambiguity. Sometimes it is used to signify the whole Commonwealth, comprehending all its orders, with the several privileges belonging to each. Sometimes it signifies only the higher and ruling part of the Commonwealth, which is commonly called the Government." In the former of these senses it is not to be doubted that these communities still exist and are in the Union or of the Union, because their Territories belong to it and their people owe it allegiance. In the latter, however—and that is the one that connects them with our political system, as the proclamations concede—they are admitted by the same proclamations to have been destroyed, and can, of course, be nowhere. And this will be found to reconcile the apparent contradiction between the language of the proclamations and the accordant practice of the Government on the one hand and the theory of those who are supposed to speak its opinions, and infer from some unhappy phraseology of the former, as well as from the more recent utterances of the message, the repugnant idea that there was a constitution of government left existing amid the general wreck in a case where it had been previously declared in terms that there was "no civil government whatever."

I find this doctrine of the inviolability of State constitutions to be a corollary from the doctrine that this Government is a compact between the States. In this heresy originates the Democratic sophistry of which we hear so much. Mr. Chairman, this Union was formed by the people, and is a Government of the people. So viewing it, I do not admit, nay, I deny the doctrine, that "State constitutions are the bond of our Union," even though such an erroneous and dangerous doctrine is asserted by gentlemen as distinguished as the Senator from Indiana. Therefore, I hold that a State government may be abrogated and even destroyed by the acts of its own people without any dissolution of the Union. If the people of South Carolina had done as many of their Democratic leaders desired them to do, and established a monarchy upon the ruins of their State constitution, entirely abrogating the latter, so that in fact the State as such had no existence, still there would have been no dissolution of the Union; because, this being a Government of the people and not a compact of independent States, her people and her territory would still remain subject to the national power and control. As I have said before, we could march our armies across her territories, collect our duties at her ports and taxes from her people, holding and enforcing our national jurisdiction throughout her borders. It is only by admitting that as a State she is a party to the compact, and that our Government is a Government of States instead of a Government of the people, that her destruction as a State can operate as a dissolution of the Union.

Sir, the people of a State can be said to be "out of the Union" only when either by force of arms they maintain a position independent of the national Government until recognized as sovereign by the nations of the earth or are permitted by the consent of the people of the United States to assume that high position. In the one case it is successful revolution, in the other peaceable and permissive separation. The latter mode, if it exists as a principle in our form of government, is certainly of very doubtful origin, and, like the acquisition of new territory, "outside of the Constitution." The rebels attempted the first; many of the Democratic leaders advised the other. Either would have been disunion. But to say that because a State constitution once recognized as republican by the Government has been impaired, altered, or destroyed by the action of its people or from any other cause, the Union has therefore been dissolved, and the Government of our fathers has lost its power and control over the people and territory of such State, is to assert by figure of speech what does not exist in fact and what cannot take place in law. And further, sir, it is no less an absurdity to assert that this Government has no constitutional power to guaranty a republican form of government to those shattered States, stricken down and deprived of all government, save by assuming the false position that the State governments cannot be destroyed, but must exist forever against the will and wishes of their people. The people of a State may be swept or driven from her borders, her constitution be overthrown or become without effect, but the Union still exists; the national power and protection still continue over her territory; and when that territory is repeople Congress is bound to guaranty to it a republican form of government.

Mr. Chairman, the admission by the American people that a rebel State or the people of a State in rebellion could emerge from that condition after four years' duration with all the civil and political rights and powers with which they were clothed before the commission of their great crime would render, and justify so, this American nation the scorn and laughing-stock of the civilized world, and do more to bring republican institutions into disrepute and ridicule, and prove more strongly the weakness of a republican Government such as ours, than all the combined assaults of the despotisms of the world. I hesitate not to say that the dissolution of the Union and the formation of independent confederacies within the present limits of the United States would be far preferable in its results to the practical recognition of such a heresy as this.

Mr. Chairman, let us look for a moment at the effect of this Democratic doctrine, that the relations of these rebel States have never been changed or altered in consequence of their rebellion and insurrection. Let us see what the consequences are practically, if, when they surrendered to our arms, they were instantaneously restored to all their rights in the Union and at once stood erect side by side with the loyal States of this Government, who had maintained its supremacy and preserved its national life. Of course, sir, it follows that all this time they would have been entitled to their representation in the Halls of Congress. It follows that while they were waging war with all the power which they could command against this Government they held at the same time, as States and State governments, the right, by their Senators and Representatives in Congress, to vote upon every question, important or unimportant, which might arise in regard to the raising of troops, of money, or upon any other subject connected with the prosecution of the war against them in their confederate capacity. If this were true, then they possessed the right to have united with the loyal States in choosing a President and Vice President of this Union, and might have sent their electors to claim their seats by the side of the loyal men of New Hampshire, Ohio, and Indiana in the Electoral College of 1865. And not only that, sir, but this doctrine carries us still further, and defeats to all intents and purposes one of the most magnificent results of the war—the emancipation of those who had for two hundred years been held in servitude under the laws perpetuating slavery in the southern States. To show that this is exactly so let us consider that by this Democratic proposition every constitution in the rebel States was in full force at the commencement of the rebellion, during the rebellion, and at its close, and from that time to the present, and that they are to-day as unimpaired and in as full relation with the Federal Union as when their constitutions came from the hands of the original framers. Those constitutions, each and all, recognize and legalize African slavery. Therefore slavery existed and still exists untouched and unimpaired under the authority of the constitutions of the rebel States. It will not do to say, sir, that it has been abolished by proclamation, for the Democratic party always denied any legal or binding force to that great act. They cannot say that it has been subsequently abolished by the acts of these States themselves, because those acts were not performed under the authority of the old constitutions, but under the authority of the governments set up and instituted by President Johnson.

Reconstruction—Mr. Stevens.

Such, sir, being the doctrine of the Democratic party this day touching this great question, according to their theory slavery exists in full power and force, and the favorite "institution" is only temporarily suppressed by "military satraps," "Federal bayonets," and "congressional usurpation." I do not wonder, sir, under these circumstances, and in this view of the law, and the want of power in the national Government over these States lately in rebellion, that the Democratic government of Maryland has proceeded to register the emancipated slaves within her borders with a view of calling upon the General Government to pay from its Treasury the full value of their manumitted freedmen; nor do I wonder, sir, that on this theory they should deny civil and political rights to the colored people, or that they should still continue to regard them as an inferior race. I am not surprised in this view at that coalition which now exists between the former slaveholders of the South and the leaders of the Democratic party of the North; but I solemnly believe that should that coalition be successful in its efforts to obtain control of this Government there would not be virtue enough in any Democratic Congress to withstand and resist a combination which seeks remuneration for four million manumitted slaves. Sir, the very scheme itself, supported by national power, would corrupt the country from one end to the other.

The propositions which I have endeavored to enforce may be stated thus:

1. Previous to the rebellion the rebel State governments existed in constitutional and friendly relations with the Union.

2. The people of those States having a right to change, alter, or abolish their State governments, accomplished that work by their own act, and set up new governments in the several States.

3. In and by those new State governments they undertook to sever the connection and allegiance of their people from the Union, and by so doing placed their State governments and their people in the position of public enemies, compelling and justifying war against them on the part of the United States.

4. By the power and fortunes of war these newly-erected and hostile governments were overthrown, leaving the people of the several States "without any civil government whatever."

5. Under the Constitution Congress is bound to guaranty a republican form of government to those States, and possesses all the power to enable it to perform that high office.

6. In the exercise of that power Congress has the right and must necessarily discriminate between the classes of persons existing within the several States, in order that the new government may not only be established but that it may be republican in form. And this is all that Congress proposes to do.

Mr. Chairman, I have no time to pursue this matter further. I have only time to refer to the measures, which I contend that Congress, the law-making power of the country, has full authority within the scope of the Constitution to originate and pass, and which the Executive is bound by his oath of office to execute with fidelity and promptness. These measures, sir, have now been before the people of this country for nearly a year. Our opponents say they are unconstitutional. I have already considered this question, and do not propose to pursue it further; but I will say that this is the same old state objection which we have heard from the Democratic party from the day when our late President called upon the country for seventy-five thousand men to protect our flag and advance her arms against the common enemy. Yes, sir; this cry of unconstitutionality was raised then, and even before that time.

When, in 1860, the President was called upon to protect our flag from the insults of traitors, and should have taken steps to crush out the then incipient rebellion; he was counseled by the same men to desist, and we were told that there was no power in this Government to "constitutionally" resist the efforts of armed traitors to overthrow it. In my own State, sir, leading Democrats declared that if the people of New Hampshire left their homes and sprang to the aid of the General Government they should be followed by a fire from the rear from thirty-thousand Democrats, the movement (not the shooting) being considered quite "unconstitutional."

When the Republican party appropriated money in support of the Army during the war these Democrats declared that unconstitutional, and resisted it by every means in their power. When that great military measure aimed against the common enemy—the emancipation proclamation—was adopted, there came from the Democratic party everywhere a great howl of "unconstitutionality." When we placed in the hands of the loyal men of the South arms to resist the enemy, and, although colored, gave them the opportunity of fighting for the old flag and the sweet boon of personal liberty side by side with us, the objection was again raised that this was unconstitutional. So it has been, and so it is now. The same old objection is brought forward by the Democratic party, and when we endeavor to restore the late rebel States upon a just basis, and one which will guarantee a perpetual Union by giving power to the loyal people, they cry: "This is unconstitutional," and brand the Republican party as traitors to the trust bequeathed to us by our fathers. But, sir, this old and worn-out howl has no force as it is applied to us. For me it has no terrors. Like the siren cry of "Peace" it has been drowned by the roar of battle. I think the soldiers of our now disbanded Army, when they left their homes and were ordered across the Potomac and first stepped on the "sacred soil" of Virginia, did not stop to search the Constitution for some clause which would justify them in their action, or heed the clamor which the allies of the rebellion raised in the rear; nor when they assaulted the works and scaled the parapets of the enemy intrenched around Richmond, did they hesitate to press forward because such a proceeding was not provided for in terms by the Constitution; but they saw an army of traitors arrayed against their country and their flag, and, pressing forward to victory, gave us again the blessing of peace. They knew that a Government which was worthy of the name must contain principles if not provisions for its own preservation, and satisfied with that they did not hesitate to exercise that power until the rebellion had succumbed to their victorious arms, and our flag again waved from the Potomac to the Gulf, the symbol of a free and undivided people.

But they say these measures we have adopted are not only unconstitutional but that they are harsh and cruel. Sir, is there a man within sound of my voice or anywhere, intelligently reading the current events in the rebel States, who does not know that the Federal arms, as the representative of the Federal authority, are to-day the only guarantees which the loyal Union men of the South have of their safety, the security of their property, and even their lives? Can any gentleman tell me of a single instance where cruelty and injustice have been practiced or inflicted under the orders of any of the military commanders of the five districts or of any such injury unredressed? I know of none; I have heard of none. But, on the other hand, let this military power be lifted entirely from the South and the rebellious citizens left in charge of all matters appertaining to their civil affairs, and instead of the occasional instances of robbery and murder now occurring throughout that section of the country, and brought to public notice, there would be bloodshed and rapine everywhere; the law of force would be the rule rather than the law of courts and civil tribunals, and the loyal people alone would be the victims.

Mr. Chairman, when I review the history of events for the last few years I am amazed that the Republican party has made any progress in this great work of reconstruction in defiance of the many obstacles thrown in its way. Not the least of these obstacles—perhaps the most formidable of all—is the course which the President has thought proper to pursue since he assumed the office to which he acceded through the act of an assassin.

This officer who, previous to his election to the Vice Presidency, was so violent and extreme in his denunciations of traitors, and who declared his purpose to make the rebels take back seats in the work of reconstruction, and even advocated the confiscation of their property, and its division among loyal men, has not only modified his views in this respect, but is now looked upon and claimed by the Democratic party and their southern brethren as their leader and chief in these efforts to obstruct and defeat every honest and just plan which Congress has sought to adopt. He has vetoed our bills in defiance and contempt of his own former expressed opinions; he has removed and attempted thereby to disgrace our gallant and patriotic officers who were charged with the execution of the laws passed by Congress, while they were earnestly and conscientiously endeavoring to carry out the policy determined upon by the representatives of the people, and he has removed them to the end that those measures might be defeated through the administration of other military commanders whom he has selected for the purpose of carrying out his theories of reconstruction. Against these and other obstacles are we contending to-day. But let not our enemies exult in the prospect that these obstacles will discourage and deter us from carrying forward these measures to final success according to our convictions of duty. No, sir; Congress will take no backward step. In spite of all opposition, all threats, and all intimidations, Congress will pursue its policy to its final issue. And let us rejoice that the people of this country have already recognized in the four million freedmen of the South their aid in this great work. We know who it was that befriended the Union man in his perilous residence in that country; who aided the Government to the best of their ability, always and under every circumstance; who rescued our soldiers from the hunt of the bloodhound and the terrible horrors of starvation, and yet who are now persecuted, ostracised, and decried as something less than human beings with human rights by gentlemen upon this floor. But let me say, sir, it seems to me that man is mad who stands up to assert here that he will undertake to undo what Congress has done during the past three years in that direction. The man who asserts that as the ground of his action has not, I think, yet seen enough of blood in his day and generation.

When the Democratic party gets ready to reassert that slavery still exists in the southern States; when it is really earnest in its attempts to reestablish the institution, then, sir, it may summon courage to undertake to deprive these new-born citizens of the rights to which they have attained. But if they love their country and desire peace, and if they dread a renewal of bloodshed, let them stop in their mad endeavor to array their party against the rights of these true and loyal men, who, though they may be ignorant and humble, are none the less true and loyal to the Government, and as citizens entitled to its protection.

Mr. Chairman, I regret that the hour to which I am limited does not permit me to speak at length upon the other questions to which the President in his message has called the attention of Congress, particularly the question of taxation and finance. Let me say here, however, that Congress ought, in justice to the country, to modify the costly and expensive systems of finance and taxation to which the President and Secretary of the Treasury seem so strongly disposed to adhere. The country, sir, can hope for no measures of relief from them. Their political motives and interests require that those burdens should still be pressed upon the people; that these costly systems of finance should be upheld, and that reform should await the advent to power of that party so auspiciously inaugurated at Philadelphia in August, 1866—a most indefinite period, sir! But I have no lingering doubt that Congress is awake to its duty in this respect. I can see clearly that before its adjournment we shall send to the country most useful as well as most radical reforms in this particular. Already the Committee of Appropriations report the estimates reduced to $276,000,000, and I am assured by gentlemen on the Committee of Ways and Means that they are prepared to recommend a reduction of taxes from all the great branches of industry, and to place it upon liquors and luxuries. Such assurances the distinguished chairman of that committee gave us here on this floor a few days since. Such unquestionably will be the policy of this House. Let this be done, sir, and let our taxes be laid so that capital of every kind, whether invested in banks or bonds, shall bear its share of the burdens of the Government, and we may hope by the blessings of God to attain our former prosperity.

Mr. Chairman, great indeed has been the struggle of this country and great the sacrifices of its people within the last seven years. With a great price have we purchased this liberty. It is not alone the heavy burdens of taxation under which we are staggering and the great debt we stand pledged to pay that witnesses these our sufferings and our sacrifices. Not only our treasure, but the blood of our fellow-citizens has been poured out like water to purchase and maintain the national life. On the mountains of Virginia and Tennessee, along the banks of southern rivers, and by the sounding sea lie buried the heroes to whose valor and whose sacrifices we owe the existence of our Government to-day. In the households of the nation there is weeping and mourning still for those that come not back from the hospital and the field of battle. Let us be true to the memory of our dead heroes and true to the pledges we have given their surviving dependents, and never falter in those principles that they have suffered and died to maintain.

"Scattered on southern fields they lie,
Where tropic breezes gently sigh;
Under the shade of orange tree,
Upon the fields of Oluisee,
Or on the sandy drifts that pile
The barren waste of Morris' Isle;
Buried in melancholy lines
Along the swamps of Seven Pines.
And hundreds more half-buried still
On slopes of Gaines' and Malvern Hill;
Lying beneath the waving grain
On broad Manassas' war-scarred plain;
Scattered 'mong gloomy woods that dress
The lone haunts of the Wilderness;
Adown the Mississippi's coast,
Among the winding bayous lost;
Or with a nation's tears interred
In thy great tomb, O Gettysburg,
Rest, ye brave men, where'er ye lie!
Your valor brought us victory,
Green be the sod above your graves
O'er which your flag in triumph waves;
Green be your memory that lives
With all the brightness valor gives;
Hallowed by nations saved from wreck,
Hallowed by friends your graves shall deck;
Hallowed by patriotic men,
Orator's tongue and poet's pen;
Though in uncoffined graves ye lie,
Ye are of those not born to die."

Above all, let us not defame the memory of these men by declaring, either by language or our policy, that they fought only to reinstate rebels once more in power. While we cherish their memories let us vindicate their motives and their actions.

In conclusion, let me add, in behalf of the people whom I have the honor to represent, and in behalf, I am sure, of my own gallant State, that they will take no backward step. With them the issues are made up and the champions selected. On the one banner are inscribed the principles and the policy which carried us triumphantly through the war and, borne aloft by a brave and gallant soldier who can both fight and speak, is to-day the herald of victory. On the other are written the restoration and supremacy of rebels, and it boasts a champion worthy to speak and act for the "lost cause," a champion who, looking on the honored and torn flag of the eleventh regiment, whose old commander now leads our home column, uttered these bitter words:

"That flag speaks more eloquently to-day than human tongue can speak of the carnage of hell which abolitionism has brought upon the country—that flag, until it was seized by red-handed abolitionism, floated on every sea, was respected in every land, and never trailed in the dust."

And who, when the friends of the Union soldier were struggling to admit him to the privileges of the ballot, declared that—

"The Democracy of the country will never submit to the result of an election decided against them by soldiers' votes."

Between these principles and these candidates who can hesitate? New Hampshire soldiers, I am sure, will not. Their duty and their feelings unite to guide their action. New Hampshire knows her duty and will perform it. From her mountains and her valleys, from her farms and her workshops, and throughout her borders we still hear the same clear, clarion notes proclaiming her firm and steadfast in the principles she has maintained for the last twelve years, and which she will again vindicate in her coming election. On the 10th day of March her Republican columns file out into line of battle, and every soldier will fix his beaming eye on that unmatched chieftain destined to command the republican army and to lead the destinies of this Republic for four years to come. Even now, sir, by their quiet firesides, around their family hearths, are they reading these noble words of vindication and appeal:

"And now, Mr. President, when my honor as a soldier and integrity as a man have been so violently assailed, pardon me for saying that I can but regard this whole matter, from the beginning to the end, as an attempt to involve me in the resistance of law, for which you hesitated to assume the responsibility in orders, and thus to destroy my character before the country."

And, sir, let me say that as they read with glistening eyes and flushed cheek, not only the soldiers who have marched under his victorious banner, and who remember him with pride and affection, but the young and old, the true-hearted men of the Granite State, will rally to the support of that banner now inscribed with the names of "Grant and Harriman," and send their answering shout of triumph to the gallant State of Ohio, just awakening from her lethargy to renew the contest for liberty and Republican supremacy.

Southern Land Grants.

SPEECH OF HON. W. S. HOLMAN,

OF INDIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 4, 1868.

The House having under consideration the bill to subject to the provisions of the homestead law lands heretofore granted to and forfeited by railroad companies—

Mr. HOLMAN said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I am in favor of the object which this bill seeks to secure, and I have sought the floor to enter my protest against the assumption of gentlemen, that the support of this measure necessarily implies hostility to the interests of the southern States. It is an unwarrantable assumption. I speak only for myself. As a member of this House I have witnessed the passage of the bills by which millions of acres of the public lands have been granted to railroad corporations, and I have witnessed the passage of other bills by which such corporations have been relieved from their forfeitures and by which grants originally large have been enormously increased, and I have uniformly voted against them. I have never voted to grant a single acre of the public lands to a corporation nor to reinvest such corporation with the title to lands after a forfeiture. I have voted against such an appropriation of the public lands in the West, and in supporting this bill I apply the same principle to the public lands in the South. I have resisted this favoritism of corporations without reference to the section of the Union in which the congressional bounty was to be bestowed.

In my judgment the whole policy has been a fatal error; and I cannot be deterred, sir, from following this conviction of my judgment by the assumption of gentlemen that this measure is a discrimination against the South. I disclaim this, sir, the more earnestly because, as a result of an unwise partisan policy, we are affecting by this measure, for good or for evil, a section of the Union unrepresented on this floor; and because, sir, if this was a measure of vengeance for the punishment of a whole people I should deem it of all measures the most pernicious. A great and victorious people can afford to be magnanimous. By clemency and forbearance we may restore peace and fraternity, and assuage the bitter memories of war. But laws conceived in hatred and enacted in the spirit of vindictive passions will provoke resentments which no lapse of time will palliate, rendering still insecure all that we have gained by victory. But I deny, sir, that such is the purpose of this bill, whatever may be the motive of gentlemen in giving it their support. On the contrary, I insist that it is a measure in the interests of the whole people. Indeed, sir, so far as these railroad corporations are concerned they are in the main formed and their stock owned by citizens of the North, and the resistance to the passage of this bill is from New York more than from the cities of the South.

What is the purpose of this bill, sir? In 1856, by several acts of Congress, grants of public lands were made to certain railroad companies of the South, such grants being of every alternate section to the width of twelve miles through the entire length of the proposed roads, the companies to receive the title to and have the right to sell one hundred and twenty sections of land on the completion of each twenty miles of road, but with this condition, that "if the said roads are not completed within ten years no further sales shall be made, and the land unsold shall revert to the United States." These ten years have elapsed; some of these roads have not even been commenced and none are completed, and those that are in part completed have received their one hundred and twenty sections—seventy six thousand eight hundred acres of land for each twenty miles of completed road; and having forfeited every claim in either law or equity to the residue of these lands, amounting to more than five million acres, this bill proposes to throw them open to the provisions of the homestead law and give them to actual settlers—to the landless and the homeless, who will occupy and improve the lands and add to the wealth of this country by their labor instead of to these wealthy corporations. Can there be any objection founded on public policy to such a bill? In a country like ours is it not wiser to bestow lands on the landless, to the men who will make them produce their harvests by their own labor, rather than on rich corporations for the purposes of speculation? Is it not better to have many citizens masters of their own homesteads, the owners of the land they cultivate, than to centralize this wealth of the soil in the hands of a handful of men who are already rich, and create in the progress of time a nation of tenants? The most precious wealth of a republic is an independent and prosperous people. Will we promote this, sir, by centralizing the wealth of the soil and creating a nation of landlords with overgrown estates and hopeless tenants? And yet, sir, every grant this nation is making of these millions of acres to favored corporations tend to that result. I will never vote, sir, for a measure so manifestly hostile to our free institutions, I care not what may be the pretense. There is always, sir, a specious pretense in behalf of the demands of rapacious capital.

HO. OF REPS.

Kentucky Election—Mr. Dawes.

The question here is plain and direct: Shall these lands be given to our landless and homeless people or to these corporations? I cannot hesitate in deciding this question for myself. I should have voted against the original grants; I shall now vote against renewing these grants when these corporations have forfeited all claim upon the lands. If I had voted for the enormous grants which have been made in the last eight years to railroad corporations in Iowa, Michigan, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Kansas, and Nebraska, I should vote on the same principle to grant these lands to the railroad corporations of the southern States. The results would be the same, for whether the lands are in the West or the South the grants are, in fact, made to the great capitalists of New York, of London, and of Paris, who are in fact the corporators and receive the benefit of these grants. Gentlemen refer complacently to the benefits we have derived from the grant of lands to the Illinois Central railroad, and urge as an argument for these grants that the roads constructed by such grants transport our troops and munitions of war free of charge. The war has proved this to be a miserable delusion. The choice lands of Illinois, of the estimated value of $47,000,000, were granted to that company. The road was actually constructed by the land grant, but when war came were your troops and munitions of war transported over that road free of charge? No, sir. In spite of the united vote of this House that corporation received from your Secretary of War their full charges for such transportation, exceeding $3,000,000, and that road was and still is the property of British capitalists, and pours its annual flood of wealth into British coffers.

It is urged that these land grants encourage the construction of railroads and develop the resources of the country. If the business of the country require them railroads will be constructed, and constructed, too, by the capitalists who are to reap their benefits. By the land grants the best of the public lands are monopolized; they embrace every alternate section to the width of twenty miles, as is now your policy, for the entire length of the road, with the permission to select the most valuable sections within the width of fifty miles; and the whole lands are withheld from the actual settler until the agents of the corporation have selected the choice of the lands. These lands are held by the corporations until enhanced in value by the labor of enterprising settlers on adjacent lands. Their price is beyond the reach of any but wealthy purchasers; and thus, sir, these more than princely estates, these imperial possessions, granted to favored corporations, are placed forever beyond the reach of the laboring people, who, of all others, are entitled to the munificence of the Government. In vain, sir, under this system of land monopoly, will the laboring citizen, with his wife and children, emigrate to the South or West, hoping by honest labor to improve his fortunes and give to his children a foothold on the face of the green earth. In a very short period, sir, he will find every inviting spot already seized upon by these wealthy favorites of Congress, and will remain, in spite of his manly struggles and his patient labor, homeless and landless, and his children become in time the hopeless tenants of lands which should have been their own; and this is done on the pretense of developing the resources of the country, but done, indeed, sir, in a spirit of unworthy favoritism, that a few wealthy citizens may erect still more stately palaces in your great cities and riot in the excesses of wealth, consigning how many to a hopeless poverty?

Individuals are taught by the lessons of example, but a nation never takes counsel from the experience of other nations. The hopeless peasantry to which the masses of the people in every nation of Europe are reduced excites with us no apprehensions, for the public lands seem still inexhaustible. Is it not time, sir, that we should know that monopoly is rapidly appropriating every acre of public land that is fit for cultivation?

No fact has been more uniformly asserted by the far-seeing statesmen of this Republic than that the permanency of our free institutions is greatly dependent on securing to the great body of our people an independent freehold in the soil. And who can doubt this, sir? Popular government can only be created or maintained by a body of independent citizens. How inseparably is monarchy connected with a landed aristocracy and a nation of dependent tenants, with a strong government to maintain the ascendancy of the one and the submission of the other. Hence standing armies are everywhere the agents of power. No nation ever had such an opportunity as ours to establish the permanency of free institutions in the general distribution of the lands and the independent freehold of the citizen, for we are necessarily a nation of farmers. We could not be a free people if we were not. The rich inheritance of the nation was a vast domain of virgin soil, inviting, by its fertility, the freeman to manly independence and virtuous labor. Who can doubt, sir, that it was the true policy of the nation to hold the public lands—this bountiful gift of nature—not for speculation, nor to invest with princely estates favored classes, but in trust for the whole people, to secure as a homestead to every tiller of the soil the land on which he labored and which he enriched by the sweat of his brow. The reverse has been our policy; and I submit, sir, in view of the future of this country, that the policy which secures to the few enormous landed estates, condemning multitudes of laboring men to the remorseless cupidity of the landlord, is a monstrous crime against republican government, and that the most fatal of all the mistakes which we and our fathers have made in these eighty years is the mistake of permitting this land monopoly, on the pretense of developing the resources of the country, enriching the nation at the expense of the manhood of its people, implanting into this new Republic the curse of the old monarchies, the monopoly of the lands, reducing the nation to the decrepitude of old age when it should be in the early vigor of youth. That the mistake is but partially seen and now scarcely felt only renders it the more fatal.

The absurdity of the proposition that these enormous grants of lands to corporations are necessary to develop the country is manifest when we remember that great States of this Union were covered with prosperous homesteads and filled with an intelligent and virtuous people without any such appliances. The gradual and even the slow growth of a State is better than its rapid growth and the centralization of its wealth.

The measures of Congress in the last six years have been fatal to the homestead policy. That great and beneficent measure, which was first brought before Congress by the present Chief Executive, and assumed the form of law after the Republican party came into power, and which received, I believe, every vote of this House, has been rendered virtually inoper-ative by these enormous grants of lands to corporations.

Since I have been honored with a seat on this floor I have never known the time when some ingeniously devised bill giving millions of acres to some favored corporation was not slowly but surely wending its way step, by step, through the two Houses of Congress, and backed, too, by a powerful lobby; but I have never seen a lobby here, sir, in the interests of the people, in the interests of labor. These land monopolists exulted in the opportunities furnished them by the war. While the heart of the nation quivered the railroad corporations were pushing forward their bills! And such has been the liberality of Congress, in the eagerness to develop the resources of the country, that in the new States and Territories, with as yet but a handful of people, there is but little public land left for the landless citizen, and monopoly is grasping at it all.

During these six years Congress has granted to these corporations one hundred and twenty-five million acres of the choicest of the public lands. One hundred and twenty-five million acres! And within the same period you have granted for colleges over seven and a half million acres, the scrip for which has been sold at a nominal price; three hundred and ninety thousand acres of which, granted to my own State, sold for less than sixty cents per acre. A few men have monopolized it all. The grants to the States for common schools have been in the interests of the people, while all these other grants have manifestly been in the interests of monopolies, and wholly unjustified by any sound public policy. A few more years of this policy and the public lands will be wholly appropriated. Congress, in its eagerness to promote the fortunes of favored citizens, wealthy capitalists, will not have left an acre of land, even on the barren peaks of the Rocky mountains, upon which the laboring man may establish his homestead. And then, sir, labor, even for a home, is forever at the mercy of capital. These six years have been fatal years in our history; memorable years, sir, in the display of the self-denial and patriotism of our people, yet fatal in the measures of public policy, in the centralization of political power, in the centralization of wealth, and in the monopoly of the public lands.

And yet, sir, in spite of all this, who would abandon the pleasing hope that this nation will again listen to the counsels of that great statesman of a better era who assured his countrymen "that it is not in a splendid Government, supported by powerful monopolies and aristocratical establishments, that they will find happiness or their liberties protection; but in a plain system, void of pomp, protecting all, granting favors to none, dispensing its blessings like the dews of heaven, unseen and unfelt save in the freshness and beauty they contribute to produce."

Kentucky Election—Disloyalty a Disqualification.

SPEECH OF HON. HENRY L. DAWES,

OF MASSACHUSETTS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 13, 1868.

The House having under consideration the following resolution reported by the Committee of Elections in the contested-election case of Smith vs. Brown, from the second congressional district of Kentucky:

Resolved. That John Young Brown, having voluntarily given aid, countenance, counsel, and encouragement to persons engaged in armed hostility to the United States, is not entitled to take the oath of office as a Representative in this House from the second congressional district of Kentucky, or to hold a seat therein as such Representative—

Mr. DAWES said:

Mr. SPEAKER: The Committee of Elections, fully conscious of the importance of this case, have endeavored to so conduct it, as well in committee as before the House, that, whatever may be the final determination of the House, there shall not lie at their door any just accusation of an attempt to arrive at their conclusion without the fullest and most perfect discussion of the case that the House might desire, and without hearing in full all parties affected by it. It has been long before the House and the committee. It has been heard from time to time, and it has been postponed now ten days, in order that the gentleman against whom this report is made may be heard before the House, as he had been before the committee, in his defense. He has now been heard. Having occupied the attention of the House in opening this case as fully as I desired, I recognize it to be my duty to confine myself at this time entirely to a reply to such suggestions and arguments offered in opposition to the report as I think deserve or are capable of being answered. Before proceeding, however, to offer such considerations I beg leave to call the attention of the House to some remarks that fell from gentlemen, in the former discussion of this case, to which, it seems to me, I ought to allude—to the attempt on the part of the gentleman from Kentucky who first addressed the House [Mr. BECK] and the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. KERR], a colleague of mine on the committee, to insist upon it that this is a partisan proceeding.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] says, with a meaning that cannot be mistaken: "I know it makes a great difference before some tribunals whose ox is gored."

And the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. KERR] says, with more direction:

"It is my opinion, Mr. Speaker, that had it been the good fortune of Mr. Brown, after that letter had been written and after the war was over, to become a member of the Union party, 'so called,' as my friend from Illinois [Mr. ROSS] suggests, and had been elected as such to this House, he would have had no trouble in gaining admission to a seat here, notwithstanding that letter."

To the gentleman from Kentucky, who thinks that it makes a great deal of difference before this tribunal whose ox is gored, I submit this question: whether he owes his own seat here, after a unanimous report of the Committee of Elections in his favor and under the adoption by this House of that report without a division, to any such rule as he suggests? Do the gentleman's colleagues—one, two, three, four, five of them—whose cases have been submitted to that committee, and been reported upon unanimously by that committee, and placed in seats here by a unanimous vote of the House, owe their seats here to the rule he suggests? I leave him to answer that question to himself. But to the gentleman from Indiana, my colleague on the committee, who not only knows all these facts, but knows all the proceedings in the committee, I suggest that this comes with a poor grace from him, when he knows that there has been not a single vote, save this one, in that committee touching the right of any man to a seat upon this floor upon which there has been any division of sentiment, one way or the other; that there has been no report brought by that committee into this House in the result of which he himself, in common with all the other members of the committee, has not concurred, and in which this House has not supported him and me in that report; and when he knows that the vote in the committee on this very question now before the House is a refutation of any such idea as that suggested in his remarks. I do not care further to discuss this question; but I am happy to say that upon no question but this—a simple question of fact—has the committee differed at all; and the gentleman had arrayed with him in this case such a vote as should have prevented him from making any such statement to this House.

But, sir, I have to answer not only in behalf of the committee, in regard to the rule by which it has been governed in its votes, but I have to answer for myself to the arraignment of the gentleman from Indiana. The gentleman, in the remarks which he submitted in support of his minority report, found it necessary for his case to arraign me upon the floor of this House and to charge me with misrepresentation of the testimony in this case. He says:

"Now, I know not whether to characterize that as adroitness or maladroitness in torturing, if you please, the evidence that is brought here and upon which it is sought to convict Mr. Brown. There is no such thing in the record; and it is to that I call the attention of the gentleman and of this House. Why drag in that kind of interpretation when in this record there is nothing to justify it? Then why indulge in this kind of stuff to control the action, to control and prejudice the conscience, of this House against its plain duty in this important case?"

"Now, Mr. Speaker, is it justifiable, is it right, for a gentleman in this sort of a case, acting in this solemn capacity, thus to challenge his imagination to come to the aid of his facts, and to interpolate into this record what there is not one solitary particle of evidence to prove?"

And then, growing more earnest and zealous, he solemnly admonishes me for the future to take better care of my duty upon this floor when next I presume to address this House. Sir, I am aware that this sounds tame when read ten days after its delivery without the tone and temper which helped it on. I know very well that you, Mr. Speaker, up there behind your barricade, may have felt safe enough against the onslaught and charge of the gentleman, and yet I have before me an Indiana paper which represents that charge of the gentleman to have been so terrific and irresistible that nobody upon this side of the House could rally for any other purpose than to move a postponement of this case for one week to enable us to gather up the scattered fragments of our arguments. So bold and swift was this charge, and the gentleman had such a keen scent of blood, that he would not permit me even to correct and explain the statement that he made. I could think of nobody like him but the man

"Who roared so loud and looked so grim
That his very shadow dare not follow him."

Now, sir, what was all this about? The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. KERR] says there is not one particle of proof in the record to justify the statement which I made. These are my words:

"And while they were doing so John Young Brown confessed that he also secretly and privately went about whispering in their ears that if any man joined the Union Army in Kentucky he ought to be, and he believed he would be, shot down before he left the State."

Sir, what did John Young Brown confess? He confessed this:

"I frequently uttered publicly and privately"—
What did he utter? This:

"Not one man or one dollar will Kentucky furnish Lincoln to aid him in his unholy war against the South. If this northern army shall attempt to cross our borders we will resist it unto the death; and if one man shall be found in our Commonwealth to volunteer to join them he ought, and I believe will be, shot down before he leaves the State."

Here is the letter in full:

ELIZABETHTOWN, April 18, 1861.

Editors Louisville Courier:

My attention has been called to the following paragraph which appeared in your paper of this date:

"JOHN YOUNG BROWN'S POSITION.—This gentleman, in reply to some searching interrogatories put to him by Governor Helm, said, in reference to the call of the President for four regiments of volunteers to march against the South:

"I would not send one solitary man to aid that Government, and those who volunteer should be shot down in their tracks."

This ambiguous report of my remarks has, I find, been misunderstood by some who have read it, who construe my language to apply to the Government of the confederate States! What I did say was this:

"Not one man or one dollar will Kentucky furnish Lincoln to aid him in his unholy war against the South. If this northern army shall attempt to cross our borders we will resist it unto the death; and if one man shall be found in our Commonwealth to volunteer to join them he ought, and I believe will be, shot down before he leaves the State."

This was not said in reply to any question propounded by ex-Governor Helm, as you have stated, and is no more than I frequently uttered publicly and privately prior to my debate with him.

Respectfully, JOHN YOUNG BROWN.

Now, I thought that "privately" and "secretly" were convertible terms; and that if John Young Brown "frequently" uttered these words he was not likely to confine his utterances to the same place, but most likely he went about uttering them privately or secretly. And I am very certain that if he uttered these words privately he did not do so "upon the housetops." Therefore it was I said that he "privately and secretly went about whispering" these things in the ears of these men in Kentucky. That is all I did say upon this subject to justify my colleague upon the Committee of Elections [Mr. KERR] to charge me with a disposition to interpolate into the record what was not true.

The gentleman from Indiana, as well as the claimant for the seat in his remarks to-day—and in that particular the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] who first addressed the House on this subject—used the same language in respect to the course and conduct of Mr. Brown here charged as disloyal. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. KERR] has embodied it in these words—

"The whole record shows, from the very inception of this trouble"—

I ask gentlemen to bear these words in mind as I go along—

"The whole record shows, from the very inception of this trouble until this present hour, Mr. Brown, among his neighbors, whether they were Union men or secessionists, assumed the office of peace-maker and did nothing inconsistent therewith. That is what the record shows. That is what the evidence shows. That is what the witnesses produced both by Mr. Smith and Mr. Brown swear."

That covers the whole ground, I suppose, and therefore gentlemen who arraign me for interpolating into the evidence anything not found in the record will be patient and bear with me as I go along. The first thing after the "inception of this trouble," and after President Lincoln called upon Kentucky for her quota of seventy-five thousand men, and after the Governor of Kentucky had declared that that State would furnish not a man or a dollar—the first thing after that which Mr. Brown did was also to declare that if any man did go into the northern Army he ought to be, and he [Mr. Brown] hoped he would be, shot down in his tracks.

Now, I agree—and I give the gentleman the benefit of it—that so far as any doubtful or uncertain act or expression of the man is concerned, it is due to him to look to surrounding circumstances, to subsequent acts, to the daily life of the man, to find an explanation or interpretation of such act, and give to it its true and legitimate and proper force. If there were anything in these words of his which admitted of any doubt I would hail anything to be found in this record that would relieve it from that doubt in favor of his loyalty.

But, sir, I am sorry to say the record is too plain; the words themselves do not admit of explanation by other words, because they are clear and positive. And yet, sir, I am not willing to pursue this line of argument altogether in reference to this claimant. I am willing to try him by the test he himself desires to be tried by and to see if there is anything, any one single act of his, any one single measure, purpose, pursuit of his, which he put forth to the world after he wrote that letter that will interpret it in favor of loyalty.

Sir, it is said that that which he confesses he had been in the habit of doing frequently and privately around his district he did in favor of neutrality in Kentucky. Sir, what is meant by neutrality? Is it enough for the defense of Mr. Brown to say that other men who occupied that doubtful and ambiguous position in the early part of the war were men who since have shown themselves, by their acts, to have been bold, fearless, and energetic champions of the Union and the cause of their country? Certainly not; because neutrality being a doubtful and uncertain position, their subsequent conduct demonstrated, so far as they are concerned only, for what purpose those men went into it. It demonstrated, for instance, why Mr. Crittenden and Mr. Speed and Mr. Guthrie went into it. Those men in Kentucky were drawn into that awkward and indefensible position by what they believed at the moment to be the necessity of the hour. As soon as the mask fell off and the scales dropped from their eyes, then they took their position on the side of the Union. They exhibited by their acts what they had meant by their words.

But, sir, there were two kinds of neutrality in Kentucky. There was the neutrality advocated by such men as I have just mentioned, whose loyalty was shown by their subsequent conduct. There was another kind of neutrality, the object of which was to paralyze the Union arm in Kentucky while the rebellion could gather strength and volume and proportion. Which of those kinds of neutrality did the gentleman now claiming this seat advocate? On which side did he array himself? The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] who first addressed the House appealed to this doctrine of neutrality as a vindication of the course of his colleague, as he called him; yet he failed to tell us to which kind of neutrality his colleague adhered. He failed to call attention to the fact that he had in his own case proved the distinction between the kind of neutrality supported by Mr. Brown, and the neutrality supported by the glorious names behind which Mr. Brown seeks shelter to-day. The gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] when conducting his own case before the Committee of Elections, called upon the stand Governor Robinson, and in his remarks before the House has reinforced this witness. To the testimony, therefore, of Mr. Robinson, I appeal for the explanation of the different kinds of neutrality advocated and supported in the State of Kentucky. I read from the gentleman's examination of his own witness:

"Question. Was I not endeavoring to show that Kentucky ought to maintain her condition of neutrality?"

The gentleman from Kentucky, it seems, was himself wedded to that doctrine. Let me read the answer of Governor Robinson, his own witness:

"I think Mr. Beck occupied that ground—that Kentucky should maintain a neutrality, such as I claimed she had never taken, and such as I was opposed to. He was for a neutrality by which Kentucky refused the General Government aid and assistance, and refused it permission to march troops across the State. I, on the contrary, advocated that her neutrality was simply a quiescent state for the time being; that she should maintain her allegiance to the United States Government, subject to whatever calls might be made upon her for men and money, and that her territory should be open for any purpose of the General Government. That was the neutrality I was for. Mr. Beck was opposed to furnishing men and money. I was for furnishing just as many men and as much money as would maintain the Union and put down the rebellion. Mr. Beck advocated the resolutions of 1798-99 in their full extent. He took the ground also that if his State went out the man who went with it could not be a traitor. He would either be hung by his State for disobeying her, or by the General Government for disobeying it. Those were the issues generally, as far as I recollect."

"Question. Is it or not true that the Union men of Kentucky, in the spring and early summer of 1861, through their meeting at Louisville, and the address of their central committee, urged the condition of neutrality with a good deal of vigor?"

"Answer. That is my recollection. The Union men of Kentucky did occupy the ground of neutrality in the early stages of the canvass, but not the neutrality which some gentlemen advocated. Their neutrality was not a neutrality by which they should resist or disobey any order of the General Government, any demand for men or money, or the right of transit for troops."

Then a question is put by a member of the committee:

"Did not Mr. Beck make speeches inviting men to join the confederate forces?"

"Answer. I do not know exactly how to answer that question. I have information that at the very discussions between myself and Mr. Beck there were men recruiting for the confederate service. I do not know that Mr. Beck had the slightest knowledge of that fact. I never heard him, directly or indirectly, urging any man to join the confederate army; but he was a southern rights man and advocated the doctrines which I have stated. He advocated the doctrine, virtually, of State supremacy, and I suppose the tendency of that would be to show that it was right and safe to join the rebellion. I do not think that Mr. Beck did anything farther than that. I have no doubt that the effect of his whole stand was to give strength and power, and a very great deal of strength and power, to those who were in favor of the South and of rebellion; but he did not in any speech advise any one to join the rebel forces."

I do not read this testimony, Mr. Speaker, to arraign the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK.] His case has been passed upon by this House, and passed upon with my concurrence. My object is, from the mouth of a witness produced on that side, to put an end to the idea that because a man belonged to that party of so-called "neutrality" he was therefore an advocate of the Union, that in proclaiming that neutrality he was taking the side of the Union.

But, sir, although Mr. Brown fails to give to these doubtful acts any interpretation which would mitigate the full force and effect of the promulgation to the people of Kentucky that every Union soldier ought to be shot down, what did he do? What became of this gentleman afterward? Did he, like the other men whose names we have brought forward here, take position by the side of the Union Army and labor with life in hand for the cause? Has there been one particle of evidence produced here which shows one act or speech of his or one prayer of his offered up in the secret recesses of his chamber, or anywhere else, calculated to encourage the hearts of the true Union men of Kentucky in that fearful conflict within their own borders and in their own families, by their own firesides, in the struggle for the life of the nation?

Sir, the most that can be said in his behalf is said by his own friend and witness from whom he has quoted this day. The most that can be said in his behalf was testified to by Mr. Mallory, whom he has summoned here to-day. Let me read it. A question was put to him by my colleague on the committee, [Mr. SHELLEBARGER,] now absent on account of sickness:

"After neutrality was abandoned in Kentucky do you know what side Mr. Brown took?"

"Answer. I cannot answer that question of my own knowledge; but from public report he took no side; he subsided."

That, sir, does not help a man when it is necessary for him to produce positive acts, positive demonstration, in order to relieve himself of something which he has done which is equivocal, which may be for or against the life of the nation. The most that can be said in his behalf has been said by his own bosom friend, who sat by his side during his former service in Congress, and who went back with him to Kentucky, carrying a full sense of his obligation to report to his constituents of that treason hatched within ten feet from where I stand.

Now, who are the witnesses called on the one side and the other to whom my friend from Indiana [Mr. KERR] appeals? He says the whole record shows he was a Union man who earnestly endeavored to prosecute in his way the Union cause.

A. S. Hicks, testifies, in answer to interrogatories, as follows—page 97, Document 47:

"By Mr. Smith:

"Question. The speech which Mr. Brown made at Hebbardsville in 1865, was it not intensely disloyal?"

"Answer. That is what I thought about it. I considered it disloyal. I never heard him say that the South had done anything but what was perfectly right, or that the Federal Government had done anything but what was wrong."

What encouragement, what a stimulant to the drooping spirits of the Union men of Kentucky! What lifting up of the arms of Crittenden and Rousseau and the gallant men from Kentucky who fought and fell in the cause of the Union! This man was making speeches that everything the Union Army did was wrong and everything the confederate army did was right.

"Question. Was it charged upon Mr. Brown last April at Hebbardsville that he had been a rebel from the beginning of the war until that time?"

"Answer. Yes."

"Question. Did he deny it?"

"Answer. He did not deny acting with that party. He denied being a rebel at that time, because he said there was no rebellion."

Mr. Brown, in 1865, thought the President, by paper proclamation, had put an end to the rebellion. He did not think at that time he belonged to the rebellion. That is the first witness.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I understand the gentleman from Massachusetts to say the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Brown] declared everything the Union Army had been doing or was doing was wrong and everything the confederate army was doing was right. I am not aware there is any such testimony before the committee. I wish to know whether that is the gentleman's comment, or is he stating that as actual testimony?

Mr. DAWES. I read the words taken from the book. If the gentleman will please to turn to page 97 of the book he can look over me while I read.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I ask the gentleman whether he means to argue—

Mr. DAWES. I have the floor.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I hope he will not refuse to answer my question.

Mr. DAWES. I will answer any question.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I wish to know whether the gentleman from Massachusetts does assert that the gentleman from Kentucky ever used the language which he imputes to him. I ask him in sincerity and desire a candid and precise answer.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, I read the precise answer, and I then commented upon it. If the gentleman had given me that attention which his own interest in the case should induce him to he would have seen that I read the testimony word for word. If he is not satisfied that I have done so let him turn to page 97. I commented upon what I thought was the force of these words. I will read them again. I will not rest under any imputation of having laid a straw at the door of that gentleman that the testimony does not bear me out in:

"Question. The speech which Mr. Brown made at Hebbardsville in 1865, was it not intensely disloyal?"

"Answer. That is what I thought about it. I considered it disloyal. I never heard him say that the South had done anything but what was perfectly right, or that the Federal Government had done anything but what was wrong."

That is the testimony. I suppose he discussed public affairs in that speech, and I mean to say that the testimony of this witness is that Mr. Brown took the ground that the acts of this Government were wrong and that the acts of the South were right. If he discussed that question he must have discussed it just as I stated or else the witness was mistaken.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Allow me to ask this further question: if it is not unfair to charge him with saying everything is wrong because a witness comes before the committee and swears he did not hear him say that anything was wrong? Is it fair to base such a charge upon such testimony?

Mr. DAWES. Of course the House will pass upon the fairness of my remarks. But I say it is perfectly fair to say that this witness meant to testify that whatever Mr. Brown did say about the Federal Government it was all wrong, and whatever he did say about the South it was all right.

Mr. TRIMBLE, of Kentucky. I desire to ask a question just here: whether or not that speech was made after the war commenced, and whether or not that same witness testified that he classed all the Democrats of Kentucky with the rebels.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, I have alluded to the fact that when Mr. Brown was asked if he did not act with the rebel party he answered by saying that after the war closed there was no longer any rebellion. Whether this witness classed the whole Democratic party with the rebels or not I do not now remember, but I do not. There are a great many Democrats whom I believe to be true patriots. Mr. Brown then put a question himself. I will read the question and answer:

"Question. In the first speech which you heard me make at Hebbardsville did I or not state that at the beginning of the war I opposed secession and made speeches all over my region of Kentucky discouraging enlistments in the confederate service?"

"Answer. You may possibly have said so, but I do not recollect."

"Question. Was there anything in that speech inflammatory or calculated to excite the minds of the people?"

"Answer. I thought there was. I am satisfied there was."

The next witness that I call to the stand, in answer to my colleague on the committee, [Mr. KERR,] is James McIntyre, on page 100:

"Question. Is it not notorious through the second district of Kentucky that Mr. Brown since 1861 has been a member of the disloyal party of Kentucky and has been acting in concert with it?"

"Answer. In my county, Muhlenburg, and in McLean county, so far as I have correspondents, and in a portion of Daviess, and, in fact, wherever his statements have been brought before the people, either in conversation or otherwise, the current opinion is that he was a rebel sympathizer; that his feelings and sympathies were for the success of the rebellion."

Mark you, I am not arraigning a man for his sympathy; I am answering the charge that I have misstated this testimony, and I am showing how utterly the subsequent course of Mr. Brown in Kentucky fails to relieve him from the act of which the most he can claim was that it admitted of two interpretations.

On page 94 is the testimony of H. S. Parks:

"Question. Is it not a notorious fact in the second congressional district of Kentucky, and particularly in the county of Henderson, that Mr. Brown is and has been disloyal to the Government of the United States?"

"Answer. All Union men there look upon him as belonging to that party."

I read now from the testimony of F. H. Little, page 92:

"Question. Did not Mr. Brown in that speech say that in 1861 and up to the close of the war he had been a rebel, but that the confederate soldier had stacked his gun and furled his banner, and there was no longer any rebels?"

"Answer. I think there was something of that kind said."

"Question. Did Mr. Brown deny in that speech that he had been a rebel?"

"Answer. I do not know that he did."

"Question. Was it not directly charged upon him that he had been?"

"Answer. I think you charged him with it. I heard his reply, but I do not think he alluded to it."

"Question. Was or was not Mr. Brown asked whether he intended that letter to refer alike to confederate and Union soldiers?"

"Answer. I think he was."

"Question. Did he not decline to answer the question?"

"Answer. I do not know that he declined to answer it. I heard no reply."

"By Mr. SCOTFIELD:

"Question. How was that question put?"

"Answer. I think it was put by Mr. Smith."

"Question. To be answered immediately, or in the course of Mr. Brown's reply?"

"Answer. My understanding was that Mr. Brown was expected to reply to it in his speech. He had fifteen minutes for reply."

I come next to the testimony of Thomas F. Cheaney:

"Question. Did Mr. Brown remain in the town of Henderson during the entire war?"

"Answer. Yes, sir; that was his home from some time in 1861."

"Question. Do you not recollect of his having left Henderson on one occasion and gone to New York and Canada?"

"Answer. I recollect hearing of it. I do not know of it personally. I was a farmer and lived some twelve miles from the town, which I seldom visited."

"Question. In what year did it occur?"

"Answer. I think it was in 1863 or 1864."

"Question. Did not Mr. Brown say in those conversations that although he opposed secession he would throw his destiny with the South; that as she had seceded he would go with her, and was in favor of the people of Kentucky doing so?"

"Answer. I think he expressed himself in that way, that he would prefer a dissolution of the Union to the policy of the Administration."

Here is the testimony of Joseph I. Landes, in document No. 6, a report with accompanying papers made at the July session. On page 23:

"Question. Did you or not hear a discussion between Hon. John Young Brown and Hon. B. C. Ritter, candidates for Congress, some time in April, 1867, at Hopkinsville, Kentucky?"

"Answer. I did."

"Question. Please state how the announcement by Mr. Brown, in the discussion aforesaid, of his authorship of said letter, was received by his political friends in hearing, and what (from your knowledge of those you observed) was the political standing of those friends during the late war?"

"Answer. At the time above stated Mr. Brown's avowal of his authorship of the letter aforesaid was received by a portion of the audience with vociferous applause. My impression and best recollection is that most of those who on that occasion so loudly manifested their approval of the sentiments expressed in that letter were rebels during the war; or, if not actually engaged in the rebellion, were its most earnest advocates and sympathizers."

"I have examined the printed copy of said letter, and refer to it as attached by Mr. Landes, and marked with his signature, as a part of my deposition. In a discussion which I had in this place, early in April of this year, between Mr. Brown and his then only opponent, Mr. Ritter, Mr. Brown, in answer to Mr. Ritter's inquiry, avowed its authorship, amid the wildest cheers of his admiring friends in the audience. No one of those friends that I observed had for a long time been accused of any sympathy for the Government in its arduous trial of war, and many of them I know to be late rebel soldiers; all were rebel in sentiment, so far as I knew, and I scanned the crowd as closely as was necessary to ascertain this. Hon. John Young Brown was known and recognized during the whole canvass as having been a rebel sympathizer; that gave him applause here and was the basis of his strength, but of those who voted for him in this county I doubt if there were ten men who could truthfully claim to be Union men. I never heard him express a regret for having written the letter, and, from the manner in which it was treated, I entertain no doubt that he regarded it as perhaps his most efficient campaign document. It certainly did him no injury here with his friends."

Mr. KERR. I desire to inquire of my colleague on the committee whether the evidence which he has just now been reading is taken from the record in this case or from a former report?

Mr. DAWES. From the report that preceded this.

Mr. KERR. Then I desire to ask the gentleman the further question, whether he does not know that that publication—I will not call it evidence, because it is not evidence—does not constitute any part of the record in this case at all, is not in the evidence and was not in the proof, because it was not taken according to law?

Mr. DAWES. No, sir; I do not know that.

Mr. KERR. You do not know it?

Mr. DAWES. I do know that I read from depositions taken on notice to Mr. Brown, filed here and made the basis of one of the reports and published for the use of the House.

Mr. KERR. I desire to ask the gentleman one further question and then I will not ask him any more. I desire to ask him if it is not true that that from which he has just read is entirely ex parte evidence, taken long before this controversy commenced in the form in which it is now before the House, and taken as the basis on which a charge of disloyalty was made against Mr. Brown?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Say whether it is so or is not.

Mr. KERR. I say that it is so, and that it therefore constitutes no part of this case.

Mr. DAWES. I will state precisely the facts of the case. It is taken from depositions by interrogatories upon notice served upon Mr. Brown, which were brought here in July, and upon which a report was made to this House by the Committee of Elections; and it was published as the evidence upon which that report was based.

Now, I pass over the first charge in this case made by the gentleman from Indiana against me, that I have interpolated into the record. I think I have answered that count in his indictment. But upon the conclusion of that charge the gentleman announces that he was not yet done with me. He says:

"Mr. Speaker, I have not yet done with my honorable friend, the chairman of this committee. I now invite the attention of this House and his attention to some of the authorities which it was his pleasure to present before the House on Friday for the purpose of maintaining or supporting the proposition of constitutional law he then laid down. He undertook to inform this House that it possesses the constitutional right to exclude whom it pleases if the public safety requires it. He laid down the broad doctrine, not in terms but in legal effect, that the guide which this House must follow in the adjudication of this case must be its own will. It has but to consider what the public welfare requires, what the public safety requires, what the public interests demand, and then to do it; and in order to sustain that startling proposition, unquestionably, revolutionarily, he cited two or three authorities."

And then my distinguished friend from Indiana charges me with an attempt to deceive this House by quoting and misquoting as authorities, in support of what he says was my proposition, the great names of Hamilton and Madison in the Federalist; and then growing, as he did before, righteously indignant—

Mr. KERR. Allow me to interrupt the gentleman a moment.

Mr. DAWES. My friend will excuse me if I decline to be interrupted just now. I suppose when the gentleman took me up in that way it troubled him just as much as he wanted to be troubled; and I felt it incumbent upon me, after his paying his respects to me in this kind way, to respond to him. He grew righteously indignant, and broke out in this strain—

Mr. KERR. I never charged the gentleman from Massachusetts with misquoting authorities.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, either the gentleman from Indiana or myself has the floor. Let us understand how that is.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] is entitled to the floor. Does he decline to be interrupted by any one?

Mr. DAWES. No, sir; I do not say that. But when I intimate to a gentleman that I cannot be interrupted just at this time I mean what I say. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. KERR] went on to say:

"Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask every intelligent gentleman on this floor, every fair-minded lawyer in this House or this country, if it is fair, if it is just in this way and by this means to undertake to control the judgment of a court and jury of which the gentleman who uses this language in this way is a member and a part?"

Now, mark what the gentleman says:

"It is, perhaps, pardonable for lawyers, pleading before courts and juries, where the court and the jury alone are charged with judicial functions and duties, and other lawyers are watching to catch and expose their tricks and errors, to indulge in this kind of argument, this kind of arts, to give unjust support to untenable propositions; but is it pardonable, is it justifiable in circumstances like those which surround us to-day?"

You will observe, Mr. Speaker, that he reserves the right to cheat a court and jury and indulge in tricks in certain cases. But only for the purposes of this case is he desirous of enforcing the rule of fair dealing. He says that tricks are perhaps pardonable, where men are on the watch to catch those who use them. But, sir, I deny the whole charge. There is no more foundation for it than there is for the miserable rule of ethics here advanced. I never misquoted the authorities for this proceeding. I said in the outset that this case was without precedent. In the first words uttered by me upon this floor in this case, I said:

"This proceeding, Mr. Speaker, is not only unusual, but it is without precedent in the history of the Government."

I had, therefore, no precedents to cite. What further did I say?

"Sir, I admit for myself—every other gentleman, of course, may come to any other conclusion that he finds the Constitution to authorize him in coming to—I admit that there is no express authority in this Government under the Constitution to exclude from Congress a man for the offense here charged."

I could not cite any "express authority" after this admission, for I confessed I had none to cite.

But, Mr. Speaker, does not the gentleman understand the difference between an authority and a principle; I attempted, with what success it is not for me to say, to summon to my aid the great names of Hamilton and Madison

Ho. OF REPS.

Kentucky Election—Mr. Dawes.

40TH CONG....2D SESS.

in their expositions of the great principles and powers of our Government; and from them I deduced—does the gentleman understand what that means—an argument that we had the power I had claimed. These are the words I used:

"But, Mr. Speaker, there is a further consideration underlying this matter, and that is this: the Government of the United States is bound to preserve itself. It is clothed with the power, and in the absence of any inhibition of means."

Is this laying down the broad doctrine that the guide this House must follow in the adjudication must be its own will?

"It is clothed with the power, and in the absence of any inhibition of means, it is authorized to avail itself of all means necessary or proper contributing to the end to preserve itself. I think these are propositions which do not admit of doubt. When the Government is once established, and does not limit its own duration, and does not limit its own means of self-preservation, it is authorized by all the laws of human society and government to resort to all means whatever they are that will contribute to that end."

"Mr. Speaker, this was the view of the framers of the Constitution themselves."

That, in the absence of any inhibition of means, they were empowered to resort to all the means calculated to preserve the existence of the nation.

"This was the view of Hamilton, the greatest of all those who discussed the powers and participated in the framing of the Constitution, and I beg the House to do me the honor to listen to the views of Mr. Hamilton on this point."

I then read from the twenty-third number of the Federalist a statement of fundamental principles, universal in their application, on which the life of the nation rests. I will read them again, and gentlemen may observe whether Mr. Hamilton did not utter them as fundamental truths, universal in their application, and essential to the existence of the Government:

"The circumstances that endanger the safety of nations are infinite; and for this reason no constitutional shackles can wisely be imposed on the power to which the care of it is committed. This power ought to be coextensive with all the possible combinations of such circumstances; and ought to be under the direction of the same councils which are appointed to preside over the common defense."

This is one of those truths which, to a correct and unprejudiced mind, carries its own evidence along with it, and may be obscured but cannot be made plainer, by argument or reasoning. It rests upon axioms."

What is an axiom? Is it an authority—a case cited, running on all fours, as the lawyers say in a justice's court?

"It rests upon axioms as simple as they are universal: the means ought to be proportionate to the end, the persons from whose agency the attainment of any end is expected ought to possess the means by which it is to be attained."

"Whether there ought to be a Federal Government intrusted with the care of the common defense is a question, in the first instance, open to discussion; but the moment it is decided in the affirmative it will follow that that Government ought to be clothed with all the powers requisite to the complete execution of its trust. And unless it can be shown that the circumstances which may affect the public safety are reducible within certain determinable limits—unless the contrary of this position can be fairly and rationally disputed, it must be admitted as a necessary consequence that there can be no limitation of that authority which is to provide for the defense and protection of the community in any matter essential to its efficacy."

And, sir, after having read these truths, foundation-stones upon which is reared the Republic itself, it did not occur to me that it was necessary to read the title affixed to the article in the edition I read from by somebody, whether Mr. Hamilton or not I do not know, showing that the subject under consideration was "the necessity of a government at least equally energetic with the one proposed." Nor did it occur to me that it was necessary to inform the House that these great truths were separated by merely a semicolon from the particular branch of power which had called out their utterance.

Sir, I think the mind that would fail to comprehend and grapple the sublime truths here uttered and would stick at a semicolon would repose with ease on a pin head, and there I would leave it undisturbed were there not occasion to follow it a little further. The gentleman says he is not done with me, and, of course, I cannot leave him. He says:

"But I am not yet done. The honorable gentleman further invited the attention of the House to a citation or two from another of the great luminaries of our early laws and Constitution and history, John Marshall, and from his opinion in the case of McCulloch vs. The State of Maryland he undertakes to find comfort, to find support, to find some sort of justification, for what is proposed to be done here."

"Mr. Speaker, I say without fear of contradiction—I say it to every lawyer upon this floor, I say it to the honorable gentleman himself, and I say it with the utmost confidence—that there cannot be found in that great opinion one solitary line of authority, one single syllable of countenance or encouragement even, for this kind of doctrine; not one."

That is modest, to say the least, Mr. Speaker; and a man ought to be pretty certain he knows what he is talking about before he thus heralds his own views. Now let us see how accurately he has studied that case. He says:

"What did that opinion decide? It decided these three points: that the National Bank of the United States, organized in 1811, I believe, involved a constitutional exercise of the power of Congress; that that bank had a right to organize a branch in the State of Maryland; and that the State of Maryland had no right to tax that branch. That is what that case decided, and that is all that the case decided."

That is pretty good, since Chief Justice Marshall, who delivered that opinion, had been dead going on ten years in 1841, and there has not been a bank chartered by the United States since 1816, and the decision itself was given in 1819. But this is of small consequence, Mr. Speaker, only showing that the report itself was either not read at all or was not comprehended when I was arraigned for misquoting it. It is only equalled by the announcement that it was the absence of the Constitution of the United States which caused André to be hung, because he had Arnold's treason in his boot.

But, sir, what is of more consequence is the attempt to narrow and belittle this great discourse of Chief Justice Marshall upon the constitutional powers of this Government to simply an authority in a tax case. Take these truths, sir, which I quoted the other day, and tell me how large is the mind, how broad and comprehensive the statesmanship, that attempts to shrivel them up to a simple authority upon the legality of a tax:

"The Government which has a right to do an act, and has imposed on it the duty of performing that act, must, according to the dictates of reason, be allowed to select the means; and those who contend that it may not select any appropriate means, that one particular mode of effecting the object is excepted, take upon themselves the burden of establishing that exception."

"Let the end be legitimate, let it be within the scope of the Constitution, and all means which are appropriate, which are plainly adapted to that end, which are not prohibited, but consist with the letter and spirit of the Constitution, are constitutional."

Does anybody but the gentleman from Indiana suppose that the following, quoted by me from the same great source, is to be confined in its application to a tax case?

"The powers vested in Congress may certainly be carried into execution without prescribing an oath of office. The power to exact this security for the faithful performance of duty is not given, nor is it indispensably necessary. The different departments may be established, taxes may be imposed and collected, and money may be borrowed, without requiring an oath of office. It might be argued with as much plausibility as other incidental powers have been assailed that the convention was not unmindful of this subject. The oath which might be exacted—that of fidelity to the Constitution—is prescribed, and no other can be required. Yet he would be charged with insanity who should contend that the Legislature might not superadd to the oath directed by the Constitution such other oath of office as its wisdom might suggest."

Now take the Rhode Island case of Luther vs. Borden; which the gentleman in his argument on the reconstruction bill brought before this House, and read as an authority, I suppose, and as laying down fundamental principles. That was a simple case of trespass quare clausum, and according to his rule and doctrine it is one to be read only in a justices' court at the cross-roads in a two-dollar trespass case. And in the same way the great case of Marbury vs. Mad- ison is to be used only when one man will not give up another man's justice's commission.

Take that great debate between Webster and Hayne which took place on a resolution not to sell the public lands, but in which Mr. Webster "ground to impalpable powder the doctrine of nullification," and drove it from the forum of reason to the wager of battle and to annihilation. According to the gentleman from Indiana it is only to be referred to whenever my distinguished friend, the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, [Mr. JULIAN,] proposes a land grant to some railroad, and antagonizes with the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN,]

Take the Garland case, and all the great principles discussed on the one side and the other are confined, according to the gentleman from Indiana, to the question whether a man has a right to practice in a court of justice? Sir, these great discourses on the fundamental powers of the Government, these magnificent discussions out of which were evolved the great truths upon which the Government rests, as foundation stones, are not to be beshriveled and dwarfed to any such mean and pitiful purposes. They are the armory from which those who care to defend the life of the nation in this great struggle have drawn weapons sufficient to meet all its foes in the forum or in the field.

But, sir, I beg leave to call the attention of the House to one other point submitted by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] and the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. KERR.] The gentleman from Kentucky proposes to rescue the gentleman who claims this seat from the force of the law of 1832, which prescribes the oath of office, and from the force of all law under the Constitution by saying that he is no officer under this Government. The gentleman from Kentucky says:

"Since the dismissal of the impeachment against Senator Blount, of Tennessee, himself one of the signers of the Constitution, by the Senate of the United States, upon the sole ground that a member of Congress was not an officer of the United States, but one placed in this Hall by the people of his State or district as their agent and representative, no man and no authority has ever treated a member of Congress as an officer of the United States."

Well, sir, since the authority of the Senate in the case of the impeachment against Senator Blount, declaring by a vote of 14 to 11 that he was not such an officer of the Government as rendered him liable to impeachment by that body, the gentleman says no man or authority has ever asserted that a member of Congress is an officer of the United States. Yet that same Senate, three years ago, by a vote of 28 to 11, decided the other way, and that this law did apply to a Senator; so that if there was any authority in the vote of the Senate that Mr. Blount was not deemed such an officer as could be impeached and tried by that body, then the same body has reversed that decision by a vote very much larger than that by which it asserted it.

The gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. KERR,] however, goes further, and insists upon it that he is not an officer under this Government, but he is a State officer. The gentleman says:

"Now, what are offices under the United States? Do we hold office here under the United States? Does the gentleman before me hold an office under the United States? Does any gentleman in the other end of the Capitol hold an office under the United States? Does any gentleman on that side of the House contend or admit that he sits here as an officer of the Federal Government, as holding an office under the Federal Government?"

Mr. Speaker, where is the office created? In the Constitution of the United States. Where are the terms of qualification for it prescribed? In the Constitution of the United States. Where are times, places, and manner of election prescribed? In the Constitution of the United States. Where is the qualification of the voter for a member of Congress prescribed? In the Constitution of the United States? Take this Constitution of the United States away and it falls in an instant. The officer draws the breath of life from it. Every function which he performs is prescribed in it. No State officer or State Legislature can add to or take from any function of his, or add one jot or tittle to or take the breadth of a hair from the qualifications prescribed in the Constitution. He is, so far as the Constitution and laws are concerned, as independent of the State as if he were a foreigner. Here in the Constitution the length, breadth, height, and depth of all power, duty, and obligation of a Representative begin and end—and, yet, we are told that he is no officer under this Government!

One word more. I assume that the gentleman from Kentucky and the gentleman from Indiana would expel a man from this House if he were guilty of treason, although I do not know that either of them has thus said in so many words. If I misstate them in this argument I yield for a correction. I assume that both of them would do it. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] put his idea of it in this form:

"The power to expel a member, two thirds voting therefor, is the only protection (and that is ample) against improper persons, under that law, holding seats in this body. While the right of a Representative to hold the position to which he has been chosen by his people, unless two thirds of this House expel him therefrom, is equally clear."

If he has a right to enter this body notwithstanding disloyalty, what right have we to expel him afterward for that disloyalty? And if we have a right to expel him for disloyalty, have we not a right to keep him out for the same disloyalty?

But assuming, Mr. Speaker, that both these gentlemen would expel a man from this House if he were a traitor, I desire to inquire what for? Why would they expel a man from this House if he were a traitor? To punish him? Certainly not, for that is not the punishment prescribed for treason. Is it to overawe and restrain treason? That is puerile and ridiculous. What is it for? There is no other reason assignable except for the public safety. If I misjudge these gentlemen I want to know it. If they would not expel a man for treason from this House, or would not expel him from it because the public safety demands it, I want to know for what they would expel him? Now, sir, if it is because the public safety demands the expulsion of the man, I would like to inquire if the measure of the danger to the public safety must not govern and limit the means by which you insure that safety? Hamilton says that the means must be adequate to the end. If it is unsafe to intrust the life of the nation to the keeping of traitors in this Hall by permitting them to remain in their seats here, is it not equally unsafe to admit them into those seats? Is not the public safety jeopardized by the very means thus resorted to—by the very admission of these men to their seats? If the public safety calls upon us to expel a man after he has put himself into his seat because he has the life of the nation in his keeping, is not the public safety regarded more, is not the public safer by not letting him into the seat at all? The custody of the citadel is intrusted to your hands; the enemy approaches; you are bound to use all the means that are required to make that citadel safe. Are you to admit the enemy within the walls and then drive him out? Or are you rather to consult the highest safety of the citadel itself by keeping him out?

Sir, the homely verse into which the speech of Colonel Titus was put two hundred years ago in the British Parliament, when Charles II undertook to batter down the doors of the House of Commons and trample under his feet the liberties of England, are a better commentary upon that position than anything I can say:

"I hear a lion in the lobby roar!
Say, Mr. Speaker, shall we shut the door
And keep him out, or shall we let him in
To try if we can turn him out again?"

I leave this doctrine of public safety there.

Mr. Speaker, one word more and I will leave the question with the House. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. KEAR] says that the evidence is defective, that it is not competent, that written words are not evidence of treason. I quote his language:

"I assume without fear of contradiction from a single respectable authority in this or any other country that a man's mere written words can never constitute the crime of treason. It is so laid down in every respectable text-book in the country. It is the established and accepted law of this land to-day."

Well, Mr. Speaker, I have no occasion to controvert that doctrine to-day. Neither the report of the committee nor the discussion rests upon any claim in conflict with it, and therefore, I will not stop to inquire whether it be law or not. But I have still to ask, may not mere written words be evidence of treason? That is what the report says, and it says nothing more. The report has not arraigned this gentleman for writing the letter, and the gentlemen who have come to his support have fallen into the broad mistake that he is arraigned here for writing this letter. Not so. The evidence relied upon in support of the charge of disloyalty against Mr. Brown is contained in the letter. If it be true that mere written words cannot be evidence of treason, then no general order issued from headquarters by Robert E. Lee at the battles of Antietam or Gettysburg would be evidence of treason; no message of Jeff. Davis to the rebel congress would contain evidence of treason; no death-warrant issued by him to the jailors at Andersonville or Libby prison for the blood of a Union soldier would be evidence of treason, and no dying confession of Barksdale on the field of battle would be evidence of his treason.

Sir, the evidence is in the letter. The letter states that Mr. Brown went about his district inciting men by his words, by the encouragement he gave them, and by his declarations to enter the confederate army, and to deter them from entering the Union army by his threats of assassination, which he says in this letter he frequently publicly and privately made all about his district.

That is what he is arraigned here for, and I pray him, and those who speak for him, to answer that. He is arraigned here because he confesses in this letter that at a time when the public mind was all alive in Kentucky; when the young men were inquiring which side they should take in the conflict then coming upon the country; when the young men were inquiring whether they should enroll themselves under the stars and the stripes, or whether they should join their fortunes with the rebellion; when the whole southern sky was lurid with the flames of civil war, he says in this letter that he went to them and told them that if they joined the army of the Republic they ought to be, and he hoped they would be, shot down before they left the State.

And that leads me to inquire what had the mere leaving the State to do with Kentucky neutrality? It seems to me that all anxiety concerning Kentucky neutrality should cease with the limits of Kentucky; and that leaving it would not disturb that neutrality. But no; not only shall Kentucky fold her arms in this great struggle, but if any of her sons, too ardent in their patriotism to continue in this quiescent state while the whole Union was in the throes of civil war, should desire to actually assist his Government beyond the borders of Kentucky, Mr. Brown says he told them that if they stepped beyond the limits of the State, if they lifted a hand in aid of the Republic in its death struggle, they ought to be, and he hoped they would be, shot down. That is what he confesses he did. The letter is not the treason itself, but it is the evidence of the treason.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DAWES. I hope the gentleman will excuse me if I do not yield now.

Sir, the country will mark the tenderness with which these disloyal acts have been commented upon by gentlemen on the other side. And the people will not fail to observe that it was not always so, even in these quarters. There was a time when treason was odious with these men. There was a time, even in Kentucky, when voices were raised condemning letters containing evidences of treason not quite so palpable as this, that sound strange now by the side of the words used by the gentleman from Indiana and the gentleman from Kentucky.

I will first read a little confession of treason from another letter, and which called out the discussion to which I am about to allude. Before the rebels fired upon Fort Sumter, before the President of the United States had called upon Kentucky for men and arms, when no actual outbreak had yet been perpetrated, a member of the Senate wrote these words:

WASHINGTON, March 1, 1861.

MY DEAR SIR: Allow me to introduce to your acquaintance my friend Thomas B. Lincoln, of Texas. He visits your capital mainly to dispose of what he regards a great improvement in fire-arms. I recommend him to your favorable consideration as a gentleman of the first respectability, and reliable in every respect.

Very truly, yours, JESSE D. BRIGHT.
To His Excellency JEFFERSON DAVIS,
President of the Confederation of States.

In regard to that letter, the present Chief Magistrate of the United States, then a Senator, used these words, referring to subsequent acts throwing light upon the letter:

"Then, Mr. President, what has been the bearing and the conduct of the Senator from Indiana since? I desire it to be understood that I refer to him in no unkindness, for God knows I bear him none; but my duty I will perform. 'Duties are mine, consequences are God's.' What has been the Senator's bearing generally? Have you heard of his being in the field? Have you heard of his voice and his influence being raised for his bleeding and distracted country? Has his influence been brought to bear officially, socially, politically, or in any respect, for the suppression of the rebellion? If so, I am unaware of it. Where is the evidence of devotion to his country in his speeches and in his votes? Where the evidence of the disposition on his part to overthrow and put down the rebellion? I have been told, Mr. President, by honorable gentlemen, as an evidence of the Senator's devotion to his country and his great opposition to this southern movement, that they heard him, and perhaps with tears in his eyes, remonstrate with the leaders of the rebellion that they should not leave him here in the Senate, or that they should not persist in their course after the relations that had existed between them and him and the other Democrats of the country; that he thought they were treating him badly.

"This was the kind of remonstrance he made. Be it so. I am willing to give the Senator credit for all he is entitled to, and I would to God I could credit him with more.

"But do Senators remember that when this battle was being fought in the Senate I stood here on this side, solitary and alone, on the 19th day of December, 1860, and proclaimed that the Government was at an end if you denied it the power to enforce its laws? I declared then that a Government which had not the power to coerce obedience on the part of those who violated the law was no Government at all, and had failed to carry out the objects of its creation, and was, ipso facto, dissolved. When I stood on this floor and fought the battle for the supremacy of the Constitution and the enforcement of the laws has the Senate forgotten that a bevy of conspirators gathered in from the other House, and that those who were here crowded around, with frowns and scowls and expressions of indignation and contempt toward me, because I dared to raise my feeble voice in vindication of the Constitution and the enforcement of the laws of the Union? Have you forgotten the taunts, the jeers, the derisive remarks, the contemptuous expressions that were indulged in? If you have I have not. If the Senator felt such great reluctance at the departure from the Senate of the chiefs of the rebellion, I should have been glad to receive one encouraging smile from him when I was fighting the battles of the country. I did not receive one encouraging expression; I received not a single sustaining look. It would have been peculiarly encouraging to me, under the circumstances, to be greeted and encouraged by one of the Senator's talents and long standing in public life; but he was cold as an iceberg, and I stood solitary and alone amid the gang of conspirators that had gathered around me."

Now, sir, the distinguished Senator [Mr. DAVIS] who now represents the State of Kentucky in the Senate used this language in reference to the same proceeding:

"Mr. President, these authorities prove conclusively that we are bound now, in giving our judgment in this case, by no positive principle of law,

HO. OF REPS.

Contested Election—Mr. Brown.

There is and can be no controversy as to the proofs in the cause, and therefore I will make no remark on the law of testimony that would apply to the case, if there was any such controversy. The principle deduced from the authorities is this: there is no common law, no statutory law, there is no parliamentary law, that binds the Senate to any particular definition of crime or offense in acting in this or any other case of the kind. On the contrary, as these authorities establish, it is a matter coming within the discretion of the tribunal trying the Senator. They establish this general principle, that where the evidence makes out a case against him which, in the judgment of the triers, unfits him for his parliamentary duties, it is their duty to expel him.

"When this great Government and country have been in the throes of this mighty rebellion; when no man has been able to say whether to-morrow's sun would shine upon the reestablishment or the dissolution of the Union, and whether the Government would ever rally energy and power and means and men enough to reconstruct it; when the President proposes to Congress, the law-making power, a series of measures to procure the means to enable him to raise and to equip armies for the purpose, not of subjugating the States, but of compelling obedience to the laws; when the gentleman either votes against every such proposition or does not vote for it, and offers no measure, no proposition, himself as a substitute for the various propositions the President has made; when he declares in the most explicit language, and reiterates it, reiterates it here upon this floor while he is under trial, 'I am opposed to the whole system of coercing these States, and will not vote a dollar nor a man nor a gun to the President of the United States to crush out this rebellion!'"

Does that sound like anything in this letter of Mr. Brown?

"I ask if he does not demonstrate to the world, and beyond all doubt, that he is an unfit Senator in the present great exigency of the country, and that he ought to be removed from his seat? I think he does."

Sir, how do my friends on the other side treat this case to-day?

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] gently criticises this confession of disloyalty as simply "a hasty letter, and, if you please"—yes, mark how softly it is drawn—"if you please, ill-considered language." And the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. KERR], quite as moderate, says, "I admit that it was imprudent." What an admission! Imprudent, indeed, to declare that—

"Not one man or one dollar will Kentucky furnish Lincoln to aid him in his unholy war against the South. If this northern army shall attempt to cross our borders we will resist it unto the death; and if one man shall be found in our Commonwealth to volunteer to join them he ought to, and I believe will be, shot down before he leaves the State."

"I admit," says the gentleman from Indiana, "that it was imprudent, it was passionate, to write that letter, to put his words in such a form." Sir, the poet says that—

"Vice is a monster of so frightful mien,
As, to be hated, needs but to be seen;
But seen too oft, familiar with her face,
We first endure, then pity, then embrace."

Has it come to be thus with treason, not a vice merely, but the highest crime against country and God? Is it true of these men that treason was once a "monster of so frightful mien, as, to be hated, needs but to be seen?" And has it come to this, that, having seen it too oft and become familiar with its face, they have first endured, then pitied, then embraced?

This, sir, is no new proposition. The doctrine that this House had the right and the power and the duty incumbent upon it to exclude disloyal men from seats on this floor has been held by all parties ever since the war ended. All parties have asserted it and defended it. It has been part and parcel of every policy proposed or adopted on all sides of this House. It was proposed in the early part of this attempt to reconstruct and build up States on the ashes of this rebellion.

The President of the United States, in the first message he sent to this House, in the first year of his Administration, in answer and in refutation of the charge against his policy that it would admit rebels upon this floor, set forth the very proposition now before this House and called upon us to sustain it. I will read it from his very first message to this House:

"In the admission of Senators and Representatives from all of the States there can be no just ground of apprehension that persons who are disloyal will be clothed with the powers of legislation, for this could not happen when the Constitution and the laws are enforced by a vigilant and faithful Congress; each House is made the judge of the election, qualifications, and returns of its own members; and may, with the concurrence of two thirds, expel a member. When a Senator or Representative presents his certificate of election he may at once be admitted or rejected; or should there be any question as to his eligibility, his credentials may be referred for investigation to the appropriate committee." If admitted to a seat it must be upon evidence satisfactory to the House of which he thus becomes a member that he possesses the requisite constitutional and legal qualifications. If refused admission as a member, for want of due allegiance to the Government, and returned to his constituents, they are admonished that none but persons loyal to the United States will be allowed a voice in the legislative councils of the nation, and the political power and moral influence of Congress are thus effectively exerted in the interest of loyalty to the Government of the United States and fidelity to the Union."

There is the identical recognition of authority; and after two years of experience on his part and on the part of Congress in an effort to reconstruct the rebel States he sent into this House, on the 2d of March last, a veto message, in which he repeats, word for word, the very language I have read; and it so commended itself to my distinguished friend from Indiana [Mr. KERR] that he voted to sustain him in it, and so did all his political friends. Only three or four days since the distinguished Democratic Senator from Indiana, [Mr. HENDRICKS,] speaking of the law that prescribes the oath of office, used this language:

"As I participated somewhat in the debate on Governor Thomas's case, and as I was a member of the committee who reported upon that case, perhaps the Senator may refer to my views upon that question; and if so he does not correctly state them. My views upon the constitutionality of that law were expressed in the Senate some two or three years ago; but always when the question has been before the Senate I have said this: that while that law remained upon the statute-book I should not vote to allow any man to take his seat if in taking that seat he had to swear falsely in that oath; that I thought such a man ought not to be admitted."

Now, sir, what are the qualifications of a member? The Constitution says:

"No person shall be a Representative who shall not have attained the age of twenty-five years, and been seven years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not when elected be an inhabitant of that State in which he shall be chosen."

Here it ends. These qualifications a Representative must have. It speaks of no disqualifications. Do any exist? Can any be created by statute?

I understand the gentleman from Indiana to say there is the beginning and the end of the matter. Suppose an insane man should present himself at the bar of this House, twenty-five years old, and seven years a citizen of the United States, and a resident of Kentucky, the gentleman from Indiana would not administer the oath to him. Suppose he were non compos, I submit to the gentleman it would be an absurdity; and he would never say in the face of that absurdity admit him to take the oath of office. Suppose he attempted to bribe a judge; the act of 1793 states that conviction therefor shall disqualify him. Suppose he had been a member and was convicted of having received a bribe; the statute of 1853 says that shall disqualify him from taking the seat, although he may be qualified in all other respects.

The act of July 17, 1862, enacts as follows—its last two sections:

"SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That if any person shall hereafter incite, set on foot, or assist, or engage in any rebellion or insurrection against the authority of the United States or the laws thereof, or shall give aid or comfort thereto, or shall engage in or give aid and comfort to any such existing rebellion or insurrection, and be convicted thereof, such person shall be punished by imprisonment for a period not exceeding ten years, or by a fine not exceeding $10,000, and by the liberation of all his slaves, if any he have, or by both of said punishments, at the discretion of the court."

"SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That every person guilty of either of the offenses described in this act, shall be forever incapable and disqualified to hold any office under the United States."

And yet the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. KERR] says that it begins and ends with the three qualifications expressed in the Constitution. You will observe, Mr. Speaker, that this last statute is unlike the two older ones I have cited. They make conviction work a disqualification. This says that any one guilty—not convicted of, but guilty—of any of the offenses described, shall be forever incapable and disqualified to hold any office under the United States. Why this change? Necessity, the public safety, is the answer. No State that would elect a man to this high trust who had been guilty of these offenses would ever convict him. Therefore, if you waited for a conviction you would wait in vain. You would leave the door open; the traitor would enter, and the Government would fall.

Now, let us follow the requirements of this statute. A man presents himself at the bar of this House and demands to be sworn in. He is charged at the threshold with having committed some one of these offenses. How are you to determine whether he is guilty or not without referring his case to a committee, to examine the facts and report, and then upon their report taking action? That is just exactly what we ask here—just exactly what we are doing to-day.

One word more. By the fourteenth article of amendment to the Constitution this gentleman is excluded by the very words of it, he having heretofore taken an oath as a member of Congress. The third section of that article is in these words:

"SEC. 3. No person shall be a Senator or Representative in Congress, or elector of President or Vice President, or hold any office, civil or military, under the United States, or under any State, who, having previously taken an oath as a member of Congress, or as an officer of the United States, or as a member of any State Legislature, or as an executive or judicial officer of any State, to support the Constitution of the United States, shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same, or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof. But Congress may, by a vote of two thirds of each House, remove such disability."

Now, sir, to those of us who believe that that fourteenth article is already a part of the Constitution there is an express inhibition upon this man contained in that article. I do not care to take the time of the House in discussing the question whether it is or is not a part of the Constitution. I plant myself upon the Constitution without amendment. I hold that in its life blood there is power to protect itself by all means not prohibited and adequate to the end. Sir, the glory of the Constitution, that for which it will shine out in all coming time with lustre unsurpassed, is, that though its framers saw not in the distant future this great rebellion of eleven States to overthrow it, this mighty internal war convulsing the nation, yet in the wisdom which God gave them they so framed that instrument that it has proved before the world sufficient for every emergency, for every trial, for every crisis. It has outriden the storm, and if we are true to the high behests of the hour it will surely enter the haven of peace and security.

Contested Election.

SPEECH OF HON. J. YOUNG BROWN, OF KENTUCKY,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
February 13, 1868.

The House having under consideration the report of the Committee of Elections in the contested-election case of Smith vs. Brown, from the second congressional district of Kentucky—

Mr. BROWN (contestant) said:

MR. SPEAKER: I thank the House for the courtesy which has been extended to me on this occasion; and if there shall be any want of compactness and method in the thoughts and facts which I shall submit I plead, as my apology, lack of sufficient time for preparation. I have just reached the capital from my home in Kentucky. I came at the urgent request of my colleagues. I was here in July and again in December, and the Committee of Elections failing to report in my case, I returned to my home to resume the practice of my profession, leaving to others the discussion of my right of admission as a member on this floor. Added to diffidence and distrust of my ability I feel a sensitive reluctance in appearing as an advocate in my own case—a peculiar one—involving, as it does, the right of my constituents to representation upon this floor, involving my rights as a citizen and also affecting my personal honor. I was willing, indeed preferred, to confide my vindication to friends, and to such as have spoken in my behalf, or, I should rather say, in vindication of a great principle, I return my thanks and the thanks of my people for the zeal and ability which have distinguished their efforts. So full and exhaustive have been their arguments that nothing is left for me to say without a repetition of what you have heard. I said this case involved a principle—yes, a high, sacred, precious right, the right of a State in this Union—paying taxes—to be represented in the Halls of this national Legislature. That right in our system of government is the keystone that gives strength to the arch. Deny it, and the citizen sees the queen jewel that gives luster to the group torn from the tiara of his liberties. The rights of the people without it are a fable, a myth, a mockery. Our ancestors placed an unspeakable value upon it. They watchfully guarded and jealously loved it, for they won it by an incalculable cost of the brain-sweat and brow-sweat and heart-sweat of patriots. They enshrined it in the Constitution, there to remain inviolable for all time to come.

Mr. Speaker, I am here claiming my seat in the Fortieth Congress of the United States. I come commissioned and accredited by a certificate of election signed by the Governor of my State. I possess the qualifications required by the Constitution of the United States. I am twenty-five years of age; I have been more than seven years a citizen of the United States, being native born, and I was a resident of the State of Kentucky at the time of my election. Beyond these qualifications, in my judgment, this House has not the right to inquire; to them it has no power to add.

Then here I enter, in the name of my constituency, my solemn protest against the proceedings which have been instituted against me, as being without warrant in the Constitution. I claim that you cannot qualify my right of admission by other conditions than those prescribed in that instrument. But I do not propose to argue that question. It has already been presented with signal ability by my colleagues.

I stand here asking my seat, not only ready to take the oath prescribed by the Constitution, but also ready and willing to take the additional oath prescribed in the statute of 1862. When I offered myself as a candidate in my district for Congress I did so with the consciousness that I had the legal qualifications of a member, constitutional and statutory. A convention in my district was held, and to its decision were submitted the names of various gentlemen, three of whom have done honorable service in this body, and other names of distinction in Kentucky. I received the nomination. I had two competitors, the contestant here and another.

The election took place, and my majority over the contestant was over six thousand votes, and my majority over the other candidate approached eight thousand votes. I came here in July with my colleagues. My case and all the other cases from my State, save one, were referred to the Committee of Elections. I returned here in December. The committee failing to report, as I have said, I returned home to resume the business of my profession. I am here again, and confronted by the adverse report of the Committee of Elections, denying me my right to be admitted upon the ground of my disloyalty, that alleged disloyalty being based upon no act that I have ever done, upon no direct aid that I have ever given the enemies of my country, but upon a letter written by me upon the 18th of April, 1861.

Now, what were my surroundings when that letter was written? What were my personal political antecedents? What was the attitude and what was the feeling of my State? In March, 1861, when I returned from these Halls to my constituency, what was my political status? From one end of my district to the other my voice was raised in behalf of peace, imploring all those with whom I had any influence not to rush madly to arms.

What was the position of the Union party in Kentucky, with which I was identified? Upon the 8th of the January preceding, at one of the largest Union conventions ever held in the State of Kentucky, a resolution was passed, which I hold in my hands, and which was indorsed by the leading spirits of the State—men whose names are historic. They resolved that "a Union held together by the sword was not worth preserving."

Upon the 15th of April there issued the call of Mr. Lincoln upon the Governor of Kentucky for four regiments of militia. The Governor of Kentucky responded that he would send no troops. Did the Union party approve that action or not? I hold in my hand the address of the Union central committee, to which I invite the careful attention of this House. It was issued on the 17th of April, 1861. Who signed that address? No unknown or unimportant men. But there is appended to it the name of a gentleman who was afterward in Mr. Lincoln's Cabinet; the names of two gentlemen, distinguished then and distinguished since as the leading Union editors of the State; and what do they say:

"The Government of the Union has appealed to her (Kentucky) to furnish men to suppress the revolutionary combinations in the cotton States. She has refused; she has most wisely and justly refused. Seditious leaders in our midst now appeal to her to furnish men to uphold those combinations against the Government and the Union. Will she comply with this appeal? Ought she to comply with it? We answer, with emphasis, no."

"The present duty of Kentucky is to maintain her present independent position, taking sides not with the Government and not with the seceding States, but with the Union against them both, declaring her soil to be sacred from the hostile tread of either, and, if necessary, make the declaration good with her strong right arm." "What the future duty of Kentucky may be, we, of course, cannot with certainty foresee; but if the enterprise announced in the proclamation of the President should at any time hereafter assume the aspect of a war for the overthrow and subjugation of the seceding States, through the full assertion therein of the national jurisdiction by a standing military force, we do not hesitate to say that Kentucky should promptly unsheathe her sword in behalf of what will have then become her common cause."

Who said this? John H. Harvey, the distinguished editor of the Louisville Democrat; George D. Prentice, the distinguished editor of the Louisville Journal; Charles Ripley, Nathaniel Wolfe, Judge Bullock, James Speed, afterward in Mr. Lincoln's Cabinet, and a number of other distinguished Union leaders of my State.

It was upon the 17th of April, 1861, when these men declared that "if the enterprise announced in the proclamation of the President should at any time hereafter assume the aspect of a war for the overthrow and subjugation of the seceding States, Kentucky should promptly unsheathe her sword in behalf of what will then have become her common cause." Upon the 18th of April a Union convention was held in the city of Louisville, the largest Union convention ever held in that city, or, perhaps, in the State of Kentucky. I invite attention to an account of the proceedings of that convention, as published in the Louisville Democrat of the succeeding day:

Great Meeting—Kentucky to stand neutral in the Union—Holds off on both sides—Five thousand Union men—Eloquent speeches by Hon. James Guthrie, ex-Senator Dixon, Hon. John Young Brown, and Judge Bullock—Resolutions worthy of Kentucky.

"One of the grandest and largest public meetings ever held in Louisville filled the great east hall of the court-house last night, in response to a call for a sober expression as to the proper position for Kentucky to assume in the present crisis. It was a splendid meeting, both as regards numbers and material. It was a closely attentive and understanding assemblage of the best intelligence of the city, and its effect must be wide and wholesome. If the warring sections will but respect Kentucky's position and her advice all may yet be well, civil war averted, and peace restored. We were more than gratified with the meeting and its works. The stars and stripes were on both sides of the speaker's stand, and were frequently cheered as allusions to the national banner were made."

My exclusion here is based upon a letter dated April 18, 1861. I will read that letter:

ELIZABETHTOWN, April 18, 1861.

Editors Louisville Courier:

My attention has been called to the following paragraph which appeared in your paper of this date:

"JOHN YOUNG BROWN'S POSITION.—This gentleman, in reply to some searching interrogatories put to him by Governor Helm, said, in reference to the call of the President for four regiments of volunteers to march against the South:

"I would not send one solitary man to aid that Government, and those who volunteer should be shot down in their tracks."

This ambiguous report of my remarks has, I find, been misunderstood by some who have read it, who construe my language to apply to the government of the confederate States! What I did say was this:

"Not one man or one dollar will Kentucky furnish Lincoln to aid him in his unholy war against the South. If this Northern Army shall attempt to cross our borders we will resist it unto the death; and if one man shall be found in our Commonwealth to volunteer to join them he ought, and I believe will be, shot down before he leaves the State."

"This was not said in reply to any question propounded by ex-Governor Helm, as you have stated, and is no more than I frequently uttered, publicly and privately, prior to my debate with him.

Respectfully,

JOHN YOUNG BROWN.

I claim, Mr. Speaker, that at the time I wrote that letter I was for Kentucky neutrality. I was seeking to maintain the position in which my State had been placed by the solemn resolves of two of her conventions, by the solemn resolve of her State Legislature, by the address of the Union central committee. It was to that doctrine that I was pledged, and it was in behalf of that position that I was laboring.

But the committee, in arguing upon my letter, claim that it was not for neutrality; that my language was applied to the northern Army, and that I said nothing about the confederate army. That letter was written upon the morning of the 18th of April. On that very day was held the meeting in the city of Louisville to which I have just been calling attention, and which was addressed by Hon. James Guthrie, General Rousseau, Governor Dixon, Judge Bullock, and others.

Most diligent inquiry has been made in Kentucky with regard to my antecedents. A searching investigation has been made of every act and every word of mine from the inception of the war to its close. Every one of the twelve counties of my district has been ransacked for testimony upon which to secure my exclusion. All, everything is comprised in this letter. There is no other charge against me. There is no other proof against me. By it alone am I to be judged.

How am I to be judged? In the light of surrounding circumstances, by contemporaneous events, the sentiments of others with whom I stood politically identified. And what were they? Here is this address, to which I have called your attention, of the State Union central committee, and they say the very moment the war assumes "the aspect of a war for the overthrow and subjugation of the seceding States" they would have Kentucky make common cause with her sister southern States. In this grand meeting, addressed by the leading Union spirits of Kentucky, Mr. Guthrie speaks, and he says:

"Let us stand boldly and fearlessly, as is characteristic of Kentuckians, and cry peace! Hold fast to that we know to be good, and let those men who want to make the experiment of secession go as individual amateurs, and find congenial spirits for their work."

"If the North comes to ravage our land we will meet them as Kentuckians always meet their foes. We will meet them as Kentuckians should meet them, so long as there is a tree for a fortification or a foot of land for a freeman to stand upon."

Who ever doubted the loyalty of Senator Guthrie here, in Kentucky, or in the Union? Now, take up my letter and contrast its utterance with his. Can you, with metaphysical scissors, cut a line of difference or distinction between the two?

Following on in the account of this meeting, it says I addressed it. After speaking in complimentary terms, too complimentary for me to read in this presence, at the close it says Mr. Brown—

"Earnestly urged the neutrality of Kentucky in the present crisis as the best and most practicable position for Kentucky to maintain her integrity in the Union, and to mediate between the antagonistic sections."

"The meeting, which was entirely orderly, adjourned after giving rounds of cheers for the Union and for the American flag."

The gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] the honorable chairman of the Committee of Elections, in commenting on this speech of mine, read its expressions, but with the adroitness of an advocate omitted that part of it which stated the stand from which I spoke was draped with the American flag, and that the meeting which I addressed adjourned with cheers for the Union and for that American flag. Now, what were the resolutions passed by that meeting?

"4. That secession is a remedy for no evils, real or imaginary, but an aggravation and complication of existing difficulties."

"5. That the memories of the past, the interests of the present, and the solemn convictions of the future duty and usefulness in the hope of mediation, prevent Kentucky from taking part with the seceding States against the General Government."

"6. That 'the present duty of Kentucky is to maintain her present independent position, taking sides, not with the Administration nor with the seceding States, but with the Union against them both, declaring her soil to be sacred from the hostile tread of either, and, if necessary, to make the declaration good with her strong right arm.'"

"7. That to the end Kentucky may be fully prepared for any contingency, 'we would have her arm herself thoroughly at the earliest practicable moment' by regular legal action."

"8. That we look to the young men of the Kentucky State Guard as the bulwarks of the safety of our Commonwealth, and that we conjure them to remember that they are pledged equally to fidelity to the United States and Kentucky."

Such were the resolutions, such were the speeches, made at this convention.

The position Kentucky assumed has been denounced upon this floor. Neutrality has been called treason; but before you too hurriedly judge her remember the position she occupied; remember her surroundings; remember the elements that made up her population; remember her proximity to the States, sister States, which had seceded; and remember that this position was taken at the instance and with the approbation of all her leading Union spirits, including John J. Crittenden, and that Lincoln himself respected and recognized it. We find here, in a letter from Mr. Underwood, that—

"In reference to Kentucky, Mr. Lincoln told me he hoped Kentucky would stand by the Government in the present difficulties, but if she would not do that let her stand still and take no hostile part against it, and that no hostile step should tread her soil."

That was on the 1st day of May, 1861. Nearly one month after writing that letter, which is the groundwork for the charge upon which I am to be excluded, I announced myself in my district as a candidate for reelection to Congress. With what party did I then stand identified? By what newspapers was I supported? With whom did I politically affiliate? I hold in my hand the indorsement of the Louisville Democrat, and the Louisville Journal of that card of announcement for reelection. The card reads as follows:

"To the Voters of the Fifth Congressional District."

"ELIZABETHTOWN, May 13, 1861."

"FELLOW-CITIZENS: In compliance with the wishes of my friends throughout the fifth congressional district, I announce myself as a candidate for reelection to Congress. My opinions are the same as heretofore expressed in public speeches made in seven counties of the district. I have seen no reason to change them, and I have not changed them."

"Kentucky's present position should be maintained."

What was that position? It was a position of impartial neutrality.

"With coolness and firmness and courage let her brave and patriotic sons struggle hopefully and unpausingly to preserve her present proper and commanding attitude. By her recent unparalleled vote our State has sent up from the depths of her great heart a prayer for peace, and given a pledge of her noble conservatism. As she is free from the guilt of the unhappy troubles of the nation let us shield her, if we can, from their harmful consequences."

The Louisville Journal, speaking in complimentary terms of me, concludes the article as follows:

"There are other noble Union spirits in the fifth congressional district, but we have no doubt that our friends in that district will, by common consent, hail John Young Brown as their champion in the congressional canvass."

The Louisville Democrat speaks of me in this language:

"We all feel and know that in his hands the district's and the State's interests will be safely guarded. We suppose from the universal sentiment in his favor that he will be chosen by acclamation."

Now, it is charged that this letter of 18th April of mine gave aid, countenance, counsel, and encouragement to those engaged in armed hostility to the Government. It was not till the 3d day of May that the southern States were declared in insurrection; it was not till the 15th day of April that a call was made upon Kentucky, not for volunteers, but for four regiments of militia. It is charged that my letter encouraged men to go into the confederate ranks and discouraged men from joining the Federal Army. If I am to be judged by the earnest and incautious utterances of that letter, did I not stand with the Union party in my State? Did I not stand with the Union Legislature? Did I not stand with Crittenden, with Guthrie, with Speed, with Dixon, and with the whole host of leaders of the Union party? If you judge me by that letter did not the leading Union prints of New York say, "Let the erring sisters go in peace?" Did they not go so far as even to admit the right of the States to separate themselves from the General Government? But, sir, both before the writing of that letter and after the writing of it I stood identified with the Union party of my State, and if I was wrong then the party was wrong.

Now, what is the rule by which I am to be judged? The Committee of Elections in the Kentucky cases say this:

"Whenever it is shown by proof that the claimant has by act or speech given aid or countenance to the rebellion he should not be permitted to take the oath, and such acts or speech need not be such as to constitute treason technically, but must have been so overt and public and must have been done or said under such circumstances as fairly to show that they were actually designed to, and in their nature tended to, forward the cause of the rebellion."

Can you say of my letter that it was actually intended and designed to forward the cause of the rebellion, that it encouraged enlistments in the confederate army, when upon the very day it was written, as I have shown, in the presence of five thousand people, side by side with the distinguished gentlemen I have named, I addressed a Union meeting and spoke in support of the resolutions that have been read in your hearing in favor of the impartial neutrality of Kentucky? It was an anomalous position that the State assumed; it was a singular position for the State to take; but at that time a political necessity, and was so recognized by all the parties of that Commonwealth.

What is the proof in my case? Hon. Robert Mallory, who was my colleague in the Thirty-Sixth Congress, was examined by the committee and testified as follows:

"I live in Lagrange, Kentucky. I have known Mr. Brown a good many years; my intimate acquaintance with him commenced during the last Congress of Mr. Buchanan's Administration, when we were colleagues together in the House of Representatives; Mr. Brown was elected to that Congress before he was twenty-five years old, and he did not take his seat until the second session, by which time he had attained his twenty-fifth year. In all our intercourse, during that session, when the question of secession was so much mooted, he was unequivocally opposed to it, and took issue with some of his colleagues in Congress at that time, as I did. He was, with me, a Union man, against the secession of the southern States, and a total disbeliever—as he said to me on many occasions—in the doctrine of secession as a constitutional right."

Question. Please to state my political status in the spring and summer of 1861?

Answer. I recollect having frequent conversations with Mr. Brown in the spring and summer of 1861, in Kentucky, when that question was rife here. He was a Union man then. I remember a speech he made in Louisville, in May, 1861, at the convention, when Mr. Guthrie made what I thought to be a rather wild and rapid speech, of which, I may say, I did not approve. Mr. Brown avowed himself a Union man then and opposed secession."

He says my speech was in May; it was really in April. Now, the committee go on in their report to say:

"The committee cannot avoid the force of another consideration in this connection. Mr. Brown himself, so far as is shown, never, till the hearing before the committee, put upon this letter the construction now claimed for it. As late as during the canvass for the seat now claimed, in April last, it was publicly charged upon him as a treasonable document, and nowhere, as far as the committee can learn, did he disavow the plain import of the words or claim for them any other interpretation, but, on the other hand, received the plaudits of rebel sympathizers upon his announcement that the letter still expressed his sentiments."

I am amazed that the committee should make this remark in the face of the proof which I will now read. Mr. Reno, examined as a witness for the contestant, says:

"To Mr. Brown:

"If I can recollect properly your speech at Greenville, your remark was, that at that time you were a Union candidate, and that Governor Helm was then advocating the cause of secession, and that you had written this letter under those circumstances."

Question. Did I or not make reference to the position of the Union party of Kentucky, as evidenced by its party platform and the resolution of the two State conventions, and quote the position of Senator Guthrie, Attorney General Speed, General Rousseau, Senator Davis, and cite extracts from the Louisville Democrat and Louisville Journal, going to show that the whole State was committed to the doctrine of neutrality, and that my position was in strict accord with that of the whole Union party in Kentucky?

Answer. You made reference to those conventions, and stated that those men approved of your action at that time. That was my understanding. You made it appear from your speech that those men approved of your position."

Here is the testimony of another witness, Mr. Little:

"By Mr. Brown:

"Question. Did I not in that speech cite the position of Mr. Prentice of the Louisville Journal, Mr. Harney of the Louisville Democrat, Mr. Guthrie, United States Senator, General Rousseau, late United States Congressman, and Mr. Speed, Attorney General in Lincoln's Cabinet, and cite the address of the Union Central Committee to show that the sentiments expressed in my letter were the same as those held by the entire Union party of Kentucky?"

Answer. Yes.

Question. Did I not state that at the time I wrote the letter I was a Union man?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Did I not state that at the time I wrote the letter, and at any time during the war, I would have been willing to give my life to restore the country to what it once was?

Answer. I think you did."

And yet the committee, in reporting against my admission, state that at no time did I ever put a construction upon that letter different from that which it bears upon its face, when the proof goes to show that from one end of my district to the other, when this letter was read by both of my competitors and my attention was called to it and an explanation demanded of it, I gave the same then in Kentucky that I am giving now to this House.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Cook] in his speech said:

"I beg leave now to call the especial attention of the House to the fact that at the time that the sentiments contained in this letter were publicly avowed by Mr. Brown in a speech at Hebbardsville, in the beginning of April, 1861, a rebel agent was recruiting among the audience for the confederate army."

I assert that the proof nowhere, from the

40TH CONG...2D SESS.

Contested Election—Mr. Brown.

Ho. OF REPS.

beginning to the end of it, shows that I made a speech at Hebbardsville in 1861, for I lived more than three hundred miles from that place. Colonel Philip Lee says:

"I live in Louisville, Kentucky; I have known Mr. Brown since 1855; I was in the confederate army from the summer of 1861 to 1865. I heard Mr. Brown make a speech at Shepherdsville, Bullitt county, at the end of March or beginning of April, 1861. He was then our member of Congress, and we looked forward to his speech with great interest and to the positions which he would take. I remember that I was very greatly disappointed, and I opposed him as a candidate for Congress. He took the ground that Kentucky ought to maintain a neutral position. In his speech he opposed the doctrine of secession. I thought his speech calculated to discourage enlistments in the confederate army, and I was engaged in that business at the time. Therefore I and the other southern men opposed Mr. Brown and determined to bring out a candidate of our own, thinking that Mr. Brown was too much opposed to us. My recollection is that he took ground against the war on either side; he was opposed to coercion; said that it was a duty which the young men of the State owed to the State to remain in it; that Kentucky would act as a peace-maker, and that it was the duty of young men not to go into the southern army."

Mr. COBURN. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. TRIMBLE, of Kentucky. I hope the gentleman will not interrupt my colleague.

Mr. COBURN. I merely desire to ask a question.

Mr. BROWN. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. COBURN. Was not the letter dated April 18, 1861, and printed in the Louisville Courier May 15, 1861, again and again published during the late canvass in which you were a candidate for Congress in the newspapers of your district and of Kentucky, and by them charged against you as a treasonable document? Was it not printed in handbill form and by thousands circulated in every part of the district, and was it not publicly read by your competitors, B. C. Ritter and Samuel E. Smith, in all parts of the district, and the charge made by them in your presence that by this you had aided, countenanced, and encouraged rebellion, and that the utterance of this letter would be a sufficient cause to keep you out of Congress under the provisions of the statute of 1862, known as the "test-oath" law?

Mr. BROWN. As I have said before, that letter was printed in handbill form and circulated throughout my district. It was printed in the newspapers of my district; it was read on every occasion upon which my competitors and myself publicly addressed the people; but then and always, as now, and upon every occasion, I stated that at the time I wrote that letter I was a Union man; I stated that at the time I wrote it I was in full sympathy and accord with the Union party of Kentucky, struggling for peace, and I claimed that the doctrines of Mr. Speed, the ex-Attorney General, and Mr. Guthrie, United States Senator, and General Rousseau, who has since sat on this floor, went as far as the sentiments of my letter did.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if I be judged in the light of surrounding circumstances; if I be judged by the contemporaneous political events of the time at which this letter was written, and if the sentiments of that letter be contrasted with the utterances of those gentlemen to which I referred, if they are to pass unchallenged, why is it proposed to martyrize me? I stand where they stood. Is it to be supposed that I would write to a secession paper a letter of this character, and upon the very day that I wrote it address five thousand people in mass convention, advocating the doctrine of neutrality, if I had not meant that the letter, which was then in the possession of the editor of the Courier, should mean precisely the same thing? And if that editor had not recognized as true that I was identified with the Union party, that I was sincerely and honestly in favor of the neutrality of Kentucky, would he not have at once exposed that letter to the people of the State?

I wish now to read an extract from a letter written by an honorable gentleman who holds a seat upon this floor, and I do it respectfully.

I refer to the letter of Hon. Mr. STOKES to Mr. Duncan, written at McMinnville, Tennessee, on the 10th of May, 1861. In that letter will be found the following:

"I have been a zealous advocate of the Union up to the time of Lincoln's call for seventy-five thousand troops; that being in violation of law and for the subjugation of the South. I commend Governor Harris for his course and for arming the State and resisting Lincoln to the point of the bayonet, and have enrolled my name as a volunteer to resist his usurpation. I have, in Congress and out, opposed coercion and all forced measures, believing that it was better to recognize the independence of the 'southern confederacy' than to attempt to coerce them back."

The honorable gentleman came here and admitted that he was the author of that letter, yet he was admitted upon the floor of this House. He not only aided, counseled, and encouraged rebellion, but he enrolled himself as a volunteer in the rebel army. How much better is his position than mine? Is there not a distinction between his case and mine?

Mr. STOKES. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BROWN. I do.

Mr. STOKES. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Kentucky if, after he wrote the letter which he admits he wrote, he ever entered the Union Army, ever went into the field as a Union soldier, and, if so, how long was he engaged in the United States military service?

Mr. BROWN. I am not conscious of ever having violated any law, State or Federal; I never was in either army. But I am at a loss to understand how the having gone into the Union Army or having remained out of it alters the fact which stands upon the record, that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. STOKES] was a volunteer in the confederate ranks.

Mr. CAKE. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BROWN. I trust the gentleman will not interrupt me now.

Mr. CAKE. Merely for a question, which will not take half a minute.

Mr. BROWN. I prefer to go on without interruption.

In the Hall at the other end of the Capitol there now sits, as a Senator from the State of Tennessee, one who was a judge under the confederate government, who took the oath to support the cause of the confederate government. Yet he is admitted to a seat in the Senate of the United States. I think that both Senator PATTERSON and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. STOKES] upon this floor were rightfully admitted to seats in Congress.

But this House has no pardoning power. Under the oath which the law requires to be administered this House has no power to grant an amnesty unless by solemn vote, to be ratified by the other branch of Congress. It was not done in the cases I have mentioned, and there stands the record.

Now, this being a case unprecedented in the history of this Government, I put it to this House, I put it to the American people, if I am to be denied my seat here merely for the expression of an opinion, in the absence of any proof of any act of mine, directly or indirectly, aiding the government of the confederate States? Can it be, will it be, the judgment of this House that words constitute treason? I think not. Do not all the circumstances surrounding me show that I was cooperating with distinguished Union leaders for the Union cause, and maintaining the position to which Kentucky had been pledged over and over again?

The sentiments of my letter have been spoken of with some degree of severity. I dislike personalities, but when my motives are aspersed or my character assailed, here or elsewhere, I will defend my reputation, for my honor is precious to me; and, so far as the remarks made during the progress of this debate may have had a personal reference, I feel it due to myself and to my constituents to repel them with indignation, as being unmanly, ungenerous, and false. What have my sympathies to do with my admission or my non-admission? Do a man's sympathies constitute treason? Are the windows of my bosom to be opened with inquisitorial hand and the secret recesses of my heart searched to see whether there ever swelled there an emotion of sympathy for my kindred and my friends of the South? I boast not the stern, inexorable patriotism of the elder Brutus, who could, for a violation of law, sacrifice the child of his own loins. I have not the sublime faith and devotion of Abraham, who could take an Isaac to the altar and lift above him the sacrificial knife. My heart and nature are of softer stuff, and my sympathies ever go forth and are with those whom I love.

This letter of mine was written one year before the law prescribing the test-oath was enacted. I submit whether, so far as my case is concerned, this act is not an ex post facto statute, making criminal an act of mine which was no crime when committed?

I have always loved my country. In my childhood I gloried in her liberties. In my young manhood I was proud of the heritage that came to me. The right of habeas corpus and of trial by jury, the freedom of elections, the freedom of the press; the freedom of religious worship—all these I cherished as inestimable rights guaranteed to the American citizen. I felt that my home was my castle. I have wept that terrible civil war, of the causes and consequences of which I am guiltless, should come upon a country so fair and prosperous as ours, and divided a people that should have been forever one. I have wept for the desolation which the war has brought upon us—the ruined homes, the wrecked fortunes, the broken hearts, the anguish of the widow and orphan, and all the destruction and misery that have followed in the train of civil strife. But, believing in the existence of "A divinity that shapes our ends, Rough-hew them how we will,"

I have never ceased to hope that the future of our country will yet be prosperous. In my view it were infidelity to doubt the ultimate unity, power, and glory of the American Republic. The pillars of her strength must rise massive and high, and the mighty fabric of our Government be the most imposing on earth. The storms of ages, beating with fury against the pyramids, have not weakened those stupendous structures, but, drifting the sand to their bases, have strengthened their foundations.

My profound hope is that civil convulsions may not wreck us; that the lesson of tribulation and endangered liberty may make our people everywhere wiser and better, strengthening the foundations of civil liberty; that the error of the past will be shunned in the future; that battle-scars may be healed; that as one united Government, one people with a common destiny, we may reënter an unpausing and unmatched career of prosperity and power.

Never have I been guilty of anything which can be tortured into the crime of treason, and am I now to be pronounced by a solemn vote of this House to be unfit to sit in these Halls because of the utterance of an opinion, incautiously expressed it may have been, but uttered under influences and with motives which I have explained? Am I to be adjudged a political leper, an outlaw? Am I to be ostracized—I who never stood in battle-line, and against whom, after diligent and searching investigation, nothing is proved? Am I to be declared under the ban of the Government, branded as unworthy to hold any office of trust or profit under the Government of the United States? I stand here as no supplicant. I stand here begging no favor. Panoplied with the consciousness of right, I would be less than man if I failed to assert that right. I ask nothing but justice. I trust that my case will not be decided as if I were a candidate in a political caucus; but that every man who records his vote upon this question will do it according to the purest dictates of his conscience, that he may be enabled to feel in after time that he has pursued the course which he sincerely believed to be right. I want it understood that I was opposed toto celo to the policy of the late Administration, and that I am as unalterably opposed to the policy of this Congress. But it is not proper to discuss these now.

It has been charged as a singular fact that after the indorsement of the Union press of my district in May, 1861, I did not continue a candidate. Circumstances, which it is needless here to explain, caused my removal to a remote part of the State—to the district from which I have now the honor to be elected.

Mr. COOK. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a moment for an explanation.

Mr. BROWN. Certainly, sir.

The SPEAKER. The hour of the claimant has expired.

Mr. DAWES. I hope the gentleman from Kentucky will be permitted to conclude his speech.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. COOK. Mr. Speaker, I was in error in the statement I made in my remarks in locating the speech of the gentleman from Kentucky at Hebbardsville. I referred to the testimony of Colonel Lee; and meant to have alluded to the speech at Shepherdsville, Bullitt county, Kentucky, instead of at Hebbardsville. He testified that he heard Mr. Brown make a speech at Shepherdsville at the end of March or the beginning of April, 1861, very nearly the time he published that letter. In his testimony he says during the time that speech was being made he was recruiting in the audience for the confederate army.

Mr. BROWN. To show the gentleman's conclusions are unwarranted I invite his attention to that paragraph. I read from the Globe. The gentleman from Illinois said:

Who was that rebel agent? Colonel Lee. What does Colonel Lee say?

"I live in Louisville, Kentucky; I have known Mr. Brown since 1855; I was in the confederate army from the summer of 1861 to 1865. I heard Mr. Brown make a speech at Shepherdsville, Bullitt county, at the end of March or beginning of April, 1861. He was then our member of Congress, and we looked forward to his speech with great interest, and to the positions which he would take. I remember that I was very greatly disappointed, and I opposed him as a candidate for Congress. He took the ground that Kentucky ought to maintain a neutral position. In his speech he opposed the doctrine of secession. I thought his speech calculated to discourage enlistments in the confederate army, and I was engaged in that business at the time. Therefore I and the other southern men opposed Mr. Brown, and determined to bring out a candidate of our own, thinking that Mr. Brown was too much opposed to us. My recollection is that he took ground against the war on either side; he was opposed to coercion; said that it was a duty which the young men of the State owed to the State to remain in it."

The gentleman would have the House to infer I was proclaiming these sentiments and giving aid and encouragement to the confederates when the witness he refers to says I discouraged enlistments in the confederate army and spoke in behalf of the neutrality of my State, and he was enlisting secretly, a matter of which I knew nothing.

Mr. Speaker, Hon. Mr. DAVIS, Senator from Kentucky, occupied the same position of neutrality I did. He took his seat in the other end of the Capitol unchallenged. Secretary Guthrie occupied the same position I did, uttering the sentiment that he would make every tree in Kentucky a fortification behind which to fight the invading army from the North. He unchallenged took his seat as a Senator from Kentucky. General Rousseau was one of the committee to report these resolutions, and was a member with me of that great meeting at Louisville to which I referred. He came here and took his seat unchallenged in this House. Why is it mine shall be made the exceptional case when I have done nothing, as the proof shows, save speaking words intended at the time to mean neutrality.

If the language will not bear that construction, at least it was so meant and so intended. Upon my rights I stand, and if it be the judgment of the House I am not entitled to a seat here I can go back to my constituents with the proud and consoling reflection and consciousness that I have discharged my duty in claiming it and in this vindication of myself. And if this brand be put upon me that I am unworthy to hold a seat here then I could not be a postmaster at any of the cross roads in the United States.

If that is to be the judgment of this House, I am ready for the sacrifice. Do it, and you commit a foul wrong upon me; an outrage upon my rights and those of my constituents. Do it, and in my humble person American liberty receives, in the house of its professed friends, a dangerous blow. Establish the precedent that mere words, spoken a year before the law under which you are trying me was passed, are sufficient to justify you in refusing me my seat as a member of this body, to which I was duly elected, and it may in time return "to plague the inventors." But I will say no more. I thank the House for its courtesy.

OF

THE COMMITTEE ON ACCOUNTS,

ON

Certain Charges preferred against N. G. Ordway, Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Representatives.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
February 19, 1868.

The Committee on Accounts, to whom were referred certain charges preferred by J. W. Wilkinson against N. G. Ordway, Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Representatives, imputing to him fraud and malfeasance in office, make report:

That your committee have investigated the said charges, and in the progress thereof have heard the said Wilkinson and other witnesses produced by him, and have examined all papers and accounts referred to by him in support of his said charges, and have also heard the said Ordway and witnesses produced by him in his defense.

It appears by the testimony, which is reported herewith, that Mr. Wilkinson was employed by Mr. Ordway as a clerk in his office about May 2, 1866. In a short time, probably a month, a difficulty grew up between the clerk and his employer about the amount of compensation to which he was entitled. Mr. Ordway, it seems, had procured Mr. Wilkinson to be placed on the pay-roll of the Doorkeeper at $100 per month, and detailed to assist him. Mr. Wilkinson contended that, according to the agreement between them as first made, he should have appeared upon the records of the House as temporary clerk to the Sergeant-at-Arms, under a resolution of the House allowing him such clerk. In that position he would have received $125 per month. This difficulty has never been settled, though Mr. Wilkinson retained his situation for about ten months and drew his pay at $100 per month, with the addition of twenty per cent. for either three or four months, whether one or the other does not very clearly appear.

The dispute about compensation is of no importance to the investigation except so far as it may show a motive for the prosecution, and hence affect the credibility of the prosecution. About the time the controversy began Mr. Wilkinson conceived the idea of watching his employer with the design of discovering and exposing irregularities in the administration of his office; and in June, 1866, he began to make memoranda and to copy papers with a view, as he alleges, to this investigation. The result of this system of espionage, continued secretly for about nine months, is the series of charges against Mr. Ordway referred to the committee.

It is due to Mr. Wilkinson to say that he swears he was actuated by no selfish motive, no malice, no desire of gain, but purely by an abstract love of justice. The committee do not gainsay this. Every man best understands his own motives. But the quarrel about pay and the formation of the design to prosecute happened singularly near together in point of time, if they are to be considered mere accidental coincidents.

The charges made by Mr. Wilkinson are as follows, stated in his own language:

"1. That Mr. Ordway has, to my certain knowledge, made out bills (and received the amount of such bills) in the name of S. S. Bean, (his brother-in-law,) for services as clerk in his office, when said Bean was, during the time charged for, cultivating his farm in New Hampshire.

"2. That in making out bills against committees for serving of subpoenas and travel after witnesses he has, by changing the dates, charged, in some cases, two, three, and four times the amount he was entitled to, and has implicated the chairmen of the committees in these overcharges, to this extent that he did it under instructions from them, which I do not believe was the case.

"3. That he has made bills of travel of himself for journeys he did not perform.

"4. That he has, after getting bills 'approved' by chairmen of committees, increased the footing of such bills.

"5. That it was by his means that the resolution which passed the House July 3, 1866—which was designed, as the resolution itself shows, to guard the interest of the Government against false accounts being paid—was virtually repealed.

"6. That he has, as I verily believe, sacrilegiously availed himself of the occasion of the death of honorable members of the House to feed his appetite for gain."

The first, fourth, and fifth of these charges the committee find wholly unsustained by the evidence. D. S. Bean, not S. S. Bean, as stated in the charge, was employed during a part of the first session of the Thirty-Ninth Congress as temporary clerk in the office of the Sergeant-at-Arms. The time he served in that capacity does not clearly appear by the testimony of the witnesses. Mr. Rollins says he thinks about two months. Mr. Wilkinson, on the other hand, says not as long as a month. The records of the Clerk show that he received two months' pay, and Mr. Rollins says he carried the money to him in New Hampshire, he having returned to his home on account of sickness before payment. Mr. Ordway received no part of it, and if this was important to the investigation it is not to be presumed without proof that the Clerk of the House paid Mr. Bean more than he was entitled to.

The fourth charge is frivolous, unless the element of fraud is intended to be implied in the language; and of this there is no reliable evidence whatever.

Mr. Wilkinson testifies to what he calls the fraudulent alteration of one of the bills of expenses incurred by the Committee on Public Expenditures while sitting in New York; but he is expressly and pointedly contradicted by Mr. HUBBARD, the chairman of the committee, and by Mr. Rollins, one of its members.

The fifth charge is directly disproved by Mr. Lloyd, the chief clerk, and is known to be without foundation by the members of this committee who were members of the Committee on Accounts of the Thirty-Ninth Congress. The resolution of July 3, 1866, emanated from the Committee on Accounts. It was mainly intended to apply to purchases and bills for labor and repairs in the Clerk's department. It was soon found to embrace objects not contemplated by the committee, and was modified with the concurrence of a majority of the committee, at the instance of the chief clerk, Mr. Lloyd.

The second and third charges relate to services performed for committees charged with special matters and empowered to send for persons and papers. The substance of these charges is, that Mr. Ordway claimed and received mileage for journeys not performed, or not necessarily performed, in the service of subpoenas for the committees.

The committees designated by Mr. Wilkinson are the select committee appointed to investigate the affairs of the Provost Marshal General; that appointed to investigate the condition of southern railroads; the Committee on Public Expenditures, and the joint Committee on Retrenchment.

The evidence upon this point, as given by Mr. Wilkinson, is that he summoned in the aggregate twenty-one witnesses from different points, making five trips, and that Mr. Ordway charged and received mileage for seventeen trips.

It must be borne in mind that this witness can only know that he made five trips in summoning these twenty-one witnesses. He cannot know that he attended upon his subpoena nor that other officers did not serve process upon them. Upon this point the testimony of Mr. HULBURD, the chairman of one of the committees, is important. He cannot remember the circumstances attending the procuring of all the witnesses, but he singles out eight of the twenty-one and testifies that these were summoned by other officers at successive periods and at times different from those sworn to by Mr. Wilkinson. These eight cases for which separate mileage could, according to his testimony, be properly charged, added to the five cases admitted by Mr. Wilkinson, make thirteen instances of legal mileage out of the seventeen charged for.

The testimony of Mr. Wilkinson was rendered of very little account, in the estimation of the committee, by the fact that it is in conflict with almost all the other testimony in the case. He swears to certain alterations in papers which upon examination prove to be wholly untrue. He swears to conversations with other witnesses which the other witnesses not only do not remember but positively deny having occurred. He is contradicted in several material and distinct matters by the testimony of his own witnesses, Messrs. Conn and Dillon, and also by Messrs. HULBURD, Rollins, Lloyd, and Cheney.

The material and almost the only witness upon this point standing thus impeached, the committee do not consider the charge of receiving illegal mileage by any means clearly established.

But, assuming that the testimony of Wilkinson is true, then another question arises. It is clear to the committee that since the act of February 5, 1859, the Sergeant-at-Arms cannot legally claim mileage for the service of process except for the distance actually and necessarily traveled. But very recently the House of Representatives maintained that there is no law to prevent it itself from allowing its employes and officers in special cases compensation out of its contingent fund beyond the amount to which they are entitled by law. Whether this be sound or not, it will not do to charge its employes and officers with fraud in receiving such compensation so allowed. A committee charged with a special object, and armed with all the power of the House in the premises, has all the right of the House, subject to its control and supervision, of procuring necessary services and awarding the adequate compensation. This position may be disputed, it may be overthrown, but not so clearly and successfully as to justify the imputation of fraud either to the committee or the persons it employs.

The bills in which these alleged illegal charges were made were passed upon respectively by the committees for whom the services were rendered and approved by the chairmen.

This was according to the universal custom in both branches of Congress. The committee call the attention of the House to the testimony of Mr. Brown, Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate, upon this point. He swears that extra compensation for services rendered to investigating committees, in cases where the ordinary fees are found to be inadequate, is very common, and that the action of the committees in the premises is never inquired into by the Senate.

This custom is founded upon reason. The difficulty of procuring the attendance of unwilling witnesses is well known to every one who has served upon investigating committees. Days and weeks are sometimes expended in search of a single man. It is frequently more trouble and expense to the officer to procure the attendance of five witnesses subpoenaed at a single trip than would be compensated by five separate mileages. Now, the committee procuring the services best know the amount and the value of them, and when they have once awarded what they consider the proper compensation their action is not to be disturbed upon slight grounds.

Your committee do not maintain that that action is final and conclusive, but they do maintain that the presumption is in favor of its fairness and correctness, and that it must stand until successfully impeached. To do this it is not enough to show that the officer was allowed too much compensation for some particular item of service contained in a bill. That may be balanced by the want of compensation elsewhere in the same bill. It must be shown that the officer received too much compensation in the aggregate. The bill in each particular case is made up after all the services are rendered. The tribunal passing upon the compensation is supposed to have the whole of the services in view, and a mere improper apportionment of the compensation is no just cause of complaint.

But the ground-work of the charge is not that the Sergeant-at-Arms received too much money for the services rendered, but that he claimed and received it knowingly and fraudulently; and the committee cannot, upon any such testimony as that produced before them, impute fraud, either to those who awarded or to the officer who received the alleged illegal compensation.

The sixth charge was abandoned by the prosecutor himself, except as far as it related to constructive mileage claimed and allowed for his attendance upon the escort of the remains of the late Hon. Philip Johnson. It appears that when the witness was ordered to attend the escort he was in New York; that he was directed by telegraph to join it at Trenton, on its way to Easton. He alleges he did this, and says his mileage was computed from Washington, District of Columbia.

The committee do not find that the allowance of constructive mileage in such a case is in violation of any law. The act of February 5, 1859, is limited by its terms to mileage for service of process. The amount claimed was allowed by the committee of escort, who must have known all the circumstances, and whose action in the premises your committee do not feel at liberty to call in question.

Upon the whole matter the committee find none of the charges sustained by the evidence as far as they impute fraud to the Sergeant-at-Arms. They therefore recommend the passage of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

J. M. BROOMALL, Chairman.
E. R. ECKLEY
WILLIAM C. FIELDS,
S. M. ARNELL.

Impeachment.

SPEECH OF HON. WILLIAM A. PILE, OF MISSOURI,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
February 22, 1868,

On the resolutions reported by the Committee on Reconstruction for the impeachment of the President.

Mr. PILE. Mr. Speaker, seldom in the history of legislation has it been the duty of the Representatives of a great people to discuss and vote upon a question of this character. The course of legislation has flowed on for thousands of years in the various Governments of the earth. Commerce has been established and developed; currency and exchange regulated; taxes have been levied, and provisions made for their collection; treaties and alliances entered into; armies raised and equipped; wars prosecuted and peace many times established; amid all this there has been much of conflict in interest; many scenes of blood and violence; many occasions of great public excitement; many sublime moments when the destinies of peoples were suspended in the balance; yet, it has comparatively but rarely occurred that the trusted ruler of a great nation upon whom rested the sworn obligation of preserving the public peace and executing the law has become the disturber of public order and quiet; the violator of law; the enemy of his country, and the foe of the liberties of his own people.

In this country, sir, we have gone on for nearly a century legislating upon the great questions of national polity that have arisen during our history. We have raised armies, prosecuted wars, established peace. Yes, sir, we have met and vanquished the mightiest rebellion of history; we have overthrown the most powerful evil, the strongest organized aristocracy and basest type of society that ever existed among men—American slavery; but never before has it been the duty of the people's Representatives, assembled in these halls, to arraign the President of this great country before the bar of the only tribunal authorized by the Constitution of the country for the trial of such a case. Such a duty, sir, is now imposed upon this House. The President has violated the plainest terms of the law solemnly enacted by the Congress of the people, according to and in pursuance of the provisions of the Constitution. Amid the momentous and multiform duties of this body arising from the condition of the country emerging from a great war, with industrial pursuits deranged, business depressed, trade stagnant, values disturbed, the people overburdened with taxes, capital timid and withdrawn from business, and the public mind feverish and unsettled, every man going to his chamber at night with an undefined and therefore all the more disturbing conviction that ere he wakes in the morning some new danger may threaten the peace or life of his nation—amid all this the highest officer known to the Constitution and the laws startles the nation, from the shores of the Atlantic, "where the sons of the Republic keep watch at the rising of the sun," to the golden shores of the Pacific, "where they keep watch at the going down of the same;" has startled and moved the public mind and heart to its profoundest depths by a violation of law at once so flagrant and assumptive as to leave him without excuse and to make his defenders on this floor morally participants in his crime. By these acts, sir, the President and his advisers become the disturbers of public peace, and upon him and them rest the responsibility for all the derangement of business and depression of trade arising from these proceedings.

I come to the consideration of this subject with profound regret that such a duty should be imposed upon this House, but also with the deliberately formed judgment that has had no shade of variation for months; that no peace or quiet can come to the country until this bad man is removed from his high office. And with the additional belief that it is fortunate that a clear and uncomplicated case has been made by the rashness of the President so that the process of impeachment may be speedy, and the country soon restored to peace and quiet.

Under a true sense, as I trust and believe, of the importance of the case, and in the discharge of my duty as an humble Representative of a part of the great people, I shall vote for the pending resolution; and in giving to the House and the country the reasons that impel me to this course, I shall first review the course of this debate up to this time, answering such of the points made by gentlemen on the opposite side of the House as seem to me worthy of notice; second, I shall call attention to the specific acts of the President that are in violation of law and in contemplation of the Constitution and the laws high crimes and misdemeanors; and, third, I shall review the public conduct of the President in order to show the criminal intent and motive that have inspired and prompted him to these acts.

The very first element of this discussion thrown in here by the opposite side amid the excitement of such an occasion is that of threatening and bombast. The gentleman from New York, [Mr. Brooks,] after deploring in measured phrases and with plaintive tones the hasty and excited character of these proceedings, launches out into an hour's speech, delivered in most excited tones of voice and with very violent gestures, in which he warns and threatens by turns—now imploring us to pause and consider before entering upon the impeachment of the President and then lashing himself into fury he threatens with blood—parades before us the muscle and prowess of the "peace party in war and war party in peace"—the Democratic party; and with uplifted hands and upturned eyes piously calls God to witness that he and his Democratic associates will not submit. Other gentlemen follow in the same strain. Now, sir, the only answer I care to make to all this "dunder-un-blixen" talk is that it has ceased to frighten school-boys or disturb the nerves of hypochondriac old ladies. After meeting and defeating treason and revolution on hundreds of battle-fields, amid the conflict of arms that has rocked the continent; after beholding this hydra-headed monster of rebellion, we are not likely to be frightened by the dying wriggling of its tail on this floor.

The first attempt at an argumentative defense of the President was made by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. Beck.] His first position is: that the President has the right to test the constitutionality of any law before the courts; and all he designed in the acts for which he is arraigned was to make a case before the courts and test the constitutionality of the tenure-of-office law. In order to avoid the charge of misstating his position, I quote his own words:

"I maintain that the President of the United States is in duty bound to test the legality of every law which he thinks interferes with his rights and powers as the Chief Magistrate of this nation. Whenever he has powers conferred upon him by the Constitution of the United States, and an act of Congress undertakes to deprive him of those powers, or any of them, he would be false to his trust as the Chief Executive of this nation, false to the interests of the people whom he represents, if he did not by every means in his power seek to test the constitutionality of that law, and to take whatever steps were necessary and proper to have it tested by the highest tribunal in the land, and to ascertain whether he has a right under the Constitution to do what he claims the right to do, or whether Congress has the right to deprive him of the powers which he claims have been vested in him by the Constitution of the United States, and that is all that he proposes to do in this case."

"Now, if that is the object, and the only object, of the President, as I contend the facts show, then I can hardly bring myself to believe that any set of sane men can seriously entertain the opinion that in anything the President has done in the removal of Mr. Stanton he has been guilty of either a high crime or misdemeanor. But 'whom the gods wish to destroy, they first make mad,' and if ever a party was stricken with judicial madness and blindness the action of this party now prove that they are the victims of it."

The conclusive answer to this is that the courts were open to the President without violating the law. A writ of quo warranto could have been invoked requiring Secretary Stanton to show by what authority he held and exercised the functions of his office contrary to the will and desire of the Chief Executive of the nation. Under this process a direct appeal to the courts, involving the constitutionality of the very law the President violated, would have ensued. If he violates the law, in order to make a case before the courts, when a peaceful and more direct method is open to him, he does so at his peril, and must take the consequences.

The second position taken by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Beck] is that the power of removal is a part of the executive power of the President conferred by the Constitution; that it is incident to and inherent in this executive power, and therefore the "tenure-of-office law," forbidding such removal, is unconstitutional and void, and no crime can be committed in violating its provisions. I shall examine the several parts of this position separately. The quotation made by the gentleman from Mr. Madison in support of the power of removal refers to the power of the President during the recess of Congress, and not to his power during the session of the Senate, and, of course, cannot apply to this case. The opinion of Chancellor Kent, which I here requote, is in the following words:

"On the first organization of the Government it was made a question whether the power of removal in case of officers appointed to hold at pleasure resided nowhere but in the body which appointed, and, of course, whether the consent of the Senate was not requisite to remove. This was the construction given to the Constitution while it was pending for ratification before the State conventions by the author of the Federalist. But the construction which was given to the Constitution by Congress, after great consideration and discussion, was different. The words of the act (establishing the Treasury Department) are: 'And whenever the same shall be removed from office by the President of the United States, or in any other case of vacancy in the office, the assistant shall act.' This amounted to a legislative construction of the Constitution, and it has ever since been acquiesced in and acted upon as decisive authority in the case. It applies equally to every other officer of the Government appointed by the President whose term of duration is not specially declared. It is supported by the weighty reason that the subordinate officers in the executive department ought to hold at the pleasure of the head of the department, because he is invested generally with the executive authority, and the participation in that authority by the Senate was an exception to a general principle and ought to be taken strictly. The President is the great responsible officer for the faithful execution of the law, and the power of removal was incidental to that duty, and might often be requisite to fulfill it."

This opinion shows that this matter of removal, even in the recess of Congress, was made a question in the very first organization of the Government; that men of great ability held that no such power of removal existed in the Executive of the nation without the consent of the Senate; that the sense of the Constitution in this regard was only given by the act of Congress establishing the Treasury Department. Now, all this is said in reference to the power of the President in the recess of Congress. If Congress could fix the sense of the Constitution in the act referred to above in 1789 the Congress can reinterpret the Constitution on this point in 1867. But, sir, this removal is attempted during the session of the Senate, after they had solemnly non-concurred in the suspension of this same officer under the provisions of the very law that he now violates. I undertake to say that no respectable authority can be cited in support of the power of the President to remove, during the session of the Senate, an officer whose appointment has been confirmed under the law by the Senate; and I challenge the production of one single precedent for the exercise of such power.

But, sir, there is another important count in the indictment of the President that I shall refer to at greater length after awhile, that the gentleman from Kentucky wholly ignores, namely, the illegal appointment of Lorenzo Thomas Secretary of War ad interim. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Woodward,] who assumes to lead the opposite side of this House on law questions, maintains that Mr. Stanton is not embraced in the terms of the act regulating the tenure of certain civil offices because he was appointed by Mr. Lincoln and not reappointed by the present incumbent of the presidential office.

This assumption rests upon two grounds, neither of which is tenable, namely, that the term for which Mr. Lincoln was elected expired when he was murdered by that desperate man, J. Wilkes Booth, and that the recognition of Mr. Stanton as Secretary of War by President Johnson, and the transaction of business with him as Secretary of War for more than two years by the President, did not make him de facto and de jure Secretary of War. Now, sir, each of these assumptions is so palpably a violation of all common sense and all admitted legal principles that to stop to expose them would seem to be to insult the intelligence of the House and the country. I come now, sir, to notice the acts for which, acting upon my judgment and conscience, I shall vote for the impeachment of the President, and the law he violated by those acts.

In 1861, for the purpose of preserving inviolable official positions conferred by law, Congress solemnly passed an act making it a high crime and misdemeanor, punishable by fine and imprisonment, for two or more persons to conspire together and by force, threats, or violence attempt to prevent any person from holding or executing the duties of any office to which he had been appointed under the law. In 1867 Congress passed an additional law, being "an act regulating the tenure of certain civil offices," the first section of which reads as follows:

"Be it enacted, &c., That every person holding any civil office to which he has been appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and every person who shall hereafter be appointed to any such office, and shall become duly qualified to act therein, is and shall be entitled to hold such office until a successor shall have been in like manner appointed and duly qualified."

The sixth section of the same act is as follows:

"And be it further enacted, That every removal, appointment, or employment, made, had, or exercised contrary to the provisions of this act, and the making, signing, sealing, countersigning, or issuing of any commission or letter of authority for or in respect to any such appointment or employment, shall be deemed, and are hereby declared to be, high misdemeanors, and upon trial and conviction thereof every person guilty thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $10,000, or by an imprisonment not exceeding five years, or both said punishments, in the discretion of the court: Provided, That the President shall have power to make out and deliver, after the adjournment of the Senate, commissions for all officers whose appointment shall have been advised and consented to by the Senate."

The acts of the President in removing Secretary Stanton and signing and issuing the letter of authority to Lorenzo Thomas, authorizing him to take charge of the War Office and to enter upon and discharge the duties of the office of Secretary of War ad interim, violated the express terms of the act above quoted. And by conspiring with the said Lorenzo Thomas to prevent, by violence and threats, the discharge of the duties of the office of Secretary of War by Edwin M. Stanton, then in the lawful possession of said office, the President violated the provisions of the act of Congress of 1861, above referred to. Fortunately, there is no question about the commission of these acts nor of there being in violation of law. The provisions of the statutes are plain and unambiguous. The proof of the acts is documentary and conclusive. The letter of the President removing Mr. Stanton and the one appointing Lorenzo Thomas Secretary of War ad interim have been quoted repeatedly in this debate and need not be recited here.

After thus flagrantly violating the law, the President, with indecent haste, without waiting to be asked for information, by formal message informs the Senate that he has done these things, the Constitution and the laws of the country to the contrary notwithstanding; thereby challenging Congress to proceed against him and bring him to answer before the only legally constituted tribunal authorized to hear and determine such a case. The only alternative left to us is either to accept the challenge and proceed to impeach the President, or to allow him to violate and override every law that conflicts with his wishes, prejudices, or corrupt designs. With such an alternative before us, our duty is too plain to be misapprehended, and our responsibility too direct to be avoided.

I come now, sir, to examine the circumstances connected with these acts of the President, in order to see what was his motive and intention in their commission. This will require that I go back and trace, briefly, the record of his public conduct since he has assumed and discharged the duties of President of the United States. This record will disclose, in the most unmistakable manner, his deliberately-formed purpose to restore to political power, in all the ten rebellious States, the men and the classes who had precipitated the country into all the horrors of civil war and brought upon us all the woes and misery of the fearful conflict through which we had passed. It will also disclose the fact that, in order to defeat the purpose and will of the people's Representatives in the reconstruction of these States upon the principles of justice and equity, he has usurped extraordinary and illegal authority and deliberately and criminally violated the laws.

First came his message of December, 1865, that clearly discloses this purpose; and then his indecent harangue to a Washington rebel mob from the steps of the White House, February 22, 1866, in which he violently assailed Congress, and declared the loyal States and the loyal millions public enemies and traitors, and announced his purpose to put them down. Then came pardons from his hand for the worst rebels of the South, thick and fast as the falling leaves of autumn; his surrender of abandoned lands formerly set apart by the law for the negroes and loyal refugees of the South; his illegal restoration, to rebel owners and corporations, of property costing the Government many millions in money and the labor of tens of thousands of men, namely, the railroads constructed in the South by the Government. The same settled purpose is exhibited by his messages vetoing the civil-rights bill and the several acts of reconstruction; by his removal of the gallant Sheridan; by his suspension of Secretary Stanton in August last; by his attempt to involve the General of the Army in the violation of law and make of him an agent for the accomplishment of his own fell purposes; by his efforts to bribe the hero of the grand and romantic march to the sea, with promotion and flattery, that he might make of him the agent and instrument of carrying out his wicked and corrupt designs; and by his endeavor, through the same means, to secure the aid of the brave, patriotic, and lofty-souled General George H. Thomas in defeating the execution of law. Thus, step by step, this bold, bad, and little-understood man has gone on, never swerving either to the right or to the left, steadily pursuing the same purpose, constantly laboring and plotting for the accomplishment of the same end. Discouraged at no difficulties, heedless of the voice of public sentiment expressed by the people at the polls in 1866, in unprecedented majorities, and in violation of the oft-expressed will of Congress, with a persistence worthy of a better cause, he has continued to conspire against the liberties of the people, and endeavor to surrender to the tender mercies of the men who starved and murdered our soldiers at Libby, Belle Isle, Salisbury, and Andersonville, the emancipated blacks and loyal whites of the South. Finally, and at last, to accomplish these purposes, and control the coming presidential election by military authority exercised through the War Department in all these ten rebel States, under the pretext of making a case for the courts in order to test the constitutionality of the tenure-of-office act, he overrides the Constitution, and violates the laws passed in pursuance thereof.

Can there be a doubt about the motive and intention of such acts, committed by such a man, under such circumstances as these? Does not the whole record bear upon its face the unmistakable marks of usurpation and crime? What insolent and brazen effrontery is it for his friends on this floor to claim for him innocent intentions and pacific motives! It will be difficult to find, in the annals of all the past, so many acts of a single tyrant disclosing the same wicked purposes and exhibiting the same criminal intentions as are found in this record of infamy made by Mr. Johnson.

Having, as I think, established clearly the violation of law by the acts of the President, and shown conclusively that these acts were committed with criminal intent and purpose, I desire, Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, to say that the violated supremacy and outraged majesty of the law demands the impeachment of the President of the United States for high crimes and misdemeanors. I further urge and press his impeachment in the name and for the sake of the toiling millions of my countrymen who are wearied and exhausted by the long and fearful struggle of the past and the unsettled and deranged condition of the present. In the interest of the industrial pursuits of the country, unsettled and depressed as they are; in the interest of stagnated trade and commerce, and deranged and fluctuating finance; and for the sake and in the name of the humanity and civilization of the age, I ask that the official career of this man shall be speedily and forever terminated, in order that the country may have rest, quiet, and prosperity, and that the nation may continue in its high career of progress and civilization.

In the name of the half million brave men whose ghastly corpses lie beneath the green-sward of the South, and who died for liberty and loyalty, I demand the impeachment and removal of this man, who, in the exercise of the great power of his high office, seeks to betray into the hands of its enemies the country for which they fought and died.

In the name of the armless and limbless men who go maimed and halting to the tomb, the widows and orphans, the desolate hearthstones, and the bereaved families, let this process of impeachment be carried to a speedy and conclusive determination.

Inspired by the memories of the historic and heroic past and the hopes of the on-coming and glorious future, let us do our duty fearlessly and promptly; and a country restored to peace and prosperity will gladly hasten to pronounce its approval of our action, and unborn millions will rise up to call us blessed.

SPEECH OF HON. J. K. MOORHEAD,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 24, 1868,

On the resolutions reported by the Committee on Reconstruction for the impeachment of the President.

MR. MOORHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I do not rise for the purpose of making a speech, but merely to say that I have heretofore on all occasions voted against impeachment. I did hope, sir, that our Government would escape the trial of its strength, as well as the odium that would fall upon it, by instituting proceedings for the impeachment of its chief executive officer, and it was my purpose that no such proceeding should be instituted on doubtful or debatable ground.

The President has been guilty of many, very many, official acts that I most heartily condemn, but they were generally of a political character, prompted by his base treachery to the party that elected him, and used for the purpose of receiving the confidence and aid of those who opposed him then, but by whom he now vainly hopes to be again elevated to the chair he has disgraced.

I therefore, with a majority of the Republican members of Congress, preferred to bear with him during the balance of his term rather than convulse and disturb the country in trying to get rid of him. I did hope that the efforts or attempts made to impeach him would have taught him prudence if not wisdom, and his efforts to interfere with and set aside the action of Congress would have ceased. I regret to say that this hope has been vain. Instead of conforming more to the lawful enactments of Congress he has become more defiant and aggressive. He has evidently construed the conservative action of those who have heretofore voted against impeachment to be cowardice, and to believe that, do as he pleased, the House of Representatives would not call him to account. He has, therefore, thrown himself openly and defiantly against a plain enactment of law.

It is, therefore, the duty of the Congress to resist this usurpation; "longer forbearance would cease to be a virtue." And while I am glad that a majority of the House of Representatives have heretofore resisted impeachment, yet now, unfortunate as it is that such a necessity exists, and sad as every patriot should feel at the spectacle of the Chief Magistrate of the United States being brought before the bar of the Senate to answer articles of impeachment, I shall with pleasure, as a matter of duty to myself, my country, and posterity, vote in favor of the resolution.

It is well, Mr. Speaker, that the issue is so clear, plain, and distinct. It is no less than an open and defiant refusal to obey the law and Constitution that he has solemnly sworn to support. The evidence of it bears his own signature; there can be no cavil nor prevarication about the commission of the offense; let us, therefore, impeach him, and have the country relieved from the annoyance and disgrace it has suffered in consequence of the bad conduct of Andrew Johnson.

SPEECH OF HON. J. M. BROOMALL,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 24, 1868,

On the resolutions reported by the Committee on Reconstruction for the impeachment of the President.

MR. BROOMALL. Mr. Speaker, if I were to consider the subject now before the House in a purely political point of view, and ask myself, "What is best for the party to which I am attached?" I should probably say, let the President alone; let him go on piling iniquity upon iniquity until he shall drag his entire party down with him so low that there shall be found no trace of it or him in the future history of the country. But I can let myself be actuated by no party motives. The President of the United States is charged with a high misdemeanor, and, like every other person similarly charged, he is to be tried by the law and the evidence.

The charge against the President is that of usurpation—the highest crime of which a ruler can be guilty. The particular act of usurpation charged is that of taking upon himself, without the consent of the Senate, which, by the Constitution, is made a coordinate power with him in the matter, to remove the Secretary of War and to appoint another person in his place. This act is made a high misdemeanor by the law of March 2, 1867, the sixth section of which is as follows:

HO. OF REPS.

Impeachment—Mr. Broomall.

"That every removal, appointment, or employment made, had, or exercised contrary to the provisions of this act, and the making, signing, sealing, countersigning, or issuing of any commission or letter of authority for or in respect to any such appointment or employment, shall be deemed, and are hereby declared to be, high misdemeanors, and upon trial and conviction thereof every person guilty thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $10,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding five years, or both said punishments, in the discretion of the court: Provided, That the President shall have power to make out and deliver, after the adjournment of the Senate, commissions for all officers whose appointment shall have been advised and consented to by the Senate."

The question for us to decide is, whether or not there is sufficient ground to bring the President before the tribunal appointed by the Constitution to try him and to arraign him at the bar of that tribunal for this offense. Is he prima facie guilty or not guilty?

Now, I am not of the opinion that this last act of the President is the greatest one of his enormities. On the contrary, I am inclined to think that in its consequences it is among the smallest, a mere foiled attempt at dictatorship. But it is the crowning act. It is the apex of the great pyramid of his iniquities—the act which has driven the American Congress, reluctantly and against its predetermination, to a point where forbearance not only ceases to be a virtue but becomes a positive crime.

Fortunately, Mr. Speaker, there is no dispute about the facts of this case. All parties admit the acts which are charged against the President to have been committed. The evidence is over his own signature, neither denied nor proposed to be brought in controversy on this floor. The only question raised here is, whether by the commission of those acts he has brought himself within the operations of this penal statute? The reading of that statute would seem to bring his case clearly and plainly within it; and but for the ingenuity of astute lawyers who have undertaken to do what they are always ready to do—to invent legal quibbles for the protection of great criminals who can pay—but for this there could not be uttered on this floor one word in his defense. It is contended that the President had the right to commit the acts charged. Let us look at that question. The Constitution, in article two, section two, provides:

"That the President shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate shall appoint, ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, Judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for and which shall be established by law."

The office of Secretary of War is one of those not provided for in the Constitution, but to be established by law. Accordingly Congress, on August 7, 1789, created the office and defined the duties of the officer. The provision of the Constitution which I have quoted contains all that is said on the subject of appointing this class of officers. It will be seen that nothing is said in the Constitution about the term of office, nor, except by the process of impeachment, about the power of removal. These were very properly left to be regulated and fixed by legislation. The power of appointment being complete in the organic law, it is clear that Congress can neither abridge nor enlarge it. But it is otherwise with the term of office and the power of removal. By the eighth section, first article of the Constitution, Congress is empowered—

"To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States or in any department or officer thereof."

Under this no one can question the right of Congress to limit the term and provide for the removal of any officer where the same is not already done by the Constitution itself. Until the act of March 2, 1867, Congress had never exercised this power with respect to this class of officers. Before that time the whole subject was suffered to remain where the Constitution itself left it.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman, is mistaken. Congress has legislated on this subject before; and I desire to refer the gentleman from Pennsylvania to several enactments on the subject.

The act of February 25, 1863, creates the office of Comptroller of the Currency, and provides that—

"He shall be appointed by the President on the nomination of the Secretary of the Treasury, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and shall hold his office for the term of five years, unless sooner removed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate."

A similar provision is carried into the act of June 3, 1864.

The act of July 13, 1866, says:

"And no officer in the military or naval service shall, in time of peace, be dismissed from service, except upon and in pursuance of the sentence of a court-martial to that effect or in commutation therefor."—Section 5, Session Laws, 92.

This was approved by President Johnson.

Mr. BROOMALL. I thank the gentleman from Ohio for the interruption; because it furnishes me with an argument. He has, however, to some extent misunderstood my remarks. I have been speaking of a certain class of officers, to wit: the heads of Departments. The power to limit the term of officers appointed by the President has, as the gentleman says, been repeatedly exercised by Congress, and it is significant that even President Johnson, whose friends now deny the power, actually approved the bill last cited by the gentleman, thereby closing his mouth upon the power of Congress to fix the term of an officer appointed by him.

I repeat my remarks had reference to the class of offices embracing that of Secretary of War; and of these I again affirm that the term was never fixed by legislation until the act of March 2, 1867. I pass over the constitutional provision authorizing the President to fill vacancies during the recess of the Senate and the several acts of Congress providing for filling vacancies caused by death, resignation, or absence, as having no bearing upon the question. The act complained of was committed in the presence of the Senate, and there was no vacancy except what the President made of his own wrong.

It is said the power of removal is necessarily incident to the power of appointment. This proposition does not seem to me to be very clear. I think it is not generally comprehended. How is the power of removal incident to the power of appointment? There is no necessary connection between the two powers. It is incident to the appointing power in this way: the power of the President to nominate officers for confirmation by the Senate is a continuous power. It exists at all times, so that the President may, while an officer is in, nominate his successor, and when that successor is confirmed it operates as a supersedeas upon the incumbent and finishes his term by indirection. It is in that way the power of removal is incident to the power of appointment, but in no other.

The power of removal provided in the Constitution therefore requires the concurrent action of the President and Senate, and such has been the practice under this Government from the time of the adoption of the Constitution up to the present time, as far as I know. Until now, I believe, no President, even the most grasping after unlimited power, has ventured to remove an officer appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, during the session of that body, without its consent. Everybody knows that the universal practice during the session of the Senate is to terminate the term of office of an incumbent by appointing and having confirmed his successor.

It was not without reason that this daring act, committed by a man who openly boasted a short time since that he could seize the Army and Navy and set himself up dictator if he chose; it was not without reason that this daring stride in that direction should have alarmed the people and their Representatives.

But it is said that there is something in the second section of the act of August 7, 1789, which empowers the President alone to remove these officers. Let us look at that question. The only section of that act which touches the power of removal is the second section, which creates the chief clerk of the War Department and defines his duties. Among them there is that of having charge of the public records of the War Department whenever the chief office shall be vacant, from any cause whatever, or whenever the principal officer shall be removed from office by the President. Now, I say that with the exception of that passage there is not in the entire legislation of Congress, from the adoption of the Constitution to the act of March 7, 1867, one single word in any single act that touches the question of the removal of the Secretary of War. I therefore quote the entire section:

"There shall be in the said Department an inferior officer, to be appointed by said principal officer to be employed therein as he shall deem proper, and to be called the chief clerk in the Department of War; and who, whenever the said principal officer shall be removed from office by the President of the United States, or in any other case of vacancy, shall, during such vacancy, have the charge and custody of all records, books, and papers appertaining to the said Department."

Now, by the wording of this act, it would appear that the framers recognized the possibility of the Secretary of War being removed by the President. They did not expressly confer upon him the power. They seemed rather to speak of such a possible power than to confer it. If the power did not exist those words would not grant it. The most that can be claimed for them is that the framers thought such power existed then, or might at some future time be granted.

Now, if the power of which the act speaks was a power then existing, it must have been that power in the Constitution incident to the power of appointment, which could only be exercised with the consent of the Senate, because certainly no other power then existed. If it was a power to be created afterward, then the allusion to it was not itself a grant of power. This hypothesis is a very probable one, because, in the creation of the office of chief clerk, the future was to be looked to. All duties which future legislation might give rise to, as far as they could be foreseen, might well be provided for, and who could say that the power of removal might not at some time be conferred on the President alone? In either or any point of view this statute cannot be construed by the most ingenious reasoning as conferring on the President alone any power of removal whatever.

But let us look at the absurdity into which the opposite argument would lead us. If the President has power to remove, then by the act of 1795 and the act of 1863 he has the power to defeat the constitutional provision altogether and take the entire government of the country in his own hands in defiance of the Senate. Because by those acts he may fill vacancies for six months, and if he can create them at will he may fill them at successive intervals of six months during his entire term.

But, sir, grant the absurdity, if it is possible, and then comes the act of March 2, 1867, the first section of which is as follows:

"That every person holding any civil office to which he has been appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and every person who shall hereafter be appointed to any such office and shall become duly qualified to act therein, is, and shall be entitled to hold such office until a successor shall have been in like manner appointed and duly qualified, except as herein otherwise provided: Provided, That the Secretaries of State, of the Treasury, of War, of the Navy, and of the Interior, the Postmaster General, and the Attorney General, shall hold their offices respectively for and during the term of the President by whom they may have been appointed, and for one month thereafter, subject to removal by and with the advice and consent of the Senate."

40TH CONG....2D SESS.

This act for the first time fixes the term of the Secretary of War, and forbids his removal except under its provisions. The term it fixes is until a successor shall be duly appointed and qualified, except first that it empowers the President during the recess of Congress to suspend for cause—a feature which I am not considering now, because it is immaterial—and second that it makes a provision with reference to Cabinet officers, which I will hereafter consider. If there is anything in the act of 1789, or any other act which confers the power of removal on the President alone, this act repeals it, and the whole power of appointment and removal rests solely upon the Constitution and the act of 1867. Now, this act operates upon all officers who come within its provisions; but it is said by my colleague [Mr. WOODWARD] that Mr. Stanton does not. I am curious to know why not? He holds a civil office. He was appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate. In these particulars he answers the description of persons embraced in the provisions of the statute.

It is contended, however, that somehow the proviso takes the case of Mr. Stanton out of the act. How does it do so? It only limits the term of the Secretary of War still further than it is limited by the law itself; that is, it makes it expire one month after the end of the term of the President by whom he was appointed. Does that take him out of the statute? It is difficult to see how it does. He was an officer of the Government; he had been appointed and confirmed; he answers all the requisites of the statute. Now, it may be that the proviso does not relate to his case, and this is all that can be said. If it does not relate to his individual case, then as to him the statute stands without the proviso, and then his term will expire when his successor shall have been duly appointed and qualified, and thanks to an overruling Providence that time has not yet arrived.

But suppose the proviso relates to Mr. Stanton, then what does it do? It limits his term more than the act itself limits it; that is to say, it ends his term on April 4, 1865, one month after Mr. Lincoln's first term ended, or on March 2, 1867, the time of the passage of the act, or on April 4, 1869, the end of the term of Mr. Johnson, unless he shall have justice done him before that time. Now, the first of these is impossible. We can do a great many things, but we cannot enact that an officer who holds his office under the laws as they existed before our action shall have his term of office cut off at a time antecedent to our action. I submit that that is an impossibility.

The second supposed ending of the term is inconsistent with the acts of all the officers of the Government, from the President down, all of whom have recognized Mr. Stanton as Secretary of War since that date. But let it be noted that not only Mr. Stanton but the Secretary of the Navy, the Secretary of State, and the Secretary of the Treasury, all come within the same category; and if the term of Mr. Stanton ended with the passage of the act then the term of Mr. Seward ended, and it is barely possible that we have not got Alaska and St. Thomas, the icebergs and the earthquakes, for want of a proper Secretary of State to negotiate the bargain. The argument proves too much if it proves anything, because it proves that every contract entered into by Mr. McCulloch, from the date of the statute to the present time, is null and void for want of a competent Secretary of the Treasury, and it would be curious to know what the public creditors would say to that.

I submit, then, that only the third alternative, the third date for the ending of the term, is possible; and that is the 4th day of April, 1869, one month after the termination of the term of the present incumbent of the presidential chair, and before that date shall have arrived the power of this bad and desperate man to do mischief will, in one way or the other, by lapse of time or by impeachment, have ceased.

What is meant by the "expiration of the term of the President by whom he was appointed?" Let us look at the object of the act. It was to prevent the President from corrupting what are improperly called his "constitutional advisers." It was to prevent him from bribing them with offices to which high pay and honors are attached to give him opinions and advice only such as are palatable to him. Now, I am inclined to think the history of the country will show that there has been necessity for an enactment of this kind, for he has succeeded in getting in that way a good deal, far too much for the country, of this bad and bribed and paid advice. The proviso was inserted with no reference to the present President. His officers were included in the act itself. It was inserted with no reference to him. It was intended for the purpose of allowing his successor one month in which to change his Cabinet, if he should be so disposed.

But there is another view of this question I desire to present. At the expiration of Mr. Lincoln's first term Mr. Stanton needed no reappointment to be continued in office; neither did he when Mr. Johnson became President. By the law as it stood before the act of 1867 his continuance in office and his recognition were equivalent to a reappointment. He was, therefore, in effect, as the law then stood, really appointed by Mr. Johnson.

That is the only way in which the proviso can be held to apply to Mr. Stanton. I repeat, then, the statute embraces Mr. Stanton's case in so many words; and the proviso, so far from exempting him from the act, only still further limited his term of office, and in no point of view can his term of office be yet held to have ended.

Hence Mr. Stanton is within the act, and the President is properly chargeable with violating the law. Let him, then, be impeached, tried, and, if found guilty, punished according to the Constitution and laws. If we cannot impeach this man of the crimes that are charged against him, and of which the country knows him to be guilty, it will be better that we should abolish the impeaching power altogether, and declare to the world that the President of the United States, like the king, can do no wrong. Let us open the jails and turn loose the weak and the poor and the lowly who are charged with crime, or let us mete out to those in high places the even-handed and exact justice which we mete to the meanest and the lowest criminal.

Impeachment.

SPEECH OF HON. T. A. PLANTS,
OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 24, 1868,

On the resolutions reported by the Committee on Reconstruction for the impeachment of the President.

Mr. PLANTS. Mr. Speaker, the question now before us is, in my opinion, one of too grave and transcendent importance to be discussed or decided upon any mere partisan considerations. It is a question that will try to its center the stability of our very form of government; but, sir, it is a question that we, as Representatives of the people, dare not evade. Sir, through all the long controversy between the President and Congress, I have steadily voted against resorting to this last extreme measure. I have not so voted and acted because I believed the President was honestly striving to perform his great and difficult duties as the Constitution, the laws, and his oath of office required, but because I have felt myself in part responsible for his occupancy of his position, and because I hoped that we could save the Republic even with him at its head.

I do not propose to recount the scenes through which we have passed in the last six or seven years. These scenes have passed into enduring history. No other nation upon earth could have survived the conflict through which we have passed. Treason, in the grandest form and magnitude ever embodied in armed rebellion, struck at the life of the Republic, and held its destiny in doubt through years of devastating war and carnage. Hundreds of thousands of the bravest and best of our people gave their lives that our country might live. The resources of the land were exhausted to meet the expenses of the great conflict. Our homes were draped in mourning for the untimely dead. The maimed and mutilated survivors meet us at every step we take. Widows and orphaned children, with which the land is full, are perpetual reminders of the matchless crime of those who inaugurated the step. Sir, at the cost of these and other nameless sacrifices, the armed rebellion was at length crushed, and every patriot hoped that the country would have repose and be permitted to restore the waste of the war; to establish our finances upon a sound basis, that labor might find an adequate reward for its toil and our institutions become firmly established upon the solid foundation of justice and freedom defined by law.

And to this end those who had saved the life of the nation were disposed to go to the extreme of leniency and forbearance to those who had brought upon us this great calamity. But, unhappily, it soon became manifest that although the physical power, the armed legions, of treason had been broken, its spirit, its hatred of the Government, its vindictive purpose still lived, and only waited an opportunity to gratify its vengeance upon those who had conquered it. If this spirit and purpose were confined to the States which formed the confederacy, and relied for its success upon another trial at arms, we might well regard it with indifference. But such, I regret to say, is not the case. The sentiment of loyalty or of treason cannot be bounded by geographical lines. The defeated leaders of the South have their sympathizers everywhere. It is not more strange that they should be found in Massachusetts and New York than in Virginia and Texas. Bold, bad, ambitious men are found in all latitudes and in all countries. All history is but the record of such men seeking power by whatever means promise them success. Men of genius and power to command, like Napoleon, will seek it by force of arms. Smaller men adopt the arts of the demagogue, and attempt to do by fraud and deception what they have neither the intellect nor the courage to do in a more manly way.

And here, Mr. Speaker, is, I apprehend, the real source of our danger. I know that the air is rife with muttered threats of driving the Representatives of the people from these Halls by force. But I do not anticipate such a movement under present circumstances. What the danger might be if we had a mercenary Army, officered by ambitious leaders who could be made the pliant tools of an aspiring and able chieftain, we need not stop to inquire. Happily we have no such able chieftain. And more happily still, we have no such pliant tools in the persons of our noble military officers.

Louis Napoleon, the perjured President of the French Republic, was able, by means of his army, to overthrow the constitution which he had sworn to support, to murder the representatives of the people, to drench the streets of Paris with the best blood of the citizens of

HO. OF REPS.

Impeachment—Mr. Boutwell.

40TH CONG....2D SESS.

France, to fill his dungeons with victims whose only offense was their love of country; and to send uncounted thousands to die in exile—a fate infinitely worse than sudden death. He was able, by these means, to usurp supreme power, and, clambering over the ruins, the constitution, the liberties of the people, slaughtered thousands of French patriots to seat himself on the throne of his bastard empire, where he still sits the unquestioned despot. But Louis Napoleon was a man of genius, and he was surrounded and sustained by a set of ambitious military chieftains, willing to be his tools—"To bow the pregnant hinges of the knee where thrift would follow fawning." And he and they had a mercenary army to obey and execute their bloody edicts.

I know, sir, the President has told the country that he could have followed this example and made himself Dictator. I do not know that he has come to the conclusion at last to make the attempt. I know he has been called upon through his partisan press to do so. I do not know but those who surround him may have kept this bright example before him until his reason has been disturbed and he fancies the prize within his grasp. If such is the case he is simply an object of pity. I have never had an unkind feeling toward the President. I have no private grievances. I would to-day give the best year of the few remaining of my life if I could, with safety to the country, stop this proceeding and blot out the shame to my country. But this cannot be.

But, sir, fortunately for our country, if any such scheme has been meditated, the President is not Napoleon. Grant and Sherman and Thomas and Sheridan and Pope and Meade and Schofield and the rest of our immortal heroes are not the tools Napoleon had to work with. And, last of all, the loyal millions of free American citizens are not the stuff that slaves are made of. There will be no coup d'etat!

But, sir, a citadel may be mined as well as taken by storm. And those who have failed in their bold and bloody attack upon the citadel of the Republic and still cherish their hatred, by allying themselves with others of like sympathies, are mining beneath you to-day. And, sir, I am compelled, regretfully as I am forced to the conclusion, to believe that our President is engineering the desperate work.

Mr. Speaker, I have no time in the few minutes allotted to me to enter upon the discussion, and close by saying that, however unpleasant the duty, I must vote for the resolution.

Impeachment.

SPEECH OF HON. G. S. BOUTWELL,

OF MASSACHUSETTS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 24, 1868,

On the resolutions reported by the Committee on Reconstruction for the impeachment of the President.

MR. BOUTWELL. Mr. Speaker, it would not be strange if there were those in the House and the country who have reached the conclusion that, upon the subject of the impeachment of the President, I have on former occasions exhibited an unwonted degree of zeal, mingled possibly with rashness. Heretofore I have endeavored to do what it is my purpose to do on this occasion. I shall follow the dictates of my judgment upon the most solemn question which has been presented to this country during its existence.

But, sir, I do not hesitate to say what I believe is due to this House, that this is a more fortunate moment for the consummation of a great act of public justice than the former occasion when I pressed the subject upon the attention of this body and the country with more zeal than I can now command. I had followed the windings and the machinations of the President for nearly twelve months. I had studied his character with the advantage of greater opportunities than most of my associates here possessed, and I had endeavored to ascertain, as well as I might, the ultimate purpose which he had in view. Having become convinced, from the testimony presented to the House and the country, and from other circumstances which were known to me upon evidence which I was not permitted upon my conscience and judgment to question, that he was guilty of purposes not disclosed upon the printed page, I could not hesitate in reaching the conclusion that upon the report of the majority of the Committee on the Judiciary, Andrew Johnson was, in contemplation of the Constitution, guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors. But I saw then what I see with more clearness now, that it was not possible to arraign, to try, to convict the Chief Magistrate of a country like this, unless that proceeding were sustained by the judgment of the House of Representatives, of the Senate, and of the country. I cannot speak of the Senate, but by the House of Representatives and by the country such demonstrations have already been made as must satisfy us that there is no question as to what the judgment of the House is to be here and now, or that that judgment is finally to be sustained by the judgment of the Senate.

His crime is presented to us to-day in two forms, based, however, upon the same facts. First, he is guilty of having violated the Constitution and his oath of office, by which he pledged himself to the country to sustain the Constitution in good faith and in all its parts. If he has violated the Constitution he is guilty of the highest crime for the purposes of impeachment of which he could be guilty. In sustaining the position that he is so guilty I shall be obliged to refer, but with great brevity and only for the purpose of stating a view of the question which has not been presented, to the provisions of the Constitution upon this subject.

It is provided, in reference to the President, in the second section of article two of the Constitution, that—

"He shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States, whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law."

"The President shall have power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate, by granting commissions, which shall expire at the end of their next session."

It is clear from the text of the Constitution, as well as from all the commentaries thereon, from its adoption to the present day, that there is here no power to remove from office. The power is to appoint. Under the first clause of the constitutional provision I have read the power to appoint can be exercised by the President only upon a given condition; and that is, the Senate being in session, that the Senate concur in the appointment, which of itself works a removal from office of the previous incumbent.

All the authorities are to the point that the power of removal is in the President and that the proceeding cannot be initiated by any other officer or branch of the Government; but it is a power to be exercised only by the concurrent action of the Senate sustaining the appointment which, when so sustained, in itself supersedes the officer who previously held the place and he is thereby removed. Can anything be plainer than the proposition that when the President of the United States laid his hand upon the Secretary of War and removed him from office and appointed another person Secretary of War ad interim, and all without the advice and consent of the Senate, he violated the Constitution and stands upon his own confession and upon the record already condemned?

Secondly, he is guilty of a high crime in that he has violated the tenure-of-office act. An examination will show that he is guilty whether the tenure-of-office act be unconstitutional, as claimed by his friends, or whether it be constitutional. An examination of the first section of the tenure-of-office act will show it covers all time, as well when the Senate is in session as when the Senate is not in session. When the Senate is in session the operation of the tenure-of-office act is in strict accordance with the provision of the Constitution which I have already read. If the tenure-of-office act had never been passed it would still have been unconstitutional for the President, during the session of the Senate, to have removed Mr. Stanton or any other officer appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate without obtaining such advice and consent.

I beg the indulgence of the House while I read that first section. It is as follows:

"That every person holding any civil office to which he has been appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and every person who shall hereafter be appointed to any such office, and shall become duly qualified to act therein, is, and shall be, entitled to hold such office until a successor shall have been in like manner appointed and duly qualified, except as herein otherwise provided: Provided, That the Secretaries of State, of the Treasury, of War, of the Navy, and of the Interior, the Postmaster General, and the Attorney General, shall hold their offices respectively for and during the term of the President by whom they may have been appointed and for one month thereafter, subject to removal by and with the advice and consent of the Senate."

Assume that the tenure-of-office act is unconstitutional in that it does not allow the President to remove an officer when the Senate is not in session, yet it must be admitted that if the tenure-of-office act were not in existence the President could not, under the Constitution, have removed Mr. Stanton during the session of the Senate without first submitting his successor to the Senate and securing the approval of that body of the nomination thus made. To this extent, then, the tenure-of-office act is but an affirmation of the constitutional provision that I have read.

In the tenure-of-office act we have done that further, also, which we had a perfect right to do, imposed a penalty declaring its violation to be a misdemeanor punishable with fine and imprisonment. Under and by this act, therefore, a violation of the Constitution in the particular stated, is a high misdemeanor indictable and impeachable. The President has made himself amenable for a violation of the Constitution, and in that particular he is subject to the penalties imposed upon him by the sixth section of the tenure-of-office act. So, sir, whatever theory of law may be entertained in this House or country, he is still convicted on the facts before the House and country of having violated the Constitution, of having violated the tenure-of-office act where it reaffirms the provision of the Constitution, and made himself subject to the penalty imposed upon him. Consequently, he is amenable to that provision of the Constitution which enables this House to arraign him and bring him before the Senate for trial; and if there convicted and adjudged guilty, the Senate will remove him from office, and may declare him forever incapable of holding any office of honor, profit, or trust in the United States.

I proceed now to call the attention of the House to the constitutional meaning of the word "term" used in the tenure-of-office act. We find in the Constitution itself the definition of this word. It is by no means doubtful. I understand from the discussion that the friends of the President claim that Mr. Stanton was serving as Secretary of War in the term of Mr. Johnson. Mr. Johnson, by the Constitution, has himself no term as President of the United States. The word "term" is defined in the Constitution, and is used in this law in its constitutional significance.

40TH CONG....2D SESS.

Impeachment—Mr. Kerr.

H. OF REPS.

"The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. He shall hold his office during the term of four years, and together with the Vice President, chosen for the same term, be elected as follows:"—Article 2, section 1.

"In case of the removal of the President from office or of his death, resignation, or inability to discharge the powers and duties of the said office, the same shall devolve upon the Vice President."—Article 2, section 1.

Not the office, not the term, but the duties and powers of the office during the term for which the President was elected shall devolve upon the Vice President. Nothing can be clearer than that the word in the first section of the tenure-of-office act is necessarily defined by the Constitution; and it was in Mr. Lincoln's term that Mr. Stanton was removed by the usurpation of Mr. Johnson in violation of the tenure-of-office act.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CARY] says that the opinion of the Supreme Court upon the tenure-of-office act is required. Will he try the President upon the opinion of four judges of the Supreme Court, that number being a majority of a quorum under the law? The Constitution itself has furnished better protection for the President. There are fifty-four Senators, and he can claim acquittal unless thirty-six Senators pronounce him guilty.

But, sir, more than that; the Senate for this purpose is the highest tribunal of the land. I not only hold that there is no reason or right in the assumption that the Senate should take the judgment of the Supreme Court or any other court, but I hold with unflinching fidelity that it will be the duty of the Supreme Court, as well as any other, to accept the decision of the Senate for all the purposes of this inquiry. But, in any event under the Constitution for the purposes of this trial, there is no appeal from the decision of the Senate to the Supreme Court.

But, sir, I understand that very recently, following the suggestion made upon the other side of the House, the President has informed the Senate that his intentions were not bad. Sir, it is too late to enter this plea. The evidence is too massive and overwhelming as to his intentions. In a criminal court a person convicted may plead good intentions, previous good conduct, and reputation in palliation of the sentence; but when he does offer that plea he opens an inquiry as to what his conduct has been. And I ask, concerning the President of the United States, what have been his purposes and what have been his intentions? Sir, upon the record, the correspondence between the President and General Grant, it is conclusively shown that not only did he not intend to appeal to the courts of law for the purpose of ascertaining whether Mr. Stanton had a legal right to the office, but he intended by a contrivance, by a fraud, by a conspiracy, by a usurpation, in defiance of law, to oust Mr. Stanton from the office. If, then, General Grant was not disposed to hold the office against the judgment of the Senate, should that body not sustain the suspension of Mr. Stanton, he asserts upon the record that it was his purpose to appoint a successor who would resist the reinstatement of the lawful Secretary of War.

Upon his own confession and the testimony of his Cabinet officers, it was his purpose to introduce a man who would resist the restoration of Mr. Stanton upon the judgment of the Senate under the law. Is it for him to say that it was his intention to take the judgment of the courts? But in any event can a man, much less a public officer, break a law without peril to himself upon the plea that he desires to test the validity of the law. The crime is in breaking the law with the intention of so doing. More than that, the testimony of Mr. Brown, his own witness, is that he went so far as to say that he would vicariously suffer the imprisonment which the law would have meted out to General Grant if he had entered into the conspiracy.

Sir, I am not accustomed to eulogize public men. During the war through which we have just passed my heart was filled with emotions of gratitude to those who stood by the country in the hour of its peril—Grant, Sherman, George H. Thomas, their associates, and followers. But, sir, in these recent days when this man, imitating Sylla, the dictator of Rome, who subverted the liberty of his country through the corruption of the army; imitating Louis Napoleon, who trampled the republic under his feet and raised an empire upon its ruins through the corruptions which he introduced into the armies of France, it is the most glorious, ennobling, heart-cheering evidence of the existence of the highest quality of Roman virtue in the present generation that those three men, leaders in the recent contest for liberty and Union, have spurned the inducement of power, have withstood Mr. Johnson's efforts to corrupt them and alienate them from their country. They have rebuked, as words cannot, the assumption of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] that three fourths of the Army are with the enemies of the country.

Now, sir, what is the history of this man, for he puts his character into the case now before the country. Is not he the man who in the Senate Chamber on the ever-to-be lamented 4th of March, 1865, humiliated the nation and all the people, dishonored us in the presence of the civilized world, disgraced the office he held, while Booth was wending his criminal way through the crowds in the areas of the Capitol for the purpose of assassinating the President of the nation who within forty days thereafter was destined to fall by the hand of the assassin? Is not he the man who, in violation of his oath of office, appointed men to places of trust and power throughout the ten States of the South who could not take the oath of office prescribed by the law of the country? Is not he the man who disseized the recently emancipated freedmen of millions of acres of the public domain which had been solemnly dedicated to them by the laws of the country, and turned those lands over to rebels who had brought upon us the misery and woe through which we had then just passed? Is not he the man who surrendered without compensation, without limitation, without condition, railways on which the Government had expended $40,000,000 of money and the labor of thousands and tens of thousands of men in the Army? Is not he the man who by his machinations has kept ten States unreconstructed, who has trampled under foot the laws, who has given encouragement, aid, and comfort to the enemies of the country throughout those ten States? Is not he the man who used his power as Chief Magistrate to delay and postpone the collection of debts due to the United States by railways for rolling-stock sold them on credit by his order, and then by virtue of another order issued by himself received and appropriated that money to his personal use? Ay, sir, is he not the man who if his crimes were marshaled and arrayed before the country would be, in the public judgment, condemned as the greatest usurper of modern times? He offers his character, his reputation. He challenges an examination of his conduct. His crimes are multiplied; his virtues can not be discovered.

Mr. Speaker, in the ten minutes that remain, I can but indicate the plot in which the President is engaged. He desired first to get control of the War Department, in order that, as in 1861, the munitions of war, arms, and material might be used for the purpose of enabling him to succeed in his aspirations to be President of the United States. He knew that if he could corrupt the leaders of the Army, if he could bend these men to his will, these ten States were in his control, and that he could send to the Democratic convention to be holden on the 4th of July next men who would sustain his claim for the Presidency. Then, upon the allegation which he could well carry out and which no other man could make good, that with the Army and his influence among the rebels of the South, whom he had brought to his support by his previous violations of law, he could secure the electoral votes of those ten States by excluding the negroes whom we have enfranchised from all participation in the election. Succeeding in this, we were to be met next February with the electoral votes of those ten States given for himself as President of the United States. If by fortune, as was his hope, he should receive a sufficient number of votes in the North to make a majority, then, with the support of the Army which he had corrupted, he had determined to be inaugurated President of the United States at the hazard of civil war. To-day, sir, we escape from these evils and dangers.

He will soon be deprived of the power to carry on his machinations. Of all the Army but one man has been found to obey his will, and he old and impotent and weak, an object of sympathy and compassion rather than the subject of hatred and revenge.

Sir, this day the country is saved. There may be momentary excitement, pecuniary interests may for a brief period suffer, but the sun himself often sets behind the clouds of the West while distant thunders alarm the timid and the lightnings that illumine the firmament terrify the weak. Yet the king of the heavens reappears in the morning and bathes the earth in celestial beauty.

Remove this man from the office he holds. Redeem the Republic. Set an example that all posterity will gladly imitate if unhappily like circumstances should again arise. And, sir, to posterity and to history we may safely appeal. Reluctant in action, tardy, possibly, this House and the people of this country have been; but they are wedded to justice; they believe in duty. The people who furnished two and a half million men for the suppression of the rebellion, who passed safely through the crisis of the murder of a beloved Chief Magistrate, can now remove from office a man who has broken the laws, violated the Constitution, usurped power, and attempted to seduce and corrupt the Army. In due form and under the Constitution this proceeding will go on. Private rights will be respected, the public interests will be guarded and fostered, and the nation itself, in reputation and power, sensibly advanced among the peoples of the earth.

Impeachment.

SPEECH OF HON. MICHAEL C. KERR,
OF INDIANA,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
February 24, 1868.

On the resolutions reported by the Committee on Reconstruction for the impeachment of the President.

Mr. KERR: Mr. Speaker, in the views I shall express upon the grave matter now pending before the House, I shall divest myself of every impulse of the mere partisan. This solemn occasion affords inspiration that should elevate every gentleman charged with any duty here above the passions and motives of either personal or party interest. I, and those with whom I act in this House, had no knowledge whatever of the purpose of the Executive to do the act for doing which this movement is again inaugurated for his deposition. We are therefore free in every sense to submit to the guidance alone of reason and duty. I do not make these remarks by way of reproach against the President, nor to express or intimate any objection to his course. I shall present to the House and the country my own opinions as fully and frankly as my poor ability shall enable me to do. In this hour of the nation's peril, I know not how to be false to my convictions.

Impeachment—Mr. Kerr.

Mr. Speaker, why is it proposed now to take the official life of the President? What great public interest demands that a coordinate department of the Government shall be stricken down? Is it to complete the subordination of every function and power of the Government to the legislative will? Is it to clinch and rivet forever upon the people of this country a centralized congressional despotism? It would seem so. But if not so intended it certainly can bear no other fruit unless speedily rebuked by an indignant people.

Are the institutions of our country, the already shaken foundations of our Government, to be subjected to this fearful trial, to be put to this final test to maintain one man in office? I trust Congress is not so wedded to the service of Mr. Stanton as to be willing, for his sake, to invite the return of civil strife, to neglect and imperil every material interest of the people, and, in the midst and by the aid of the pervading excitement, to depose the Chief Magistrate of the Republic. He has not entitled himself to such devotion either by his example or his past or present conduct. He seeks now to be kept by the power of one Department in the service of another, in the Cabinet councils and confidence of another to whom his presence is offensive, and who desires to be relieved of all official or personal association with him. His conduct in this particular has, to the honor of mankind, no parallel in the history of civil and civilized Governments. His indecent, unnatural, and cruel attempt to force himself by such means upon the Executive can excite nothing but odium, disgust, and abhorrence in all just-minded men. It violates at once every rule of good taste, good breeding, and official propriety, and is shocking and repulsive in itself.

Mr. Speaker, it is said by his defenders that he is afraid the President may violate some law, if he be removed from the War Department. It is pretended by them that some great conspiracy may be conceived and executed against the Radical party if Mr. Stanton be not maintained in forced and hateful official relations with the President. It comes with evil and Jesuitical consistency from them or him, after the President by their joint action has been stripped of almost all power, to pretend any honest fear that he will either violate the laws or endanger any interest of the country. They have signally failed by any decent legal proof to establish against him one single act or fact that indicates an unpatriotic purpose, although they have instituted against him an inquisition that has not hesitated to resort to open and shameless perjury, and subornation of perjury.

These baseless, if not insincere, pretensions of fear come with infinitely detestable grace from Mr. Stanton, who has in the last seven years violated, a hundred times and more, laws of most precious and vital importance to the well-being of society and the liberties of the citizens. These violations have been so numerous and so palpable, that he invoked the protecting shield of congressional legislation against their consequences. He did not appeal in vain to Congress for such aid, for his partisans here speedily interposed the impassable barrier of indemnity laws between him and the victims of his illegal acts. He was not willing to attempt to vindicate himself before the judicial tribunals of the country, where he could have a fair and impartial trial before a jury of his peers, more or less of whom he could challenge from the jury peremptorily, and from which he could challenge jurors indefinitely for cause, for the forming and expression of opinions as to the merits of the case, or for any cause which would render any juror incompetent, under the established rules of law, to give him an impartial trial.

Yet by a refinement of partisan malignity and cruelty the President is to be impeached by a grand inquest, the House of Representatives, more than three fourths of the members of which are bitterly and avowedly, and many of them personally, hostile to him. In the presentation of articles of impeachment, the members of this House must act judicially; but to act judicially in any just sense there must coexist entirely unprepossessed, unprejudiced, and impartial minds. Can any degree of charity persuade any sane man that these indispensable requisites to a fair trial have for months past existed amongst any considerable number of the majority of this House toward the President? Every intelligent man in the House or the country knows they have not—knows that for a year past, by many here, he has been denounced as guilty of the violation of numerous laws subjecting him to impeachment. But he is to be compelled to answer at the bar of the Senate to an indictment found against him by such a grand jury. The most petty criminal in the country—the man who should steal a loaf of bread, or rob a hen-roost, or swindle his fellow at a game of chance—would be awarded protection against the presentments of such a grand jury.

But if such persons should be indicted by a partial or an impartial grand jury, they would, under every system of criminal jurisprudence known to our country, be entitled to a trial by an impartial jury, elected and chosen in such manner as to exclude all incompetent persons. The meanest violator of his mere civil contracts or duties, as well as the lowest offender against any criminal law, is guaranteed a fair and impartial trial. But how is it with the Chief Magistrate of the nation when summoned to answer for "high crimes and misdemeanors?" Is common sense, common justice to be stultified by the assumption that he is entitled to a less fair and impartial trial? Does the Constitution, or did its wise and just framers intend to exclude him alone from the protection of such a trial? Who are his triers, his judges, to whose jurisdiction he is compelled to submit, whether they be his friends or his enemies, whether their minds be prepossessed and prejudiced against him or not, whether they have formed and expressed their opinions against him or not? They are the Senators who constitute the Senate of the United States.

But that body, without inquiry or evidence, or giving him an opportunity to be heard in person or by counsel, have in secret session, with partisan zeal and indecent haste already condemned the President. When he communicated to them on last Friday, the fact that he had removed Mr. Stanton and appointed General Thomas, Secretary of War ad interim, they went into executive session and adopted the following resolution:

"Whereas the Senate have received and considered the communication of the President, stating that he had removed Edwin M. Stanton, Secretary of War, and had designated the Adjutant General of the Army to act as Secretary of War ad interim; therefore,

Resolved by the Senate of the United States, That under the Constitution and laws of the United States, the President has not the power to remove the Secretary of War and designate any other officer to perform the duties of that office."

Yet to their bar he is to be summoned for trial. It is a solemn mockery of justice to call any such proceeding a fair and impartial trial. When the Senate resolves itself into a high court of impeachment it cannot divest itself of the recollection or the influence of what it has just done in its political character. It would seem to any common and fair mind indelicate, if not impossible, for honorable Senators to assume the sacred office of judge after having thus committed themselves against the President and prejudged his case. This conduct on their part is a sad but logical commentary on the folly and crime of giving to the Senate any agency or control whatever in the removal of such officers. It does not belong to them under the Constitution. It is claimed by them in violation of the settled construction of the Constitution and the uniform practice of the Government for a period of over seventy years.

The framers of the Constitution conferred upon the Senate a mere advisory duty in connection with the appointment of such high officers. This duty is not executive; it is merely designed to impose a check upon the selection of unsuitable or incompetent officers. The Senate can well concur in appointments without destroying its capacity to sit as an impartial court for the trial of impeachments. The Constitution declares that "the executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States," and that "he shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed," and makes him Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy. How can he discharge these high duties if he is to be made a mere satellite of the Senate or of Congress? If the Senate is invested with a part of the executive power the unity and efficiency of the executive department are thus impaired, if not destroyed. The wise and philosophic purpose of the framers of the Constitution was to keep the several great Departments of the Government as distinct and separate from each other as possible, to the end that neither should invade the functions of the other or usurp its powers in order to strengthen itself and erect a centralized despotism on the foundations of the Republic. The history of the formation of the Government sustains these views in the fullest and amplest manner.

But, Mr. Speaker, the power of removal is an executive function. It most directly affects the capacity of the President to see that the laws be faithfully executed. Give this power in whole or in part, and if you give it in part you do thereby for all practical purposes give it absolutely to the Senate, and you at once destroy the efficiency and equality of the executive department. You also, as the pending controversy between the Senate and the President painfully illustrates, utterly destroy the judicial fairness, purity, and impartiality of the Senate. It cannot be otherwise until Senators cease to be human beings and become better than men.

The President finds it necessary to remove an offensive, unfaithful, or corrupt member of his constitutional official household, and, under the civil-tenure law, he reports the fact with his reasons to the Senate, being thus compelled to assume the odious character of a public prosecutor, and the Senate refuse to consent to the removal. But the House, possessing the sole power of impeachment, may then impeach the officer so retained in his position, and present formal articles of impeachment to the Senate. But the latter have already decided that he shall not be removed. Then what becomes of their judicial impartiality to try an impeachment?

Suppose, again, Mr. Speaker, that the Senate consent to his removal, that consent does not make it the legal duty of the President to remove him; and he then, upon further reflection or mutual explanations or additional evidence, refuses to remove him, and then the House prefers against him articles of impeachment, is the Senate in any better condition to try him with decent impartiality and fairness? It thus becomes apparent that the violation of the Constitution involved in the enactment and enforcement of the civil-tenure law can only lead to conflicts between coordinate departments of the Government, disturbing the public peace, destroying the harmony that is so vitally important to the successful administration of the Government, and rapidly undermining its fundamental principles. Besides, the moment a Cabinet officer loses the confidence of the President, and his removal is desired by the latter, he then naturally turns to the Senate for protection against the removal, which a proper sense of honor should compel him to avoid by an immediate resignation. He becomes a satellite and partisan of the Senate, and transfers his allegiance from his constitutional chief to them. The very fountains of confidence, private and personal honor, are corrupted, demoralization intervenes, and the people suffer.

Mr. Speaker, these great dangers were distinctly foreseen by the framers of the Constitution, and guarded against by them both in that great instrument and in the practical organization of the Departments of the Government by the first Congress in 1789. In the act of August 7, 1789, organizing the War Department, the exclusive power of the President to remove the Secretary is distinctly and expressly recognized. That contemporary construction of the Constitution has been ever since acquiesced in by the people, recognized by the courts, adopted by every Executive, and has never failed to protect and promote the public welfare. The Congress by which this construction was adopted was preëminently qualified to construe the Constitution, because very many of its ablest members were also members of the convention by which it was framed. Mr. Madison was a member, and during the discussion of the subject in the House in 1789 he indulged in the following exceedingly forcible and just reflections:

"In another point of view it is proper that this interpretation should now take place rather than at a time when the exigency of the case may require the exercise of the power of removal. At present the disposition of every gentleman is to seek the truth and abide by its guidance when it is discovered. I have reason to believe the same disposition prevails in the Senate. But will this be the case when some individual officer of high rank draws into question the capacity of the President, with the Senate, to effect his removal? If we leave the Constitution to take its course it can never be expounded until the President shall think it expedient to exercise the right of removal if he supposes he has it; then the Senate may be induced to set up their pretensions. And will they decide so calmly as at this time, when no important officer in any of the great Departments is appointed to influence their judgment? The imagination of no member here or of the Senate or of the President himself is heated or disturbed by faction. If ever a proper moment for decisions should offer it must be one like the present."—Annals of Congress, vol. 1, page 547.

Mr. Madison, in the same debate, further said:

"On the constitutionality of the declaration of presidential power I have no manner of doubt."

The most distinguished men in that Congress sustained the same views, and they were incorporated into the laws then enacted. Need I add that they are worthy of profound respect? That they announce the true interpretation of the Constitution on this great question seems to me to be so clear as to remove all serious doubt. The unvarying subsequent practice of the Government certainly establishes that construction, and reduces the civil-tenure law to the character of a law enacted for the accomplishment of mere partisan ends. But gentlemen should be able to point the country not only to a law whose validity is clear, but especially to such overwhelming proofs of criminality as remove all doubt of guilt, before they shock the country and surprise the civilized world by the removal of a Chief Magistrate legally chosen by the people and fill his place with a man never chosen by the people—a man chosen to another office by the people of a single State, and now repudiated by his own constituency.

But I invite special attention to another citation, bearing directly upon this point and affecting one of the parties to this controversy. I read from the message of the President to the Senate giving his reasons for the suspension of Mr. Stanton in the first instance, and every statement I read remains wholly uncontradicted, and cannot be truthfully contradicted. He says:

"That tenure-of-office law did not pass without notice. Like other acts it was sent to the President for approval. As is my custom, I submitted its consideration to my Cabinet for their advice upon the question whether I should approve it or not. It was a grave question of constitutional law, in which I would, of course, rely most upon the opinion of the Attorney General, and of Mr. Stanton, who had once been Attorney General.

"Every member of my Cabinet advised me that the proposed law was unconstitutional. All spoke without doubt or reservation, but Mr. Stanton's condemnation of the law was the most elaborate and emphatic. He referred to the constitutional provisions, the debates in Congress, especially to the speech of Mr. Buchanan when a Senator, to the decisions of the Supreme Court, and to the usage from the beginning of the Government, through every successive Administration, all concurring to establish the right of removal as vested by the Constitution in the President. To all these he added the weight of his own deliberate judgment, and advised me that it was my duty to defend the power of the President from usurpation and to veto the law."

Mr. Stanton is forever estopped to question the patriotism of the President for desiring his removal, or to say that in removing him he has committed any high crime or misdemeanor. He must be faithless, indeed, who can thus advise his chief, and then seek advantage by repudiating his own advice, his own judgment. Such conduct involves a degree of moral and political self-stultification never surpassed. His partisan supporters cannot avoid the odium of becoming voluntary parties to it, if not participants in it.

But, for the purposes of this argument, it becomes necessary to admit the validity of that law. Then let us examine its provisions, and especially those alleged to have been violated by the President. The act itself is entitled "An act regulating the tenure of certain civil offices." Its first and most material section reads as follows:

"SEC. 1. Every person holding any official office to which he has been appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and every person who shall hereafter be appointed to such office, and shall become duly qualified to act therein, is and shall be entitled to hold such office until a successor shall have been in like manner appointed and duly qualified, except as herein otherwise provided: Provided, That the Secretaries of State, of the Treasury, of War, of the Navy, and of the Interior, the Postmaster General, and the Attorney General, shall hold their offices respectively for and during the term of the President by whom they may have been appointed and for one month thereafter, subject to removal by and with the advice and consent of the Senate."

It is charged that the President has violated this section by the removal of Mr. Stanton. Let it be remembered that Mr. Stanton was never appointed by President Johnson. He was appointed by President Lincoln during his first term, about seven years ago, and has never been reappointed by any one since. Is the present Executive guilty "of high crimes and misdemeanors" by reason of his removal?

Sir, what constitutes crime? It is composed of two elements, both of which must coexist and be established by proof in every case before there can be any conviction. There must be the criminal act and the criminal intent to violate the law. Has either element been shown to exist against the President in this case? I assert, with the utmost sincerity and confidence, that there has not been and cannot be. It is assumed by the distinguished gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] that the President possesses no power of construction whatever; that that power, in every form and degree, belongs to the judiciary, and that if the law is admitted to be unconstitutional it is still the duty of the President, without question, to execute it. These positions, sir, are plausible but not tenable. The humblest officer ever charged by law with the performance of any executive or ministerial duty, by the very necessities which attend all human conduct, is compelled first to construe the law, unless it has previously received authoritative judicial construction, and then, according to his construction, to execute it. If the law, in its terms and requirements is so clear and specific as not to admit of construction at all, then it is the duty of the officer to execute it accordingly; but human laws are not always, are not generally, so framed. When they are not; when they are in terms ambiguous and their true legal meaning is uncertain, the duty of construction becomes as imperative as the duty of execution. In such cases misconstruction by the officer charged with the execution of the law is attributed to error of judgment, and not to a wicked intent to violate the law. Error of judgment is not crime, and is not punishable as such. The party who may consider himself injured thereby can always find redress by appeals or applications to the courts of justice.

Mr. Speaker, these rules and principles apply with singular appropriateness and force to the conduct of the President under the civil-tenure act. The first section of that act is ambiguous in its terms, uncertain in its meaning, susceptible of several constructions by equally honest and intelligent men or jurists, and presents a case in which presidential interpretation in the first instance became, therefore, an imperative duty. The most cursory analysis of that section discloses the fact that the heads of Departments are expressly excepted from the terms of the first part of it, and that the tenure of their offices, so far as it is fixed at all, is made different from that of other officers by the proviso to the section. They—

"Shall hold their offices respectively for and during the term of the President by whom they may have been appointed, and for one month thereafter, subject to removal sooner by and with the advice and consent of the Senate."

Mr. Stanton was not appointed by President Johnson. What effect then does that proviso have upon him? Does it prolong his tenure indefinitely so that he can never be removed unless the Senate happen to concur in the propriety of a removal? Or does it leave him to hold his position in the Cabinet at the mere pleasure of the President with a right of removal at any time under the Constitution and the preëxisting practice of the Government? Or does it absolutely, in legal effect, legislate him out of office? The act only purports to fix the tenure of Cabinet officers who were appointed by the President in whose Cabinet they are members. It certainly does not in terms embrace Mr. Stanton. It is not just or reasonable to infer that the intention of the law-makers was to compel the President to retain in his council an officer whom he does not choose. An interpretation obnoxious to so many objections ought not to be accepted unless made so clear by the terms of the law as to admit of no doubt. I think the only fair and rational construction that can be given to the act is, that it was the intention of Congress to leave the President at liberty to remove at pleasure any officer in his Cabinet not chosen by himself. This construction is, at least, in harmony with decency, official propriety, and the clear personal rights of the President. The others are not.

It is also in exact harmony with the construction placed upon the act by Senator SHERMAN when the bill was on its passage in the Senate. He, in reply to the suggestions of a Senator, that it would prevent the President from removing the Secretaries whom he did not appoint, (Secretaries Stanton, Seward, and Welles,) said:

"That the Senate had no such purpose is shown by its vote twice to make this exception. That this provision does not apply to the present case is shown by the fact that its language is so framed as not to apply to the present President. The Senator shows that himself, and argues truly that it would not prevent the present President from removing the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Secretary of State. And if I supposed that either of these gentlemen was so wanting in manhood, in honor, as to hold his place after the politest intimation by the President of the United States that his services were no longer needed, I certainly, as a Senator, would consent to his removal at any time, and so would we all."

Yet, when the President, acting upon the suggestions thus made by the distinguished Radical Senator from Ohio, politely requested Mr. Stanton to resign, he peremptorily refused, and when the President suspended him, and reported his reasons therefor to the Senate,

HO. OF REPS.

Reconstruction, &c.—Mr. Benton.

they repudiated this construction of the act, and refused to consent to his removal; and now that the President has removed him, they declare his act of removal unlawful and unconstitutional, and threaten to remove him, to depose him, to put in his place a gentleman whom his own constituency, his own State, have repudiated. If they fear not the verdict of history on this extraordinary conduct, they furnish a signal example for the application of the ancient maxim that "whom the gods would destroy they first make mad."

I hold, therefore, that there is an absolute and disgraceful failure in this case to establish against the President the commission of any high crime or misdemeanor. If the law be valid, and he has misconstrued it, still his act is but an error of judgment, and lacks every element of crime. If he has erred in judgment that error has been prompted in great part by the opinions of Mr. Stanton and the constructions of this civil-tenure act by Radical Senators. It is wonderful, it is amazing, that gentlemen are willing to go upon the record in so solemn a matter upon so shadowy and flimsy grounds.

But if my construction of this civil-tenure law is not the true and correct one, then I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the men who framed and passed it did it for the purpose of laying a trap, of building a net-work, into which they hoped to entice this high officer of the Government for the very purpose of giving them an opportunity to depose him from power and to usurp functions that never did and never ought to belong to the legislative department of the Government. But I will not put upon it this construction. I prefer to give it the other. I prefer to believe that this law was enacted, as all laws ought to be enacted, with the honest intention on the part of the law-makers to enact a law and leave it to the other proper tribunals of the country to construe and execute it until its authoritative interpretation shall have been determined by the judicial department of the Government.

Now, sir, we are told by the learned gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOWWELL] who last addressed the House that Mr. Johnson has no term of office; that he is simply the representative of the unexpired term of President Lincoln. We have it announced to this House for the first time in the history of legislation that a dead officer can have a term! What is Mr. Lincoln's term that President Johnson is called upon to fill? The Constitution says that when the President dies the duties of his office shall devolve upon the Vice President. What does that mean? It simply means, what in the uniform experience and practice of the Government it has always been held to mean, that the Vice President thenceforward becomes the President of the United States—neither more nor less. I hold, then, that every power that Mr. Johnson would possess as President of the United States, if he had been directly elected by the people, he does now possess; and those powers cannot, either by a decree of this House or by any other power, be taken from him so far as they are secured by the Constitution of the country.

Mr. Speaker, it is also urged by the majority in this House that the President has committed a high crime or misdemeanor in appointing General Thomas to act as Secretary of War ad interim. If my view as to his right to remove Mr. Stanton be correct, then it follows as an inevitable legal conclusion that his power temporarily to fill the vacancy caused by the removal exists also. The right to fill all such vacancies is expressly provided for by the act of February 13, 1795. That act gives the President power to authorize any person for a period of six months to perform the duties of the head of a Department in case of a vacancy from any cause. That act, therefore, embraced the power to supply temporarily any vacancy arising from removal or the expiration of term of office. It is said that that act has been repealed by the law of February 20, 1863, but by its terms the latter act only gave power to the President to authorize the head of any other executive Department, or any officer in either of said Departments appointed by the President, to perform for six months the duties of any Secretary whose office shall be vacant by reason of "death, resignation, absence from the seat of Government, or sickness," and in no other case. It therefore does not repeal the law of 1795 as to the power to fill temporarily any vacancy in such an office occasioned by removal or the expiration of an official term.

These several laws do not purport in terms to repeal any particular preëxisting laws, and can only do so, therefore, by implication. But, by a settled canon of legal construction, no subsequent enactment shall be allowed to repeal a former one by implication, except so far as the provisions of the last act are manifestly inconsistent with the preceding one. There is in the civil-tenure act no repealing clause. So far, therefore, as it operates to repeal former laws it must do so by implication alone. It is clear, in my judgment, that, rightly construed, the civil-tenure act leaves the power and right of the President to remove the Secretary of War untouched, unchanged, and that, therefore, the provisions of the act of 1795 are unrepealed, and give ample power to the President to authorize the Adjutant General to perform the duties of Secretary ad interim.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, it does appear to me—and when I say it I mean no personal offense or parliamentary discourtesy—that this third attack by this House upon the President, bitter, fierce, and malignant as it appears to me to be, is, if possible, more baseless and unjustifiable than either of the others, and betrays a wicked purpose, by the merciless exercise of the despotism of a dominant majority, to override and trample down the Constitution and to subordinate a coordinate department of the Government to the legislative will. I confess my inability to express the painful and disquieting extent of my conviction that, day by day and step by step, the most cherished principles and most valuable and effective safeguards in our institutions are being stricken down, and we are very rapidly approaching a complete subversion of our system of government.

It is to me a source of unfeigned surprise that intelligent and learned gentlemen can persuade themselves or attempt to persuade others that they see in the conduct of the President any evidence of unlawful, unconstitutional, wicked, or even unpatriotic intentions. It does appear to me that, beset by embarrassments unparalleled in our history, subjected to trials and tests of fidelity almost without precedent in number and character, pursued by a spirit of persecution and cruelty never equalled in our partisan struggles, the great wonder is that the President has not committed more errors than he has, that he has been at all times so self-possessed, and has maintained with such unflagging zeal his devotion to the Constitution and to its reëstablishment throughout our whole country. Whatever may be the issue of this struggle, I feel profoundly assured that the verdict of future history will afford him a just and triumphant vindication.

Reconstruction and the Record and Policy of the Democratic Party.

SPEECH OF HON. JACOB BENTON,
OF NEW HAMPSHIRE,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
February 25, 1865.

The House, as in Committee of the Whole, having under consideration the President's annual message—

Mr. BENTON said:

MR. SPEAKER: The Constitution declares that the President shall from time to time give to Congress information of the state of the Union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient. When this constitutional duty is discharged in a candid and statesmanlike manner, the statements and recommendations of the chief executive officer of the nation are not only entitled to the respectful and careful consideration of Congress, but, as all will admit, should exert an important influence in legislation. The President, in his late annual message, instead of giving to Congress and the country a just exposition of the state of the Union in respect to the condition of the revolted States, and the true cause of the delay in the work of reconstruction, presents a portraiture as false to the living reality, as verified by the current history of the times, as his whole administration has been to the party which elevated him to power, and to the great cause of just, impartial, free institutions in this country. With the air of an autocrat and the assurance of one "wiser in his own conceit than seven men that can render a reason," he arraigns Congress and hurls his denunciations and anathemas at the Representatives of the people and of States as if he were indeed sole monarch instead of a mere servant or agent of the people to execute their laws. When the President of the United States so far departs from the appropriate sphere of his high office as to engage in mere personal or partisan controversies, he thereby, in a great measure, forfeits and sacrifices his influence, not only with the people, but with the legislative branch of the Government.

Andrew Johnson has, therefore, no just cause to complain, as he does, that the Executive has, in a measure, become powerless with Congress. If such be the fact in respect to himself, it is but the legitimate result of the extreme and arbitrary measures which he has attempted to force upon the country, of his gross and dangerous usurpations of power, and of his persistent determination to dominate the law to, instead of receiving it from, Congress.

On the 29th day of May, 1865, after the close of the war by the surrender of the confederate forces in the field, the President declared by proclamation all governments in the rebel States overturned or destroyed by the rebellion in its revolutionary course, and undertook to reorganize and restore those States to all their former rights and privileges in the Union, dictating who should vote and participate in reconstruction, and who should not, and what acts and measures should or should not be adopted. On the assembling of Congress in December of that year he called upon its respective bodies to acknowledge the work as accomplished by an immediate admission of Senators and Representatives, chosen by such portion of the people as he himself had enfranchised, and under such organizations as he had seen fit to prescribe and control.

But an American Congress, in view of the terrible sacrifices of blood and the enormous expenditure of treasure that had been made to save the life of the nation, and with a high sense of duty and of obligation to the loyal people and the brave defenders of the Republic, was not thus to be ignored, or overruled by the one-man power. With a degree of firmness and patriotism commensurate with the momentous issue at stake, Congress at once took measures to assert its constitutional prerogative. Still the President persisted, and arrogantly denied to Congress all rightful authority or constitutional power over the subject, and attempted to coerce and drag Senators and Representatives into a surrender of their legislative functions, by the adoption of his policy for the restoration of the rebel States.

Being unsuccessful in this, his first well-matured, bold plan, to betray the loyal people of those States and of the country into the hands, power, and control of the rebel traitors of the South and their confederates of the North, and stung with mortification and madness at the defeat of his favorite scheme, on the 22d of February, 1866, in a public speech from the steps of the White House, in the most violent, vindictive, and excited language personally assailing individual members of Congress, the President of the United States proclaimed his implacable hostility to the policy of a majority of that body; which, from that day to this, he has maintained with a zeal, a perseverance, a determination, and a measure of ability which, had he employed it in aiding Congress in the restoration of the Union upon a just basis, and the adoption of appropriate measures for the elevation of his countrymen to the full enjoyment of their civil and political rights, his name would have been enrolled, not where it stands to-day among the oppressors and persecutors of the weak and the lowly, but among the distinguished benefactors of mankind. And, in respect to the former bondmen of this country, while history will assign to the late lamented martyred Lincoln of immortal fame the high distinction of a Moses, it would have accorded to him the scarcely less proud preëminence of a Joshua, who succeeded the great Hebrew leader just as he had conducted the children of Israel to the borders of the promised land. So Andrew Johnson became the successor of Abraham Lincoln just as the shackles fell from four million bondmen. But instead of leading them forth to the inheritance of their Canaan—the promised land of liberty, the whole vast power and patronage of his Administration have been employed to restore them to the exclusive power and dominion of their former task-masters and oppressors—a condition scarcely less to be deplored than slavery itself. Who ever so utterly failed to comprehend his high providential position? Whoever, in all history, for want of faith in the eternal principles of justice and the sublime teachings of God's providence, discarded such an opportunity to enroll his name on records of a fame as wide as the world, and as enduring as time?

But the cause will not be lost; it may be delayed because men in high places of power prove faithless, and refuse to share in the glorious work of deliverance to the captive. The work will go on. The just and the good are already enlisted in its behalf. God has decreed it, and "the gates of hell" and all the powers of darkness and Democracy cannot prevail against its final consummation.

I now invite your attention to the action of Congress in respect to reconstruction. Its first measure was the submission to the several States, for their adoption, of the fourteenth article as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States; and the general understanding, both in and out of Congress, was that if the South, as then understood, should ratify and agree to that amendment, then her State governments would be accepted by Congress. That amendment was as follows, in substance: By the first section, all men born upon our soil were declared to be citizens of the United States. The second section provided, that when a race or class of men were excluded from the right of suffrage, they should not be counted in the basis of representation. The third, that the leaders of the South who had taken an oath to support the Constitution of the United States, and who had afterward engaged in the rebellion, should be ineligible to any office under the Government of the United States or of a State. The fourth section provided, that the United States should never assume, or pay, any portion of the rebel debt, and that it should never pay the rebels for their slaves. Terms more liberal or lenient were never before offered by a conquering to a conquered people. Still, such terms, so generous, so mild and pacific, extended as an olive branch of peace to the South, to harmonize and restore the Union, were at once most violently assailed by Andrew Johnson and his Conservative and Democratic supporters all over the country, as unjust, arbitrary, and unconstitutional.

The South, instigated and inspired by this opposition in all the States of the rebellion, scornfully, defiantly, rejected those proffered terms for harmony and conciliation. Then, from the stern exigencies of the case, growing out of the rebellious spirit of unrepentant rebels in all those States, and the cries for protection that came up from that devoted land like the wail of despair from millions of the oppressed, persecuted, and down-trodden loyal friends and defenders of the Union, Congress, after hesitating and delaying long, too long, at last interposed, and asserted its authority by extending over those people the strong arm of the military power. Then denunciations fiercer still came forth from the White House, echoed and reëchoed by Conservatives, Democrats, and their rebel brethren both North and South. These measures are constantly assailed by prominent Democrats on this floor in the severest terms of which the English language is capable. They have been characterized as a "disgrace to the age, an outrage upon civilization."

I submit, then, that this must be an age in which it has become disgraceful for a great nation to enact laws for the protection of its own defenders and to stay the hand of vengeance, cruelty, and crime, and that civilization one whose institutions are still based upon the principles of injustice and slavery as their chief corner-stone. That Congress has ample power and constitutional authority to adopt these measures is affirmed by the highest legal authority in the nation. In fact, it has hardly been questioned by the ablest lawyers among those who participated in the rebellion. It has been reserved for Andrew Johnson and the leaders of the Democratic party to discover their unconstitutionality.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I prefer to rest my judgment on the plain reading of the Constitution, on the authority of the first legal mind of the nation, and the solemnly expressed opinions of the many able and distinguished lawyers who have sanctioned the constitutionality of these measures upon their oaths, than on any such declarations in opposition as have been expressed in this House, the Senate, or the country. To narrow the question down to the authority of two men I must say that I have rather more confidence in the judgment, upon a question of constitutional law, of the ripe statesman, the able and distinguished jurist, REVERDY JOHNSON, who has affirmed the constitutionality of these measures with his vote and his oath, than in that of Andrew Johnson, although the latter may have more recently occupied a seat upon the bench.

The constant assertions of the President and his Democratic allies of the unconstitutionality of these measures challenge a comparison in this respect with the executive Democratic policy of reconstruction. The President undertook to reconstruct the rebel States on the ground that the people of those States had been deprived by the rebellion of all civil governments therein, as appears by his own proclamation, under which he undertook the work of reconstruction in North Carolina in 1865.

I refer to this as containing the substance of all his other proclamations to the other several rebel States. In this proclamation he says:

"And whereas the rebellion which has been waged by a portion of the people of the United States against the properly constituted authorities of the Government thereof, in the most revolting form, but whose organized and armed forces have now been almost entirely overcome, has, in its revolutionary progress, deprived the people of the State of North Carolina of all civil government."

Here the destruction of the government in North Carolina is expressly asserted by the President, and he bases his authority for his action, as appears by the same proclamation, on the fourth section of the fourth article of the Constitution of the United States. This article provides that the United States shall guaranty to every State in the Union a republican form of government. Now, how shall the United States execute this guarantee? This question is answered in the plainest language in the eighth section of article first of the Constitution, to wit:

"Congress shall have power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States or any Department or officer thereof."

It would seem that this language of the Constitution is so clear, so direct and comprehensive, that no one need err as to the grant of the power or how it is to be executed.

The Constitution, then, having charged upon Congress the execution of the guarantee of a republican form of government to each of the States, all the power and discretion necessary to be exercised in the performance of that guarantee are also conferred. This I apprehend to be a principle too well settled to be questioned. That Congress is to be the sole judge of what government in a State is republican in form has long since been affirmed in the case of Luther vs. Borden, in the Supreme Court of the United States, as reported in 7 Howard. In this case the court decide that the right to execute the constitutional guarantee is placed in Congress alone; therefore, the plain reading of the Constitution is confirmed by the highest judicial authority in this country. The case also decides—the late Chief Justice Taney delivered the opinion—that the power is not judicial, but that it is one of the highest powers conferred upon Congress, and that it is not subject to be reviewed by the Supreme Court, because it is political in its nature. The principle is clearly deducible from the case that neither the President nor the court has power to execute the guarantee. Congress must execute it by adopting the necessary legislation, to be submitted to the Executive, as in other cases, for his approval; if he disapproves, it may become a law by being repassed by the requisite two-thirds majority.

Congress has provided measures which have been so adopted for the more efficient government of the rebel States and to enable the people of those States to organize loyal republican State governments, preparatory to their restoration to all their former rights and relations to the Union. In providing these measures Congress has only exercised the power and discretion conferred by the Constitution; and being alone expressly charged with the execution of the guarantee, as before stated, its action is conclusive and binding upon all other departments of the Government. The power necessary to accomplish the end and the means to be employed are left entirely to the judgment and discretion of Congress. Now, I submit; what right or authority had the President, under the foregoing or any other provisions of the Constitution, to reconstruct or to direct or control the reconstruction of civil governments in those States? None, I answer, unless he is the United States or could exercise the functions of the Congress thereof. Therefore, after the surrender of the Confederate forces in the field, in what he did to provide State governments for those States he exercised powers invested in the Government of the United States, to be enforced and put into execution by Congress, subject only to the negative power of the President by veto. The President then, after the assumption and exercise of powers not conferred upon him by the Constitution, but upon Congress, turns around and denounces that body for attempting to perform the work required of them by the express terms of the Constitution. He denounces Congress for the exercise of no greater authority or powers by the express provisions of the Constitution than he has attempted to exercise, not only without the authority of the Constitution, but in direct violation of its express terms.

And this is the man who assails and condemns a majority of Congress as violators of the Constitution, in the measures they have adopted to protect the people of those States from domestic violence, and to guaranty to them governments republican in form, and loyal to the Union! And his allies, the leaders of the Democratic party, join in the chorus, with an appendix, which they chant with great apparent devotion, "Well done, good and faithful servant; thou hast been faithful" as the great vindicator of the Constitution which a Republican Congress has sought to overturn and destroy; we will make thee our ruler or leader so long as thy warfare upon a Republican Congress shall continue, and by way of encouragement to persevere in the good work we will talk of thee as our candidate for next President, until the meeting of our nominating convention.

Now, if the leaders of the Democratic party were half sincere in what they have said to sustain the position of the President as against Congress, he has suffered, in their estimation, great injustice and prosecution for his firm and devoted adherence to the Constitution and the rights of the people of this country. And that party, which has been galvanized into life by his policy, is bound in honor, gratitude, and consistency to rally around his standard as their candidate for next President of the United States. But will the Democratic party accept Andrew Johnson as their standard-bearer for that office? Never; for whatever he may have done for them since, he was guilty during the war of fighting against the rebellion, and that—with a majority of the leaders of that party—constitutes one of the unpardonable political transgressions never to be absolved, never to be forgotten.

But, to repeat, the President undertook to accomplish reconstruction with no authority to stand upon but his own policy. Congress bases its action upon the express requirements of the Constitution. The plan of the President surrenders the loyal defenders of the Government to the tender mercies of the rebels; while Congress intrusts the power with the whole people, excepting not more than fifty thousand rebel voters in all the South, and those the most guilty leaders who were mainly instrumental in plunging the country into the vortex of civil war. The practical effect of the President's plan would not only surrender the non-voting class in those States to the entire power and control of the voting class, but the white rebel voter there would be invested with a twofold power over the white loyal voter of all the former non-slaveholding States; and the representative of that privileged class of voters would wield a twofold political power over the representative from the North and Northwest, both in Congress and in the Electoral College. This is a specimen of modern Democratic equality. Why should not the soldiers and loyal voters of the country support such a policy and the party which upholds it?

That the leaders of the Democracy should support the plan of the President is both logical and consistent with its well-defined policy of concentrating all power in the Government in the hands of the few, and their well-known sympathy with their rebel brethren of the South in their late terrible struggle to overthrow the Constitution and the noblest fabric of civil government ever established by man.

In all the contests between the President and the Representatives of the people that party has uniformly rallied to the standard of the one-man power. In the case of the recent bill before this House, to define the quorum of the Supreme Court and regulate the jurisdiction thereof, every member of that party upon this floor maintained the policy of retaining the power in the hands of a single judge of that court, to nullify or set aside the legislation of Congress though adopted by a two-thirds majority, or even by a unanimous vote of both branches and the concurrence of the Executive. And this is the party that styles itself Democratic, and professes to be governed by the great cardinal principle that the will of the people is the great paramount law, above Congress, the court, and the President.

Congress, as a means to reorganize loyal State governments in the South, has provided that all adult male citizens not disfranchised for disloyalty and crime in the States in which they reside shall vote and take part in forming anew governments for those States. This provision, as adopted, is not only republican and just, but a necessary means to be employed to restore to the people of those States such governments as the Constitution requires to be provided and maintained. It is evident that that result could not be successfully accomplished by intrusting the work to white voters alone; for that experiment has been tried by the President in all those States without securing a loyal republican government in one single State, and that, too, when the number of rebels disfranchised by the President was at least seven times greater than under the present congressional plan. And, again, the evidence is now conclusive that a large majority of the white voters of those States are at this day as disloyal in spirit and as inimical to the Government of the United States as when the first gun was fired on Fort Sumter, or when the rebel army, under Lee and Johnston, surrendered to the victorious legions under Grant and Sherman.

Then, I submit, what other alternative was left to Congress but to adopt the great principle of manhood suffrage, by the enfranchisement of the freedmen in those States. And why should they not be allowed a voice in the formation and control of governments to which they are to be subject, and interested in all their rights equally with the whites? They were born in this country. They are now free American citizens. In slavery even they were submissive, patient, and laborious for the benefit of their masters and the support of the Government. In peace, ever faithful and true; in war, loyal and brave. When the whites of those States conspired and confederated together to destroy the Government of our fathers, the black man rallied to the defense of the flag and bared his bosom to the storm of battle. Now, shall a great nation, after rivers of blood have been shed and countless millions have been expended to conquer those people in war, ignominiously transfer the political rights and privileges of the Government of those States to the hands of its enemies, and deny them to its friends and protectors? No, never; I cannot believe that the loyal people of this nation will ever sanction a policy so fraught with danger, ingratitude, and dishonor.

Away with that miserable dogma—a white man's government; it was born of slavery, let it be entombed with it. As a principle it is narrow, illiberal, anti-republican, unconstitutional, and all unworthy of a liberal and progressive age, in the high noon of the nineteenth century.

But a new doctrine has recently been promulgated by the conservative friend and mouth-piece of Andrew Johnson, Senator DOOLITTLE, of Wisconsin—that of qualified negro suffrage. It is proposed by that conservative gentleman to allow certain classes of blacks to exercise suffrage! Those who have served for a stated period in the Union Army are to be allowed to vote side by side with the whites who served in the rebel army. This, I suppose, is a conservative measure to reward loyalty. The second class, those who, either in their own right or that of their wives, own property to a certain amount are to be allowed to vote with the poor white who never owned a dollar in his life, although always free, with every means to acquire a competency. There is another specimen of conservative justice. The third and last class of blacks, those who can read and write, (a qualification which by law all slaves were denied the right to acquire,) shall be allowed to vote by the side of the rebel white who, although always enjoying freedom, beside belonging to the so-called superior white race, has never had ambition nor intelligence enough to learn even the first letter of the alphabet.

This is, I suppose, a conservative measure to encourage the education of the inferior black race. I ask, Mr. Speaker, is this a fair specimen of conservative justice and statesmanship? It is, however, significant and important in two respects: first, it concedes the principle of the enfranchisement of the blacks; and second, it explodes the theory of an exclusive white man's Government in this country. But apply these tests to the white voters, and where would the Democratic party be in every State in this Union? In certain localities it would be necessary to issue a search-warrant to get enough eligible Democratic voters together to organize a school-house caucus. Away with such invidious distinctions as these. The people of this country will never be misled to sanction a measure of such manifest injustice. To vote is the freeman's right. Without that right he is not free nor the equal of the freeman. Without it he is defenseless, and deprived of the means of protecting his political rights. It is a right as undeniable as liberty or the pursuit of happiness. It rests on the same broad basis of equality and eternal justice. It cannot be denied without discarding the great cardinal principle set forth in the Declaration of Independence, that all just Governments derive their authority from the consent of the governed.

But negro suffrage is no new thing under the sun; the right was exercised prior to the adoption of the Constitution and at that time. This is important; for the Constitution makes no exceptions or distinctions on account of color or race. This right has been exercised by the free blacks, even in many of the former slave States, through the greater period of our national existence. It was not prohibited in those States till within less than forty years, and then on the ground not that it was dangerous to freedom but to slavery. The high-sounding phrases of the President's message in regard to negro supremacy and negro domination are all answered and refuted by the stern logic of facts, as appears by the following table of figures, showing a large majority of white voters in nearly all of the unreconstructed States. This table was prepared and is presented by Hon. A. H. CRAGIN in his late able speech in the United States Senate on the subject of reconstruction:

	White.	Colored.	For.	Against.
Virginia.....	116,000	104,000	107,342	61,887
North Carolina.....	103,060	71,657	93,266	32,661
South Carolina.....	45,751	79,585	67,709	2,236
Georgia.....	95,214	93,453	102,283	4,127
Mississippi.....	48,926	88,925	60,739	4,272
Louisiana.....	44,732	82,407	75,063	4,006
Florida.....	11,100	15,357	14,327	139
Texas.....	50,603	47,430	Not voted.
Arkansas (total).....	68,805	—	27,576	13,558

Then, even in those States where the blacks constitute a majority, how can there be any danger of negro supremacy? How can the poor blacks, without education, without position, without property or lands, or permanent homes, or skill and experience in political affairs, control or dominate over the wealthy, highly educated, trained, and able politicians of those States? Has the maxim that knowledge is power become reversed, so that ignorance is power and knowledge is weakness. But why attempt to answer a proposition so manifestly absurd as to defeat itself? The fear is not of negro but of loyal supremacy. I trust that that supremacy will be maintained even to the discomfiture of traitors and their rebel sympathizers—whether North or South.

40TH CONG....2D SESS.

Reconstruction, &c.—Mr. Benton.

HO. OF REPS.

The outcry against allowing loyal men a voice in the government in the disloyal States is paralleled only by the audacity of the leaders of the Democratic party in asking the loyal people of this country to commit the control of the Government to their hands, while their garments are still reeking with the blood of three hundred and fifty thousand young men, who offered their lives, a holocaust, self-sacrificed upon the altar of their country, to prevent the destruction by that party of this great Republic, the home of free institutions and the hope of the world.

But the leaders of the Democratic party deny that they are responsible for the war or that the charge of disloyalty can be justly made against them. Now, let us test those questions by a few plain interrogatories. What party inaugurated and carried on for four long years a cruel, wicked, and destructive war against this Government? I answer, the southern half of the Democratic party, aided and encouraged by a majority of the leaders of that same party in the North. Who proclaimed at the commencement of the war the doctrine that the United States Government had no constitutional power to coerce a sovereign State? James Buchanan and the leaders of the Democratic party both North and South. Who declared it unconstitutional for the United States to raise an army to put down the rebellion? A majority of the leaders of that same party. Who ridiculed the volunteer soldiers, who rallied to the defense of the flag, and stigmatized them as "Lincoln hirelings" and "legalized murderers?" Many of the present leaders of the Democratic party. Who discouraged enlistments and opposed the draft? A large proportion of the leading northern Democrats.

Mr. SITGREAVES. I understand the gentleman from New Hampshire to say the Democratic party was everywhere opposed to the draft and discouraged enlistment. I wish to know whether he includes the Democratic party of New Jersey in that anathema?

Mr. BENTON. The gentleman did not understand, perhaps, the class of Democrats to which I referred. I alluded to the majority of the leading, controlling Democrats throughout the country.

Mr. SITGREAVES. I inquire whether Joel Parker, then Governor of New Jersey, is not a leading Democrat, and whether he includes him in his anathema?

Mr. BENTON. I have not said every leading Democrat, but the majority of the leading Democrats. And I affirm now, and I defy successful contradiction, that a majority of the leaders of the Democratic party during the war were opposed to the general policy of the administration of the Government; that they were opposed to the prosecution of the war and sympathized with the rebellion. Is the gentleman answered?

Who openly denounced the employment of colored soldiers as a species of barbarous warfare and a disgrace to the nation? The highly refined leaders of the Democratic party. Who rejoiced all through the war over rebel victories and hung their heads with dismay at the success of our arms? Many of the present leaders of the Democratic party all over the country. Who proclaimed the great emancipation proclamation, which carried consternation and dismay to the very heart of the rebellion, unconstitutional, "a legal fiction," "a mere paper bulletin?" The astute lawyers and leaders of the Democratic party. Who pronounced the war a failure, while the gallant Union Army, under Grant, was successfully beleaguering the devoted rebel city of Richmond, and Sherman was marching his victorious legions through the very heart of the rebel dominions? All the leaders of the Democratic party all over the land. Who opposed and denounced every effective measure employed by Congress or Abraham Lincoln to suppress the rebellion as unconstitutional? The leaders of that same party, both in and out of Congress. Who denounced Andrew Johnson with the bitterest scorn and hatred all through and even since the war? The same leaders of the Democratic party, who now sing psalms of praise for his treachery to the party that then defended and protected him. Who got up a sham Union convention in the great City of Brotherly Love in the summer of 1866, and yoked themselves up with unrepentant and unwashed rebels and traitors against this Government? Democrats and Andrew Johnson conservatives. Who predicted a great uprising of the people in support of the policy of Andrew Johnson against Congress when he "swung round the circle," and William H. Seward waved his magician's wand to lure the people to his support? The leaders of the Democratic party, with a large proportion of the rank and file.

When the southern portion of the Democratic party precipitated upon the country the fearful issue of secession and civil war the northern portion of the party, while not generally conceding the right of secession, with few honorable exceptions, made no manly or patriotic efforts to prevent the dissolution of the Union.

What would then have been the fate of the nation had the Government during the war been intrusted to the Democratic instead of to the Republican party? Can any one doubt as to the result? Which party to-day embraces within its ranks the disloyal and which the loyal people of this country as they are already mustering for national supremacy in the great presidential contest of 1868? The line of demarcation between the friends and enemies of the Government is now scarcely less distinctly drawn than during the progress of the war. Politicians of the Democratic school profess to favor equal taxation; the Republicans claim and have exercised the right to discriminate in favor of those classes of the people least able to bear the burdens of taxation. This principle has been adopted in the Republican legislation of Congress. I refer, by way of illustration, to the taxes on incomes, licenses, &c., from which the masses of the people are entirely exempt; also, to the high taxes imposed on many articles of foreign importation used and consumed, and consequently the duties paid, almost exclusively by the wealthy. The Republican policy is to tax at highest rates luxuries and those articles not included in the list of the actual necessities of life.

But the protective policy which affords a large revenue to the Treasury and stimulates and fosters and rewards domestic enterprise and labor is opposed, and sought to be supplanted by the Democratic policy of free trade. The whisky ring opposes the collection of the tax on that article, and, by complicity with Johnson-Democratic officials, is daily defrauding the people and the revenue of enormous sums, nearly sufficient to pay the whole interest on the public debt. Still we hear no outcry against these frauds from our Democratic tax-saving doctors, who would flood the country with an issue of $2,000,000,000 of greenbacks to avoid the interest on that portion of the public debt as a temporary expedient or a mere makeshift, for surely the exchange of one kind of security for another cannot amount to payment. But let the Government bonds, like other property, be subjected to local taxation, says another Democratic doctor. That cannot be done without repudiation, as they are, by law of Congress, exempt from such taxation. Undoubtedly the United States may tax them as a source of profit or income, the same as any other productive, taxable property; they are exempt from local, not national, taxation. Then I maintain that they should be taxed, and that the bondholder can well afford to contribute his share in that way toward the extinguishment of the public debt, and as an additional security or safeguard against the rebel Democratic doctrine of repudiation.

But the Democratic leaders claim that the party is not so disloyal in fact or in sympathy as their record would seem to indicate, and that they excel in economy, and should be intrusted with power on that ground, if on no other. Modest, indeed! After plunging the country into war and bringing a debt of mountain weight upon the tax-payers of the nation they now propose to exhibit their financial skill, and, in the practice of their peculiar style of economy, to relieve the burdens of the people. Look at their economy under the last Democratic administration of James Buchanan, which cost the country more than thirty-one millions over the average ordinary expenses of Abraham Lincoln's administration, not to include the wholesale robbery of the Treasury by John B. Floyd, and the defalcations, peculations, and frauds of other Democratic officials. That administration commenced with a large surplus in the public Treasury and left it bankrupt and a large national debt created in time of peace, with our credit as a nation greatly impaired at home and abroad. Mr. Brooks, of New York, discoursed to this House a few days ago on the subject of economy. I was interested in the gentleman's remarks, but at the same time it seemed to me that practice was better than precept, and I would now respectfully commend to the attention of that gentleman the familiar adage, "Charity begins at home." It seems to me that that gentleman will find an excellent field for the practice of a little of his skill in that line in the great city which he in part represents on this floor. Where can be found another instance of such a prodigal expenditure of the people's money as in the case of the administration of the city government of New York, costing for that single city over twenty-one million dollars annually as administered by the Democratic party, nearly double the whole national expenditures under the administration of John Quincy Adams, which was repudiated by the people as extravagant?

The Democratic party to be restored to power for the sake of economy! Absurd in the extreme. Their record for economy is scarcely better than for loyalty. There never was a party, in this or any other country, with professions of economy on their lips, more profigate in the expenditure of the people's money. Instead of relief to the tax-payers, by a restoration of the Democratic party to power in this nation, there is much more reason to apprehend a vast increase of our national debt, to pay for the slaves of rebels and their war debt. I declare this, because it has been claimed by many of the leading rebels in the unreconstructed States of the South, and it is now claimed by former slaveowners in Kentucky and other States, that such is the just obligation of the United States, because their slaves were emancipated without their consent. I say this, because every one of the unreconstructed rebel States refused to adopt the fourteenth article as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which prohibited the assumption of the rebel debt or payment by the General Government for emancipated slaves. I say this, because the past action of the Democratic party justifies the apprehension in case of their accession to power. That party never can be restored to power, except in connection with the leading Democrats of the South. The southern wing of the old Democratic party always dictated and controlled the policy and measures of that party. Then, in the event of such a reunion and restoration of the party to power, the men of the South will again assume the leadership, and whatever they persistently demand in the future, as in the past, will in the end be conceded. What was the result of the Missouri struggle, in which the issue was squarely made between the northern and southern wings of the party, in the first instance? How was it on the tariff question, first forced on the country and then rejected by southern politicians? How in regard to the repeal of the Missouri restriction? How in regard to popular sovereignty and Kansas, and all other questions when northern and southern Democrats came in conflict? The South always prevailed, and always will, in that organization. Then the only safety for the people of this country is to intrust the ark of their political covenant in none but true, firm, and loyal hands, or its Government, in these perilous times, only to the care of that great liberty-loving party which, with the patriot soldier and the captain of the age as a leader, has conducted the nation to a successful issue through the ordeal of battle and the conflict of arms in the greatest civil war the world has ever known.

Impeachment.

SPEECH OF HON. G. F. MILLER,
OF PENNSYLVANIA,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
February 24, 1868,

On the resolutions reported by the Committee on Reconstruction for the impeachment of the President.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, the question of impeachment of the President of the United States for high crimes and misdemeanors now under consideration, founded upon the report of the Committee on Reconstruction, made through their chairman, [Hon. THADDEUS STEVENS,] is a grave one, and ought to be approached with due and solemn consideration, discarding all political considerations or bias. On the 4th of July next it will be ninety-two years since the Declaration of Independence, and it is eighty-six years since our independence was conceded by Great Britain. Eighty-one years ago the Constitution of these United States was adopted by the Convention presided over by General George Washington, who is denominated the Father of this Republic, and ratified by the then existing States two years thereafter. In that Constitution are contained several provisions in regard to impeachment. The fourth section provides that—

"The President, Vice President, and all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors."

In section second of the first article it is declared that—

"The House of Representatives shall have the sole power of impeachment."

And the third section of the same article provides that—

"The Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments. When sitting for that purpose they shall be on oath or affirmation. When the President of the United States is tried the Chief Justice shall preside; and no person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two thirds of the members present."

It also provides that—

"Judgment in case of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office and disqualification to hold or enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States; but the party convicted shall, nevertheless, be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment according to law."

Thus it will be seen that a judgment of impeachment is very severe and degrading, as it disqualifies the person impeached from holding and enjoying any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States. It is held in sixth volume of State Trials, under title "Evidence"—

"That the same evidence is required in an impeachment in Parliament as in the ordinary courts of justice."

In 2 Hale's Pleas of the Crown, page 150, it is laid down that—

"An impeachment before the Lords by the Commons of Great Britain is a prosecution of known established law, and hath frequently put in practice, being a presentment to the most high and supreme court of criminal jurisdiction, by the most solemn and grand inquest of the whole kingdom."

And it is also laid down (Tomlin's Law Dictionary, second volume, page 156,) that—

"The articles of impeachment are a kind of bills of indictment found by the House of Commons, and afterward tried by the Lords, who are, in cases of misdemeanors, considered not only as their own peers, but as the peers of the whole nation."

The mode of conducting such proceedings in England is to exhibit articles in behalf of the Commons and managers appointed to make good their charge and accusation before the House of Lords. In the United States the mode of procedure, after a resolve by the House of Representatives to impeach, is to appoint a committee to go to the Senate, and at the bar thereof, in the name of the House of Representatives and of all the people of the United States, to impeach, (naming the person to be impeached) for high misdemeanors (or high crimes or misdemeanors) in office, and acquaint the Senate that the House of Representatives will, in due time, exhibit particular articles of impeachment against him and make good the same, and that said committee do demand the Senate to take order for the appearance of the person charged to answer said impeachment.

The House then appoints a committee to prepare and report to the House articles of impeachment against the person charged for misdemeanors in office, which articles being reported to the House and agreed to, managers are appointed, who are to carry to the Senate the articles agreed to by the House, to be exhibited in the name of themselves and of all the people of the United States against the person charged; if against the President, it would be against Andrew Johnson, President of the United States; and these managers conduct the impeachment. Under the provisions of the Constitution of the United States it does not follow that in order to sustain an impeachment the offender should be guilty of such an offense as would sustain a conviction in a criminal court for a high misdemeanor. There are many offenses that might be denominated "high misdemeanors" that are not indictable either by statute or at common law in our courts, so that the English rule as to what is necessary to sustain impeachment is not, as a general rule, applicable to cases under the Constitution of the United States.

And the question presented here, Mr. Speaker, is whether Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, has been guilty of such "high crimes and misdemeanors," or high misdemeanors, as will justify the House in preferring articles of impeachment against him and sending him to the Senate for trial. It is to be deplored that this great Republic, not yet a century old, commencing with a population of less than three millions, and now reaching thirty-seven millions, should have placed in nomination and elected a man who fills the highest office in the gift of the people, who has become (as charged) so depraved, corrupt, and defiant to the laws as to render his impeachment necessary. When we look into ancient history and see how republics that once flourished, and were the nurse of arts and sciences, the fruitful mothers of philosophers, law-givers, and heroes now lie prostrate under the iron yoke of ignorance and barbarism, and especially when we reflect that monarchical Governments look upon republics as a failure, and that France, though she struggled hard for a republican form of government, and shed immense quantities of blood in favor of that cause, is under the rule of an absolute monarch.

It is enough to make us fear and tremble. But we are told by the historian "That nothing is insurmountable to the unconquerable hand of liberty when backed by public virtue and the generous resolution of a brave and willing people." We, as a nation, must stand firm and shrink from no duty, however painful. The highest officer of our Government is, and of right ought to be, as amenable to the Constitution and laws as any of our humblest citizens. On the 7th of January, 1867, Hon. JAMES M. ASHLEY, a member from Ohio, rising to a privileged question, charged Andrew Johnson, Vice President and acting President of the United States, with impeachable offenses, namely, with "high crimes and misdemeanors;" to which was appended a resolution directing the Judiciary Committee to make a thorough investigation in the matter, which the House adopted by 107 yeas (my name being recorded among the yeas) to 39 nays. The committee began to take testimony on the 6th of February, and continued, at intervals, for several months. On the 25th of November they sent in an enormous mass of evidence, (printed in 1163 pages,) and submitted therewith three reports—the majority report in favor of impeachment, and the other two against it. The consideration was postponed until the 6th of December, in order to give members an opportunity to examine the evidence presented by the committee, and on that day the case was taken up, when a lengthy speech was delivered by Mr. BOUTWELL, of Massachusetts, (a member of the committee,) in favor of impeachment, in which he said inter alia:

"Others have received the impression that the suspension of the President would follow the impeachment by this House. It certainly will not be out of place for me in this connection to present the views I entertain on this subject. After much deliberation I cannot doubt the soundness of the opinion that the President, even when impeached by this House, is still entitled to his office until he has been convicted by the Senate."

On page 12, of the same speech, he says:

"The country was disappointed, no doubt, in the report of the committee, and very likely this House participated in the disappointment, that there was no specific, heinous, novel offense charged upon and proved against the President of the United States."

The honorable gentleman also referred to a conversation had in February, 1865, in Cincinnati, when Andrew Johnson was on his road from Tennessee to Washington to take the oath of office of Vice President, between him and Judge Mathews, in which Mr. Johnson should have said that the Judge and himself were old Democrats, and "if the country was saved it will be done through the Democratic party."

This speech was followed by one from Mr. WILSON, chairman of the Judiciary Committee. A vote was then taken, and the result was 56 in favor of impeachment and 109 against it; of those who voted against impeachment sixty-eight were Republicans and forty-one Democrats. This vote shows there was twelve majority against impeachment without counting the Democratic voters. Even of the delegation from the Radical State of Massachusetts, represented by ten members, all of whom are Republicans, only two voted for impeachment upon the case as presented, and, no doubt, on that evidence must have failed before the Senate. I am aware that it has been said in some quarters that the vote by Republican members was an indorsement by them of the course of Andrew Johnson, the President of the United States. I will say, however, Mr. Speaker, that the charge against these Republican members is unfounded! They are, and have been, as much opposed to the course of Mr. Johnson and his policy as those who voted in favor of impeachment on that occasion, but were unwilling to establish a precedent that might remove upon flimsy testimony any President, and thus sap the foundation of the Government.

The Committee of the Judiciary were instructed to report the evidence for our examination and decision; it was, as it were, a sealed book until printed and laid on our desks the 6th of December last, and then it was no easy task to undertake to examine eleven hundred and sixty-three pages of printed matter. I can say, however, for one, that I undertook the task, and gave the evidence adduced a careful examination, (and I have no doubt many other members did the same,) and I must say here, in the language of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOWWELL,] who was strongly in favor of impeachment, I was "disappointed" at the proof against the President, as I had supposed there would have been evidence to sustain impeachment, but in that I, as well as other members, was disappointed; and although I condemned the political course of Andrew Johnson and his policy, and notwithstanding he had deceived the party that elected him, of which I am a member, I could not vote for impeachment merely on such considerations; and our constituents must remember that this was not a political, but a judicial question, which we, sitting in the capacity of judges or jurors, were to decide upon our oaths. I looked to nothing but the facts as presented in the printed testimony which had been laid before us. When the case was before the House on the 7th of March, 1867, I then entreated our friends on this floor not to prejudge the case, but to wait until the committee should report the evidence on which we were to act.

I wish, however, Mr. Speaker, to be understood as casting no reflections on those who on that occasion voted in favor of impeachment; on what they based their decision it is not for me to conjecture. There is one thing may be said, and that is, that those of the leading journalists of our country that examined the testimony did not after such perusal advocate impeachment, but approved of the majority vote of Congress. It was this want of sufficient evidence that induced me, notwithstanding the bad treatment received from Mr. Johnson (for whose election I labored hard) by my party, my friends, and myself, to vote against impeachment on that occasion. However strong my party ties may be, I trust I shall never let them betray my judgment when called to decide a judicial question, and one that might be the means of sweeping away the hard earnings of a lifetime of many of our most worthy citizens. There was another question in the case as then presented, that I have no doubt had some influence upon the vote of some of the members, and that was the assertion of Mr. BOWWELL in his speech, that the President during the trial could not be suspended. If that is correct, then with the wide range taken by the testimony when could the trial have been brought to a termination? Surely not during his continuance in office. Such a wide range was taken in the trial of Warren Hastings, who was impeached before Parliament for misconduct as governor general of India, and his trial lasted from 1787 to 1794, a period of seven years, and then acquitted.

I may say here that it was solemnly determined in that case that an impeachment is not abated or put an end to by the prorogation or dissolution of Parliament. When we were furnished with the printed evidence, Mr. Johnson had not quite sixteen months of his presidential term remaining, so that as the case then stood, if articles of impeachment had been preferred, the trial could not well have been brought to a close prior to the expiration of his term. I am sure that those who shall give the case due consideration will approve of the action of the majority of this House on that occasion. I may repeat that it would endanger the permanency of this Republic to establish a precedent by which any President could be removed unless based upon sufficient grounds, regardless of party considerations; and I trust that our party will hereafter be more cautious with regard to whom they place in nomination, and not elect a man who is hardly installed in the party, and not trust to mere professions of men who are seeking office. I do not refer to this party matter as having any bearing on impeachment, for as to that Andrew Johnson has already been effectually impeached by public opinion.

The refusal to impeach on the evidence formerly presented gave no assurance that Andrew Johnson, the President, would not be impeached when a proper case should be presented, and if he so considered it he was woefully mistaken. Those Republicans who voted against the resolution of the majority of the Judiciary Committee were at all times ready and willing to impeach the President or any other officer of the Government when a proper case should be presented with evidence to sustain it. During the second session of the Thirty-Ninth Congress an act was passed by both Houses entitled "An act regulating the tenure of certain civil offices." It was sent to the President for his approval, which he refused to give, but returned it with his objections. It was then passed by both Houses over his veto by a two-thirds vote, and thus became the law of the land with the like effect as if the President had signed it. The several sections thereof are as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That every person holding any civil office to which he has been appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and every person who shall hereafter be appointed to any such office, and shall become duly qualified to act therein, is and shall be entitled to hold such office until a successor shall have been in like manner appointed and duly qualified, except as herein otherwise provided: Provided, That the Secretaries of State, of the Treasury, of War, of the Navy, and of the Interior, the Postmaster General, and the Attorney General shall hold their offices respectively for and during the term of the President by whom they may have been appointed and for one month thereafter, subject to removal by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That when any officer appointed as aforesaid, excepting judges of the United States courts, shall, during a recess of the Senate, be shown, by evidence satisfactory to the President, to be guilty of misconduct in office, or crime, or for any reason shall become incapable or legally disqualified to perform its duties, in such case, and in no other, the President may suspend such officer and designate some suitable person to perform temporarily the duties of such office until the next meeting of the Senate, and until the case shall be acted upon by the Senate, and such person so designated shall take the oaths and give the bonds required by law to be taken and given by the person duly appointed to fill such office; and in such case it shall be the duty of the President, within twenty days after the first day of such next meeting of the Senate, to report to the Senate such suspension, with the evidence and reasons for his action in the case and the name of the person so designated to perform the duties of such office. And if the Senate shall concur in such suspension and advise and consent to the removal of such officer they shall so certify to the President, who may thereupon remove such officer, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint another person to such office. But if the Senate shall refuse to concur in such suspension, such officer so suspended shall forthwith resume the functions of his office, and the powers of the person so performing its duties in his stead shall cease, and the official salary and emoluments of such officer shall, during such suspension, belong to the person so performing the duties thereof, and not to the officer so suspended: Provided, however, That the President, in case he shall become satisfied that such suspension was made on insufficient grounds, shall be authorized, at any time before reporting such suspension to the Senate as above provided, to revoke such suspension and reinstate such officer in the performance of the duties of his office.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the President shall have power to fill all vacancies which may happen during the recess of the Senate by reason of death or resignation by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session thereafter. And if no appointment, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall be made to such office so vacant or temporarily filled as aforesaid during such next session of the Senate such office shall remain in abeyance, without any salary, fees, or emoluments attached thereto, until the same shall be filled by appointment thereto, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and during such time all the powers and duties belonging to such office shall be exercised by such other officer as may by law exercise such powers and duties in case of a vacancy in such office.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That nothing in this act contained shall be construed to extend the term of any office the duration of which is limited by law.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That if any person shall, contrary to the provisions of this act, accept any appointment to or employment in any office, or shall hold or exercise, or attempt to hold or exercise, any such office or employment, he shall be deemed, and is hereby declared to be, guilty of a high misdemeanor, and, upon trial and conviction thereof, he shall be punished therefor by a fine not exceeding $10,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding five years, or both said punishments, in the discretion of the court.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That every removal, appointment, or employment made, had, or exercised contrary to the provisions of this act, and the making, signing, sealing, countersigning, or issuing of any commission or letter of authority for or in respect to any such appointment or employment, shall be deemed, and are hereby declared to be, high misdemeanors, and, upon trial and conviction thereof, every person guilty thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $10,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding five years, or both said punishments, in the discretion of the court: Provided, That the President shall have power to make out and deliver, after the adjournment of the Senate, commissions for all officers whose appointment shall have been advised and consented to by the Senate.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Senate, at the close of each session thereof, to deliver to the Secretary of the Treasury, and to each of his assistants, and to each of the Auditors, and to each of the Comptrollers in the Treasury, and to the Treasurer, and to the Register of the Treasury, a full and complete list, duly certified, of all persons who shall have been nominated to and rejected by the Senate during such session, and a like list of all the offices to which nominations shall have been made and not confirmed and filled at such session.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That whenever the President shall, without the advice and consent of the Senate, designate, authorize, or employ any person to perform the duties of any office, he shall forthwith notify the Secretary of the Treasury thereof; and it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury thereupon to communicate such notice to all the proper accounting and disbursing officers of his Department.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That no money shall be paid or received from the Treasury, or paid or received from or retained out of any public moneys or funds of the United States, whether in the Treasury or not, to or by or for the benefit of any person appointed to or authorized to act in or holding or exercising the duties or functions of any office contrary to the provisions of this act; nor shall any claim, account, voucher, order, certificate, warrant, or other instrument providing for or relating to such payment, receipt, or retention, be presented, passed, allowed, approved, certified, or paid by any officer of the United States, or by any person exercising the functions or performing the duties of any office or place of trust under the United States, for or in respect to such office, or the exercising or performing the functions or duties thereof; and every person who shall violate any of the provisions of this section shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, and, upon trial and conviction thereof, shall be punished therefor by a fine not exceeding $10,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding ten years, or both said punishments, in the discretion of the court.

After the adjournment of Congress in July last the President suspended Hon. Edwin M. Stanton, Secretary of War, and appointed General Ulysses S. Grant Secretary of War ad interim. At the next meeting of the United States Senate the President returned to that body the reasons for the suspension of Mr. Stanton, whereupon the Senate, after due consideration, refused to concur, and decided that the suspension was made on insufficient grounds, of which non-concurrence the President had due notice, and Mr. Stanton was restored to his position as Secretary of War, and discharged and continues to discharge the duties thereof. Afterward, to wit, on the 21st of February, 1868, Andrew Johnson, the President, issued and sent to Hon. Edwin M. Stanton, Secretary of War, an order to remove him, of which the following is a copy:

EXECUTIVE MANSION.

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 21, 1868.

SIR: By virtue of the power and authority vested in me, as President, by the Constitution and laws of the United States, you are hereby removed from office as Secretary for the Department of War, and your functions as such will terminate upon the receipt of this communication.

You will transfer to Briget Major General Lorenzo Thomas, Adjutant General of the Army, who has this day been authorized and empowered to act as Secretary of War ad interim, all records, books, papers, and other public property now in your custody and charge.

Respectfully yours, ANDREW JOHNSON.
To Hon. EDWIN M. STANTON, Washington, D. C.

The Senate, being notified of the action of the President in attempting to remove Mr. Stanton, the Secretary of War, the second time, took the matter into consideration, and promptly passed the following resolution, a copy of which was sent to the President:

HO. OF REPS.

National Expenditures, &c.,—Mr. Lawrence.

40TH CONG....2D SESS.

"Whereas the Senate have received and considered the communication of the President, stating that he had removed Edwin M. Stanton, Secretary of War, and had designated the Adjutant General of the Army to act as Secretary of War ad interim: Therefore,

"Resolved by the Senate of the United States, That under the Constitution and laws of the United States the President has no power to remove the Secretary of War and designate any other officer to perform the duties of that office ad interim."

It will be seen by the second section of the civil office tenure bill, hereinbefore set forth, that the President, for reasons he may deem sufficient, may suspend an officer of the Government during the recess, and designate some suitable person to temporarily perform the duties of such office until the next meeting of the Senate, and until the case shall be acted upon by that body; and such person designated shall take the oath, duly appointed, to fill such office; and in such case it shall be the duty of the President, within twenty days after the first day of such next meeting of the Senate, to report to the Senate such suspension, with the evidence and reasons for his action in the case, and the name of the person so designated to perform the duties of such office; and if the Senate shall concur the same shall be certified to the President, who thereupon may remove such officer; but if the Senate shall refuse to concur in such suspension such officer shall forthwith resume the functions of his office.

The fifth and sixth sections provide penalties for a violation of the provisions of that statute. It therefore clearly appears, Mr. Speaker, that the President, in defiance of the provisions of the act regulating the tenure of certain civil offices, has undertaken to remove Mr. Stanton, the Secretary of War, and appointed Brevet Major General Lorenzo Thomas Secretary of War ad interim to take his place, who is and has been attempting to force himself into the office and eject Mr. Stanton. This House, being officially notified of the action of the President in removing Hon. Edwin M. Stanton, Secretary of War, the second time, regardless of the action of the Senate of the United States, and in violation of the provisions of the civil office tenure bill, referred the whole subject-matter to the Committee on Reconstruction, who made a report, accompanied with a resolution impeaching Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, of high crimes and misdemeanors. However I deplore the necessity of removal by impeachment of the Chief Magistrate, who was elected on the same ticket with the lamented Lincoln, and who is the seventeenth man that has occupied the presidential chair of these United States, and the third Vice President that succeeded to that position by the death of the regularly-elected President. When a proper case is presented I am willing to act, and act promptly. It is clear to my mind that Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, has at last committed an overt act by attempting to supplant Mr. Stanton, the lawful Secretary of War, in defiance of the action of the Senate; to place in his stead Brevet Major General Thomas, who seems ready and willing to perform such daring acts, was a high usurpation of power by setting the laws of the land at defiance and offering an insult to Congress. His course is not, as contended by gentlemen on the Democratic side of this House, justifiable under the provisions of the act of Congress approved August 7, 1789, entitled "An act to establish an executive department to be denominated the Department of War," but in direct violation of the provisions of the act of 1867, above referred to, and also in violation of the provisions of the third section of the second article of the Constitution of the United States, which declares that the President "shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed."

It is our duty, Mr. Speaker, as the Representatives of a free people, to assert our constitutional prerogative by impeaching him. Let us pass this resolution and prefer articles of impeachment and send them to the Senate, and if he should be sustained in his usurpation let the responsibility rest on the shoulders of that legislative branch of the Government. The President's offense, as charged by the report of the Committee on Reconstruction, is within a narrow compass, so that the trial need not necessarily be protracted. In coming to this conclusion I am not influenced by any matters outside of the facts laid before us. Mr. Johnson, whether through bad advisers or his own perverseness, has rendered his removal from the presidential chair necessary. The evidence to warrant such a procedure is now unmistakable. I would say to the honorable gentleman on the other side of the House [Mr. Brooks] that his threats made in behalf of himself and party will have no influence upon the Republican members of this House. They have heard such declamations often before; they will do their duty, and whole duty, irrespective of menaces from any quarter. This country must be saved from misrule. The United States, as the Constitution declares, shall guaranty to every State in the Union a republican form of Government, and the late rebellious States must and shall be so reconstructed as to carry out that requirement, and to place the governments thereof in the hands of such as are loyal.

Whenever any officer of the Government, no matter how exalted a position he may occupy, undertakes to thwart the laws of the United States, he will meet his deserts at the proper tribunal; and President Johnson, for his recent conduct in setting at defiance the plain mandates of a statute, will be arraigned before the Senate for trial, for I have no doubt of his impeachment by this House. He will learn to his sorrow that Congress will not allow usurpation even by the highest officer in the land, and that the former vote on impeachment was no license to him to disregard the laws passed by Congress. I will therefore, Mr. Speaker, as the case now stands, cast my vote in favor of impeachment.

National Expenditures—Retrenchment—
The National Debt—The Mode and Measure of National Taxation—The National Currency.

SPEECH OF HON. W. LAWRENCE,
OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 25, 1868,

The House having under consideration the President's annual message.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, there are four subjects of absorbing interest which now engage the public attention—the national expenditures, the national debt, the mode and measure of national taxation, and the national currency.

WHAT IS NEEDED.

The people justly demand a reduction of national expenditures; that the public faith shall be preserved inviolate, but that the burden of interest on the national debt should be made less, with just provision for the ultimate payment of its principal; that national taxes should be reduced in amount, removed from manufactures and all products of labor, except luxuries, and be faithfully collected, and that a settled policy shall be adopted which will secure to the public the benefits and give a supply of national currency adequate for all the business wants of the country, and which will encourage and stimulate productive industry, and thereby restore universal prosperity.

With all this and the speedy reconstruction of the rebel States on the basis of loyalty and justice, with guarantees for the future security and peace of the country, a policy will be adopted which will command the public approval. While there is apparently a general concurrence in the desire to accomplish most of these purposes, the mode of doing so is not so readily agreed upon.

THE PUBLIC EXPENSES—THEIR REDUCTION.

I propose now to speak of the national expenditures, the responsibility for their increase, and the proper mode of their reduction.

The expenditures during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1860, paid in gold, were as follows:

To civil service, including legislative, executive, judiciary government of territories, surveyors, Mint, assistant measurers, and inspectors—total civil list.....	$6,148,655 41
Foreign intercourse.....	1,163,207 15
Miscellaneous services.....	20,658,007 92

Total.....	27,969,870 48
Service of Interior Department (Indians and pensions).....	3,955,686 59
Service of War Department.....	16,409,767 10
Service of Navy Department.....	11,513,150 19
To the public debt.....	17,613,628 00

Total.....$77,462,102 36

(House Ex. Doc. 2, 36th Cong. 2 Sess.; An. Rep. Secretary Treasury.)

The revenues were then derived from customs, public lands, loans, and Treasury notes, with a little over one million dollars from miscellaneous sources, and none from what is now known as "internal revenue."

THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY RESPONSIBLE FOR THE DEBT.

The great rebellion has imposed new burdens on the people, in the form of a national debt, on the 1st February, 1868, of $2,651,498,601 98, besides the annual expenditures for pensions, bounties, and interest, requiring a system of internal revenue taxation hitherto almost unknown. The people feel this grievous burden, and they will hold in eternal remembrance the fact that the Democratic party is responsible for it all. The rebellion, in its origin and progress, was exclusively chargeable to the Democratic party. Not one Republican was engaged in it. During its mad career the Democratic party gave it "aid and comfort" in the northern States, and to-day there is scarcely a political demand made by southern rebels to which northern Democrats are not ready to assent.

WHAT DEMOCRACY HAS DONE.

The rebellion has not only left us a legacy of national debt, but has entailed upon us an annual charge, which for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1869, will be:

For pensions to soldiers, their widows, and orphans.....	$30,330,000
Bounties to soldiers.....	25,000,000
Interest on the public debt.....	130,000,000

Total.....$185,330,000

If we add to this for collecting internal revenue the amount it cost in 1867, $7,712,089, the total will be $193,042,089. If we should now add the expenses of the last year of President Buchanan's administration as I have shown, $77,462,102 36, and then add the difference between gold paid in Buchanan's last year and paper payable now at forty per cent., $30,984,840 80, it would make a total of $301,489,032 16.

REPUBLICAN AND DEMOCRATIC ECONOMY CONTRASTED.

That is, the cost of administering the Government for a year now with the same economy practiced during the last year of Democratic rule, adding the inevitable burdens growing out of the rebellion, and allowing for the difference between paper and gold would be $301,489,032 16. In this estimate, too, no addition is made for increase of officers made necessary in auditing and paying pensions, bounties, and interest on the public debt.

The appropriation bills now before Congress, if passed in the form reported by the Committee of Appropriations, will work a great reduction on this estimate.

They are as follows:

To civil service, including legislative, executive, judicial government of territories, foreign intercourse and miscellaneous.....	$36,430,912 32
Pensions.....	30,330,000 00
Indians.....	3,000,000 00
War Department.....	33,082,093 00
Navy.....	18,096,045 00
West Point Military Academy.....	803,000 00
Interest on public debt.....	130,000,000 00
Bounties to soldiers.....	25,000,000 00
Total.....	$276,242,050 32

This is a reduction on the basis of the last year of Democratic rule of $25,246,981 84. The civil and miscellaneous service in the last year of Democratic rule was $27,969,870 48 in gold, equal now in paper to $39,157,818 67, while the proposed appropriations are only $36,430,912 32, being a reduction of $2,726,906 35. The estimate of Mr. Wells, Special Commissioner of the Revenue, is that the expenditures for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1869, would be:

Civil service.....	$40,000,000
Pensions and Indians.....	25,000,000
War Department.....	53,000,000
Navy.....	21,000,000
Interest on the public debt.....	130,000,000
Total.....	$270,000,000

(House Ex. Doc. No. 81, 40th Cong., 2 Sess., January, 1868.)

General Grant asks for the War Department $33,000,000. (Blaine's speech, February 6, 1868.) If Congress shall indorse the appropriations asked by a Republican Committee of Appropriations the public burdens will be greatly reduced, but I demand a still greater reduction, so that we may deserve to have it said, "We knew our duty and did it fully."

The Secretary of the Treasury tells us—

"That the contracting of large public debts is unavoidably attended with imprudent, if not reckless, expenditures, and that when those intrusted with or possessing governing power have once enjoyed the luxury of using or expending freely the moneys under their control, (and this is always the case during the progress of expensive wars,) proper economy is afterward exceedingly difficult to be enforced."—Annual Report, November 30, 1867.

DEMOCRATIC EXTRAVAGANCE.

And now, sir, I charge upon the administration of Andrew Johnson, supported as it is by every rebel South and every Democrat of the North, a deliberate purpose to oppress the people by extravagant and profligate public expenditures.

The Secretary of the Treasury asks for appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1869, as follows:

For the civil service.....	$51,000,000
For pensions and Indians.....	35,000,000
For the War Department, including $25,500,000 for bounties.....	120,000,000
For the Navy Department.....	36,000,000
For the interest on the public debt.....	130,000,000
Total.....	$372,000,000

(House Ex. Doc. No. 2, 40th Cong. 2d Sess.; An. Rep. Sec. Treasury.)

The pending appropriation bills propose $276,242,050 32, being a reduction of $95,757,950 68 on the estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury.

The Secretary of the Navy asked for appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1869, to carry on ship-building, for the repair of navy-yards, and for expenses, amounting to $47,317,183 95, (Rep. Sec. Navy, Dec. 2, 1867.) But Congress having revolted at such a demand, he sent in revised estimates, in which he says:

"In the revision the contemplated reduction of the naval and marine forces, in accordance with bills now before Congress, and the expression of the House of Representatives that 'it is unnecessary to proceed further at present in building or equipping ships of war,' has been considered."

"The estimates submitted last year for the navy-yards, and which have this year been repeated—Congress declining at its last session to make the appropriations asked—indicate, in part, what is required to place the navy-yards in an efficient condition, and at no distant day the improvements called for should be made."

"In view of the obvious disposition to curtail expenditures and to postpone to a future day the improvement of our navy-yards, as well as to reduce the number of men in the Navy and Marine corps, I have thought proper to revise the bureau estimates, and to indicate the appropriations considered essential, and without which the service may be seriously crippled."

"The estimates submitted with my annual report amount to $47,317,183 95; the revised estimates, herewith transmitted, to $24,924,478 03; a reduction of $22,392,705 92."—House Ex. Doc. 111, 40th Cong. 2 Sess., Jan. 22, 1868.

The expenditures for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867, were:

For the civil service.....	$51,110,027 27
For pensions and Indians.....	25,579,083 48
For War Department.....	95,224,415 63
For Navy Department.....	31,034,011 04
For interest on the public debt.....	143,781,591 91
	$346,729,129 33

Loans paid.....	$746,350,525 94
Receipts from loans.....	640,426,910 29

Reduction of loans.....$105,923,615 65

(House Ex. Doc. 2, 40th Cong. 2 Sess.; An. Rep. Sec. Treas.)

The proposed appropriations will be a reduction of $70,487,077 01.

Mr. Speaker, I have said I am in favor of a reduction in the proposed appropriations.

DO JUSTICE TO SOLDIERS, THEIR WIDOWS, AND ORPHANS.

The people ask no reduction of bounties to soldiers nor of pensions to them, their widows, or orphans. For one I am in favor of extending and increasing some of them until justice is done to every living soldier and to the family of every one who is dead. I have voted and will again vote to do justice to the needy soldiers of the war of 1812.

HOW TO REDUCE EXPENSES.

And I would economize and provide the means of doing this by a general reduction in the number of officers and in the amounts of some of the salaries and expenditures in nearly every department of the Government.

In many branches of the public service there are thousands of officers whom I would not underrate, but whose duties do not require the talent, learning, or skill of those who print the books and papers that educate the young and the old, or of the mechanic whose genius and intellect, aided by strong arms, create the houses we live in, the steam-engines, ships, and railroads cars that facilitate and carry on commerce and travel, or the implements of husbandry and art which develop the wealth and ornament the land. Many of the offices do not require the talent or skill necessary to till the earth successfully and produce the bread upon which we live. Yet in a large majority of the districts represented on this floor these officers, for the performance of duties less onerous than the labor I have described, are receiving a compensation largely in excess of the rewards of skilled industry. The rewards of labor, I know, should be increased. But I know of no rule of justice which will not compensate the various forms of labor equally with official duties requiring no greater learning and skill, and official salaries should be conformed to that standard. But what is the proper mode of retrenching?

WHERE TO BEGIN RETRENCHMENT.

Mr. Speaker, I would begin here in this Capitol. I would cut down the salaries of members of Congress.

In a speech which it was my privilege to make in this House December 20, 1866, in favor of a bill I introduced for that purpose, I gave my views fully, and I need not repeat them now. That bill did not receive a favorable consideration.

On the 25th of March, 1867, I introduced another bill, now pending in the Committee of the Whole, to restore the salary of members of Congress to what it was prior to the increase, but to cut down mileage one half. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. HUBBARD] has introduced a joint resolution, now before the Committee on Appropriations, proposing a reduction in the annual salary and mileage. On two other occasions I have urged a reduction of mileage—on the 26th of March, 1867, and February 7, 1868.

The argument used against this is that the pay now allowed in currency is no greater than the former pay in gold; that the order of talent employed here in many cases could earn more in other pursuits; that the law which increased the pay cut down mileage one half, and so equalized the compensation of members without materially increasing the aggregate expenses; and finally, if the suggestion be entitled to respectful notice, we are told that members in favor of a reduction may decline to receive the increased salary. My views are already known; and I will only now repeat that if it be a sacrifice on our part to reduce the compensation it is one we ought to make in view of onerous taxation, and to put us in a position consistently to reduce salaries generally. Every effort at reduction is met with the objection that our own pay should be reduced; and the evil is not remedied if one or a dozen members should decline to accept the compensation fixed by law. If a single member should do so only one dollar in every two hundred and forty-two would be saved to his constituents. They would still be taxed to pay all others the full salary, while they would receive none of the benefits accruing therefrom.

THE NEXT STEP IN RETRENCHMENT.

The next step in retrenchment, in my judgment, should be more sweeping in its character.

There is one fact well known here not so generally understood by the people.

Each standing committee in Congress represents and has charge of some one branch of the public service, which is also represented itself by a department of the Government. Thus the Judiciary Committee, of which I have the honor to be a member, is charged with the duty, among others, of supervising bills affecting the courts and law officers of the Government. The Committee of Ways and Means has charge of the internal revenue laws, and in part passes on matters affecting the Treasury, and especially that branch of it known as the internal revenue department. So various other committees have charge of military and naval affairs, public lands, commerce, pensions, &c. The duties of the Committee of Ways and Means and the Departments of the Government it represents involve more labor and expense and require greater responsibilities than the whole government of several of the States.

No one member of Congress ever did or ever will understand all the details of bills reported by all the committees, much less of the Departments of Government they represent. This Government is a vast and complicated machinery.

We are compelled to rely on the reports of committees in very many matters to govern our votes.

Now, sir, as no one member can learn all the details of needed retrenchments, we should require each Cabinet officer to report what reductions of expenses can be made in his Department, and instruct each standing committee of the House to report such bills affecting the public service as will reduce expenses to the lowest point compatible with justice and the national interests. This mode, I believe, will be effectual; any other, I fear, will be a failure.

HOW SOME EXPENSES INCREASE.

I will present a few examples of the mode in which an increase has been made in some Departments, and that will serve to illustrate how they and others may be remedied.

In the naval appropriation act of April 17, 1866, a clause was inserted repealing the act of March 3, 1835, prohibiting certain allowances to naval officers. (14 Statute, 38.) The result is an increase of a million or two in naval expenditures.

HO. OF REPS.

National Expenditures, &c.—Mr. Lawrence.

40TH CONG....2D SESS.

A reference to other statutes will show an increase in other expenditures after the war is over and prices receding. (Act of March 3, 1835, 4 statute, 755, sec. 1; act of July 16, 1862, 12 statute, 686; act of July 28, 1866, 14 statute, 322, sec. 8; act of February, 28, 1867, 14 statute, 416; act of March 3, 1857, 11 statute, 252, sec. 1; act of April 1, 1864, 13 statute, 39, sec. 3.)

REVISE THE ESTIMATES.

The Secretary of the Navy heard the distant thunder and gave us a specimen of "revised estimates;" but they should again be revised. The Secretary tells us that 103 vessels are now in use, with 898 guns, 49 iron-clads are laid up, and 86 are not completed or repairing.

One of the best business men of the nation, familiar with the foreign and domestic commerce of the country, E. B. Ward, of Detroit, in a recent publication, says:

"I took especial pains to ascertain what reductions ought to be made in the War and Navy Departments, and, so far as I could, in the civil service, and I am entirely satisfied that the number of ships in actual service should be reduced from one hundred and three to not over thirty in all, and that the whole naval expenditures ought not to exceed $12,000,000 for the current year. The great naval expedition now on exhibition in Europe ought to be ordered home at once and laid up; twenty ships are all that are now needed to protect our interests abroad."

That, Mr. Speaker, is the kind of retrenchment we need.

EXTRAVAGANCE OF TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

The Secretary of the Treasury recommends "that retrenchment be introduced into all branches of the civil service;" by which he evidently means in all branches except his own, for he proceeds to say:

"The Secretary also renews the recommendation contained in his last annual report, of a reorganization of the bureaus of the Department, and most respectfully and earnestly solicits for it the favorable action of Congress. The compensation now paid is inadequate to the services performed, and simple justice to gentlemen of the ability and character of those employed in the Department requires a liberal addition to their present compensation. Since the rates of compensation now allowed were established the duties, labors, and responsibilities of the bureaus have been largely increased, and the necessary expenses of living in Washington have been more than doubled."—Annual Report, November 30, 1867.

It was under the influence of counsels like this that the joint resolution of February 23, 1867, gave an "extra allowance" by an increase of twenty per cent. for one year, from June 30, 1866, in the pay of most of the civil employes at Washington whose salaries do not exceed $3,500 per year, (14 Statute, 569,) and which cost the nation nearly two million dollars, being more than double the whole annual salary of all the members of the House of Representatives, and five times as much as the increase in their compensation by the act of July 28, 1866.

The proposition is renewed to continue this "extra allowance," and here, too, is ample room for the exercise of economy. The expense of collecting our revenue is made too large by the number and pay of some officers. On the 25th February, 1867, I had the honor to propose a reduction which would have saved to the nation annually nearly two million dollars.

REDUCE THE TAXES.

The people have been taxed too heavily. For the fiscal years ending June 30, 1866 and 1867, respectively, the receipts into the Treasury were:

	1866.	1867.
From internal revenue.....	$310,906,984 17	$265,920,474 65
From customs (coin).....	179,046,651 58	176,417,810 88
From public lands.....	665,031 03	1,163,575 76
From miscellaneous sources.....	67,119,369 91	42,824,852 50
From direct taxes.....	1,974,754 12	4,200,233 70
	$559,712,790 81	$490,526,947 49

(House Ex. Doc. 81, 2d Sess. 40th Cong.; Wells's Rep., January, 1868.)

This is over fourteen dollars per capita of population.

WHY TAXATION SO GREAT?

This enormous taxation was secured through the gross demands and worse estimates of this Democratic administration.

The following are the receipts as estimated by the Secretary of the Treasury to guide the action of Congress, and the actual receipts thereby secured:

For fiscal year ending June 30, 1866.

	Estimated receipts.	Actual receipts.
From customs.....	$70,000,000	$179,046,651 58
From internal revenue.....	300,000,000	310,906,984 17
From lands.....	1,000,000	665,031 03
From miscellaneous.....	25,000,000	69,094,124 03
Total.....	$396,000,000	$559,712,790 81
Difference.....		$163,712,790 81

(Secretary's Report, December 6, 1864, p. 12.)

For fiscal year ending June 30, 1867.

	Estimated receipts.	Actual receipts.
From customs.....	$100,000,000	$176,417,810 65
From internal revenue.....	275,000,000	265,920,474 88
From lands.....	1,000,000	1,163,575 76
From miscellaneous.....	20,000,000	45,025,086 20
Total.....	$396,000,000	$490,526,947 49
Difference.....		$94,526,947 49

(Secretary's Report, December 4, 1865, p. 20.)

The Committee of Ways and Means have not yet reported a bill for the reduction of internal revenues and taxation; but the expenses of the nation should be so reduced as to raise from all sources not more than $275,000,000 annually. The amount collected in 1867 was $490,526,947 49. This would make a reduction for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1869, of $215,526,947 49.

The Secretary of the Treasury estimates the receipts for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1869, as follows:

From customs.....	$145,000,000
From internal revenue.....	205,000,000
From lands.....	1,000,000
From miscellaneous sources.....	30,000,000
	$381,000,000

If Congress should only reduce expenses to $300,000,000, and if his estimate from customs, lands, and miscellaneous sources should be realized, making, as they do, $176,000,000, the internal revenue can be reduced to $124,000,000. But if $150,000,000 of internal revenue should be required, Commissioner Wells estimates that this can be collected as follows:

From distilled spirits (new system).....	$50,000,000
From fermented liquors.....	6,000,000
From tobacco and its manufactures.....	20,000,000
From income.....	35,000,000
From stamps.....	17,000,000
From legacies and successions.....	2,000,000
From banks, railroads, &c.....	10,000,000
From salaries.....	1,000,000
From gross receipts, including receipts of telegraph, express, and insurance companies, passenger receipts of railroads, steamboats, stages, lotteries, and theaters.....	7,440,000
From miscellaneous (schedule A, &c.).....	2,100,000
From fines, penalties, &c.....	1,460,000
	$152,000,000

(Wells' Rep. Jan. 1868; House Ex. Doc. 81, 2d Sess. 40th Cong., p. 41.)

And this, the Commissioner says—

"Would permit the removal substantially of nearly all of what are understood to be industrial taxes, and also offset the amount derived during the last fiscal year from the tax on raw cotton."

And he recommends a system which will remove annual taxes heretofore collected as follows:

Raw cotton.....	$23,770,000 00
Iron and manufactures of.....	7,920,000 00
Cotton manufactures.....	9,230,000 00
Woolen manufactures.....	4,800,000 00
Other textiles.....	1,800,000 00
All other manufactures, except liquors and tobacco.....	44,020,000 00
Total.....	$91,540,000 00

(Report. p. 14.)

This will approximate a system of taxation which will relieve great burdens, increase industry, and on this subject give satisfaction to the people.

In brief, then, on behalf of my constituents, I demand—

"That the Army, at the earliest practicable moment, be reduced to the minimum required to garrison forts and preserve the peace on the frontiers and along the lines of the Pacific roads; that the expenses of the Navy be reduced as far as can be done consistently with the protection of our commerce and the maintenance of our reputation as a maritime Power; that retrenchment be introduced into all branches of the civil service, and that there be no payment of damages which were unavoidable incidents of war in the rebel States."

THE FINANCIAL POLICY OF THIS DEMOCRATIC ADMINISTRATION.

The financial policy inaugurated by President Johnson and his Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. McCulloch, and by the aid and sanction of the Democratic members of Congress, has unnecessarily added to the public burdens, and is now working ruin to the business interests of the country. The public debt was created with gold at a high premium and war material and supplies at more than double the prices of former years.

On the 31st August, 1865, the legal-tender Government currency in circulation was:

United States notes.....	$433,160,569 00
Five per cent. notes.....	33,954,230 00
Compound-interest notes.....	217,024,160 00
Total.....	$684,138,959 00
In addition there was fractional currency.....	$26,344,742 50

Making a total Government currency of.....$710,483,701 50

(House Ex. Doc. 2, 1st Sess. 40 Cong.; 2 Rep. Sec'y Treas'y, Nov. 30, 1867.)

On the 1st day of February, 1868, the legal-tender Government currency in circulation was:

United States notes (greenbacks).....	$356,000,000 00
Compound-interest notes.....	53,145,170 00
Total.....	$409,145,170 00

In addition to this there was—

Fractional currency.....	$32,087,311 51
Postal currency.....	159,127 00
Total.....	$441,391,608 51

Thus, from August 31, 1865, to February 1, 1868, the Government currency was reduced $269,092,092 99. Much of this reduction was effected under the act of April 12, 1866, voted for by nearly every Democrat in this House, and which I opposed as well as I was permitted, (57 Globe, second session Thirty-Ninth Congress, part 2, pages 1466, 1608, 1614.) A bill suspending the power of the Secretary of the Treasury further to contract the currency finally passed both Houses of Congress January 16, 1868, which the President, though not approving, permitted to become a law by retaining more than ten days. But within the next ten months $53,145,170 of compound-interest legal-tender notes will become due and be paid or changed into other securities and cease to be money or a legal tender in payment of debts. (Act March 2, 1867; Annual Report Secretary of the Treasury, November 30, 1867, page 6.) There will then be outstanding less than $300,000,000 of legal-tender national currency, and the national bank circulation is now about $300,000,000. The business of the country demands at least $800,000,000 of paper money.

In January, 1861, the gold and silver coin in the United States was $385,000,000, and the actual bank-note circulation was $202,005,767, making a total of $587,005,767, and with $800,000,000 of paper money now not more than $600,000,000 would be in actual circulation, because the money held in reserve by banks and in the Treasury now exceeds $200,000,000. With increased prices and national taxes more money is required now than prior to the rebellion. Congress has adopted the wise policy of prohibiting the further contraction of the currency, and trade and industry would be stimulated and made productive after the compound-interest notes shall be canceled by a further increase of legal-tender notes to supply in part the amount withdrawn from circulation by the Secretary of the Treasury.

OBJECTIONS TO A REDUCTION OF CURRENCY.
A reduction of the currency is objectionable because—

1. The conversion of legal-tender notes bearing no interest into bonds bearing interest increases the burden of taxation.

2. It diminishes the prices of labor and property, and thereby requires more days' work and more of the products of industry to pay the interest and principal of the national debt and all other debts, taxes, and salaries of officers than if an adequate currency is maintained and the standard of prices preserved to which the business of the country has been adjusted and adapted, and which is now below that upon which the public debt was contracted.

The Secretary of the Treasury says:
"The prices of most kinds of property in the United States advanced near threefold during the war." "If the paper currency should during [the next year] be reduced fifty per cent, and prices of property should decline correspondingly, would it follow that the real value of property would thus decline? In the one case the value of the currency would be reduced in proportion to its increase in amount. In the other, the currency would be increased in value as it was diminished in amount. The increase or decrease of prices would, if no counteracting causes intervened, be the natural result of the increase or decrease of the measure of value, while real values remained unchanged."—Report, page 15.

A decline in prices is not a decline in values, says the Secretary! But a decline in prices affects no reduction in the amount of public or private debts. A decline in prices reduces the paying value of labor and property, and this is no small matter with $2,600,000,000 of national debt, with $700,000,000 of State, municipal, and corporate debts, and untold millions of individual indebtedness, and with annual taxes, State and national, amounting to $600,000,000.

It is sometimes said that greenbacks are an irredeemable currency. True, the nation cannot now pay gold. But they are redeemed every year in paying taxes and are again paid out, giving a currency alike useful and acceptable to the people.

DEMOCRATIC OPPOSITION TO GREENBACKS.

The Democratic party during the war opposed the issue of our "greenback" currency—declared that it would become worthless, denied the constitutionality of the legal-tender law, and since in Congress its members voted almost solid for its speedy withdrawal. (Globe, vol. 57, p. 1014.) Their President and Secretary of the Treasury now demand that we shall continue the process of contraction which, in its progress, has sent the premium on gold up from twenty-five to forty per cent., and produced wide-spread ruin and bankruptcy already. It has been recently stated—

"That about one hundred thousand people are thrown out of work in Massachusetts alone; in New Hampshire twenty thousand; in Maine ten thousand; in Connecticut thirty thousand—in all, about one hundred and sixty thousand persons. In Pennsylvania mills are being closed, workshops stripped of their hands, wages reduced, and employes, when kept, put upon half time."

Capital has laid idle because business men were alarmed and unable to embark in enterprises that would give employment to labor and add to the wealth of the country.

THE RUINOUS DEMOCRATIC POLICY OF CONTRACTION.
Yet all the while this "Johnson Democratic" administration has been urging contraction.

The Secretary of the Treasury, in his last annual report, says:

"The measures regarded by him [the Secretary] as important if not indispensable for national prosperity, and, as a consequence, for a permanent resumption, are the funding or payment of the balance of the interest-bearing notes, and a continued contraction of the paper currency."

His "funding" and "contraction" mean to convert the currency interest debt and the non-interest-bearing greenbacks into gold interest six per cent. bonds, thus increasing the burden, but destroying the money with which to discharge it. For one, sir, I repudiate the policy of this administration in all its parts.

THE NATIONAL DEBT.

And now, Mr. Speaker, a few words as to the national debt.

Upon this subject the questions which mainly engage public attention are when and in what shall it be paid, and shall it share the burden of taxation? On the 20th February, 1868, the Republican State convention of Indiana adopted a "platform of principles," in which it is declared:

"Third. The Government of the United States should be administered with the strictest economy consistent with the public safety, and internal revenue should be so laid as to give the greatest possible exemption to articles of primary necessity, and fall most heavily upon luxuries and the wealth of the country, and all property should bear a just proportion of the burden of taxation.

"Fourth. The public debt, made necessary by the rebellion, should be honestly paid, and all the bonds issued therefor should be paid in legal tenders, commonly called greenbacks, except where, by their express terms, they provide otherwise, and paid in such quantities as will make the circulation commensurate with the commercial interests of the country, and so as to avoid too great inflation of the currency, and an increase in the price of gold.

"Fifth. The large and rapid contraction of the currency, sanctioned by the votes of the Democratic party in both Houses of Congress, has had a most injurious effect upon the industry and business of the country, and it is the duty of Congress to provide by law for supplying the deficiency in legal-tender notes, commonly called greenbacks, to the full extent required by the business wants of the country."

The national debt on the 1st of February, 1868, was $2,651,498,601 98, as follows:

"Five-twenty" bonds, redeemable five years from date, but which are not required to be paid for twenty years, with six per cent. interest, payable in gold.

Amount redeemable April 30, 1867.....	$514,780,500 00
Amount redeemable October 31, 1869.....	129,443,800 00
Amount redeemable June 30, 1870.....	330,934,150 00
Amount redeemable October 31, 1870.....	195,927,250 00
Amount redeemable June 30, 1872.....	227,403,150 00
	1,398,488,850 00

"Seven-thirty Treasury notes"—Interest seven and three tenths per cent. in currency.

Treasury notes payable in three years from date, all due June and July, 1868, but convertible by law into five-twenty bonds, and which may therefore be redeemable July, 1873, or payable July, 1898.....	216,696,500 00
---	----------------

Total of these two classes.....$1,615,185,350 00

"Ten-forty" five per cent. bonds, interest and principal in gold, redeemable, at the pleasure of the Government, February 28, 1874, or may run to 1904.....$180,717,200 00

Bonds not due until 1881, interest payable at six per cent. in gold.....264,316,550 00

Total of these two classes.....$445,033,750 00

Debt bearing no interest.
United States notes called "greenbacks".....$356,000,000 00

Fractional currency.....32,087,311 51

Total.....$388,087,311 51

The residue of the debt consists of six per cent. bonds due in 1867-1868, Navy pension fund, compound-interest notes, Treasury notes, three per cent. certificates, matured debt, and gold certificates, &c., $203,192,190 47.

THE TEN-FORTY BONDS—THE BONDS OF 1881.

Of this debt, it is conceded on all hands that the ten-forty bonds are payable, principal and interest, in gold, and that the bonds payable in 1881 cannot, by the law under which they were issued, be sooner paid. (Act of March 3, 1864; act of March 3, 1863.) The greenbacks and fractional currency should now remain undisturbed.

MISCELLANEOUS MATURED DEBT.

The several classes of debt, making the aggregate of $203,192,190 47, including compound-interest notes, will be paid out of funds in the Treasury, or are already provided for.

THE FIVE-TWENTY BONDS.

The great body of the debt, $1,615,185,350, consists of five-twenty bonds and seven-thirties, convertible by law into five-twenties. With regard to all this, the Secretary of the Treasury proposes no change, but demands that it shall run the full period of twenty years, and in his last annual report he says:

"The bonds should be paid, principal as well as interest, in coin."—Annual Report, page 23.

THE TRUE INTEREST OF THE BONDHOLDERS.

Mr. Speaker, I have no sympathy with the men who would attack the capitalist or undervalue the patriotism of those who, in the perilous hours of the rebellion, came forward and contributed to aid the Government in carrying on a war which saved the life of the Republic. I would stand by the contracts we made with them, and with the widows and orphans whose means are invested in Government bonds; but I warn them that their only safety is to accept justice, make no demand beyond their contract, and assume a share in the burden of Government. If they fail in this, and terrible retribution follows, no part of the responsibility will be mine.

THE FIVE-TWENTIES MAY BE PAID IN GREENBACKS.

The original act of Congress authorizing the issue of five-twenty bonds is that of February 25, 1862. That act also authorized the issuing of "United States notes," commonly called "greenbacks," and provided that:

"Such notes" * * * "shall be receivable in payment of all taxes, internal duties, excises, debts, and demands of every kind due to the United States, except duties on imports, and of all claims and demands against the United States of every kind whatsoever, except for interest upon bonds and notes, which shall be paid in coin, and shall be lawful money and a legal-tender in payment of all debts, public and private, within the United States, except duties on imports and interest aforesaid."

And this was printed in substance on every greenback issued, and was notice to all the world of what the contract was and is with the holders of this class of bonds. Congress refused to insert a provision making the principal payable in coin. (Brooks's speech in House November 27, 1867; also, BURLEIGH'S—see Globe, volume 53, page 3187, in House, June 22, 1864.) The interest is payable in coin—the principal in any "lawful money." The act of March 3, 1864, authorizing the issue of ten-forty bonds made them payable, principal and interest, in coin.

It is not for us to determine the wisdom of these laws; we are to deal with contracts as we find them. Congress carefully omitting to make the principal of the five-twenties payable in coin and expressly declaring greenbacks a "legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private," except where otherwise specified, may have supposed that the same currency which paid the soldiers and which now pays pensions to them, their widows, and orphans—which pays all other loans, public and private, might equally pay this great debt of the nation.

All the States, except Massachusetts and California, pay in greenbacks the principal and interest of State debts contracted before they were known, and $700,000,000 of public indebtedness—State, city, county, township, railroad, and other bonds—all rest on the same form of payment.

The Treasury notes issued under the act of July 17, 1861, before greenbacks were known, were refused payment in gold when they matured three years from date. About six hundred and eighty-four thousand four hundred dollars of the $139,999,750 issued were paid in greenbacks and the residue converted into bonds.

THIS QUESTION MATERIAL NOW.

But it may be asked, how is it material now to inquire into the mode of paying the five-twenty bonds? I answer, by law the Government has the right to redeem these bonds after five years from date or elect to let them run on fifteen years longer.

If $1,615,185,350 of debt can be so renewed as to save to the taxpayers only one per cent. per year, it will amount to $16,000,000 in gold, equal to nearly twenty-three million dollars in currency, which in fifteen years makes an aggregate of $345,000,000.

If the debt is payable in gold it must run to maturity at six per cent. interest in gold, for it is impossible now to procure the means of paying this great debt; but if it may lawfully be redeemed in "greenbacks" it can soon be paid or funded at a less rate of interest. But shall "greenbacks" be issued to pay at once the whole debt? I answer no. The whole debt is not yet redeemable. Of the $1,615,185,350 of bonds $514,780,500 are now redeemable, and the residue at different periods. The amount of currency should be measured by the business wants of the country, and beyond this there should be no inflation, because this would disturb all values, change the relation of debtor and creditor, depreciate our currency, and produce bankruptcy and ruin far beyond any saving of interest effected on the public debt. It should be remembered, too, that such an issue of greenbacks would not pay the debt. They would constitute a liability to be paid sooner or later by taxes collected from the people, for no one anticipates an endless debt in any form. Our policy is not to inflate and depreciate the currency, but to consult the substantial interests of the productive industry of the country.

But the Government has the right to offer to the holders of the bonds now redeemable, and those hereafter to become so, the option to receive payment in "greenbacks" or in Government bonds running on long time and at a less rate of interest than is now payable. If the Treasury, from taxes or otherwise, cannot supply the greenbacks they can be borrowed, as they were during the rebellion, either on new bonds payable in greenbacks or gold, as may be most advantageous to the public.

This will work no injustice to bondholders. It is a faithful performance of the national obligation. The right of redemption was reserved to be exercised for the public benefit. It leaves the investment in bonds, at least, fairly remunerative. They were paid for, not in gold, but in greenbacks. The average price of gold and greenbacks has been thus stated for four years preceding 1866:

	Average price of gold in greenbacks.	Average value of greenbacks in gold.
1862.....	113 1-5	89¢
1863.....	145¢	68 4-5
1864.....	203¢	50¢
1865.....	132¢	64 15-16

The average price of gold in greenbacks for the four years was $1 48 9-10, and the average value in gold of greenbacks was $0 68 5-16. (Hays' Report to Secretary of the Treasury, January, 1866; New York Social Science Review, April, 1866, vol. 2, Nos. 1 and 2.)

Public creditors who paid for bonds with greenbacks at sixty-eight in gold have no right to complain if they are paid in greenbacks worth, as now, seventy-one cents in gold. The interest they have received at six per cent. in gold has been worth eight per cent. in greenbacks, and has been free from all State tax. With greenbacks at sixty-eight in gold when loaned to the Government the gold value invested has produced a rate of interest equal to nearly nine per cent. in coin.

The public debt, so far as it cannot be paid, should be put on a less expensive rate of interest as rapidly as it is or may become redeemable or may be practicable. This can be done and the bonds left at par in currency. The bonds are now at a premium. The quotations at the stock-board in New York for a given day in February, 1867 and 1868, were:

	Feb. 6, 1868.	Feb. 8, 1867.
United States 6s 1881, coupon.....	111½	108½
United States 5-20s 1862, coupon.....	111½	108½
United States 5-20s 1864, coupon.....	109	106
United States 5-20s 1865, coupon.....	110	107½
United States 5-20s 1865, new coupon.....	107½	105½
United States 10-40s, new coupon.....	104½	100½
United States 7-30s June.....	107½	105½
United States 7-30s July.....	107½	105½

Prior to the war our national six per cent. bonds commanded a premium of sixteen per cent.

Gold is now worth a premium of over forty per cent. on greenbacks.

THE RATE OF INTEREST.

If new bonds, bearing four per cent. interest in coin, or five per cent. in currency, at the option of the Government, should now be issued in exchange for greenbacks, the holders would have a profitable investment. If greenbacks should be estimated at eighty cents and gold at 125 the annual interest would be five per cent. gold interest on gold value invested; five per cent. currency interest on currency value invested; six and one fourth per cent. currency interest on gold value invested; and if the principal of the bonds be made payable in gold there would be the additional profit between the currency investment and the gold payment.

The legal rate of interest in most of the States does not exceed six per cent. in currency, and in some cases subject to tax. It is true sometimes the limitation and the tax are alike evaded; but nations should always borrow money at lower rates than individuals, because they pay without the risks and expenses attending individual loans.

On the 6th January, 1866, British three per cent. consols were worth in London eighty-seven and one eighth per cent. in gold, equivalent to a rate of interest of three and four sevenths per cent. A British consol bearing three and four sevenths per cent. interest, was therefore worth par. On November 1, 1867, consols sold at ninety-four and a half cents. If it be conceded that the greater abundance of capital there will secure money at a less rate of interest, our national credit should at least command equal confidence.

It is true, also, that in this country the annual increase of wealth is greater than in England, and hence we can afford to pay a larger interest. In 1861 the real and personal property in England was estimated at $31,512,000,000, with an annual increase of three per cent. The value of real and personal estate in the United States by the census of 1860, was $16,159,616,068.

The gross earnings of the entire people during the fiscal year 1860, were estimated at $6,794,624,000; the consumption at $6,085,463,259; net earnings, $709,160,781; being five per cent. on the capital value of all the property. (Social Science Review, vol. 2, Nos. 1 and 2, page 29, for 1860.)

The actual increase in wealth is thus shown by the statistics from the Census Bureau:

Decades.	Population.	Valuation.	Increase, per cent.	Decades.

Real and Personal Estate in the United States.

But this includes additions by new farms, immigration, &c., so that the net earnings of the people do not exceed five per cent. on the total capital, and the nation, therefore, cannot afford to pay exorbitant rates of interest.

WHY ENGLAND WAS OUR ENEMY—CAUSE OF HIGH RATE OF INTEREST.

During the rebellion various causes combined to require a high rate of interest. England sent out from her ports pirate ships to prey upon our commerce, while the great Democratic party of the North, scarcely less piratical, attacked the national credit, destroyed all foreign market for our bonds, and induced our European rivals to aid the rebel cause. The capitalists of Europe, save only in Germany, to a limited extent, refused to buy our bonds and the loyal people of the Republic, almost alone and unaided, supplied the sinews of war. The life of the nation was in peril and doubt. But now, with the Republic saved, new loans should be effected on better terms. The first loans made on the national credit, soon after the Government was organized, were mainly at an annual interest of six per cent., and now in the maturer years of the Republic better terms should be secured.

KEEP THE BONDS IN THIS COUNTRY.

When the national bonds are renewed our policy should be to discourage their sale abroad by providing that if so sold the rate of interest should not thereafter exceed three per cent. in currency.

It is estimated that $600,000,000 of our bonds are now in Europe sold at seventy cents on the dollar for brandies, wines, silks, and other fabrics. (See Finance Rep. 1856, p. 12.)

On this we are to pay $36,000,000 annual interest in coin, equal to $45,000,000 in currency, and if we adopt the theory of Mr. McCulloch, ultimately pay the principal in gold.

A nation whose bonds are sold at seventy, to be paid in par after receiving that seventy in commodities which destroy its own productive industry is on the high road to bankruptcy.

Europe holds $200,000,000 of our State, city, and railroad bonds, requiring annually $12,000,000 for interest.

During the past year we imported ninety million pounds of wool, worth $25,000,000 in gold. For the three years ending June 30, 1867, our imports were $1,038,669,207 gold value, equal to nearly fifteen hundred million dollars in currency, and in four years coin has been carried out of the country to pay for foreign goods amounting to $302,690,253. (House Ex. Doc. 2, 2d Sess. 40th Cong., Delmar Rep., 396.)

For the year ending June 30, 1867, the balance of foreign trade was $51,000,000 in gold against us, besides $48,000,000 for interest on bonds. On the 30th November, 1867, our fifty-two six per cent. bonds sold in London at seventy and five-eighths cents, while New Brunswick and Cape of Good Hope six per cents. sold at 105, Russian five per cents. at eighty-five, and Brazilian five per cents. at seventy-five. (House Ex. Doc. 81, 2d Sess. 40th Cong., 24.)

Our policy should be to reduce our imports, put an end to the exports of gold, discourage the ruinous traffic in our bonds abroad, and supply more extensively the wants of our people with the products of our own industry.

If the capitalists of Europe refused our bonds in war they should not reap golden harvests from them now in time of peace. I agree with the Secretary of the Treasury, who, in his annual report, says:

"Every tax-payer is personally interested in having the public debt placed at home, and at a low rate of interest."

Within the hour allotted to me I cannot discuss the subject of taxation, and I leave it, therefore, for another occasion.

Great as is our debt, the American people will maintain inviolate faith, preserve the national honor untarnished, and pay it to the uttermost farthing. If we now adopt a wise financial policy the nation will go on advancing in its career of unexampled prosperity, and the ages to come will attest the statesmanship of our times.

SPEECH OF HON. F. C. BEAMAN, OF MICHIGAN,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
February 22, 1868,

On the resolutions reported by the Committee on Reconstruction for the impeachment of the President.

MR. BEAMAN. Mr. Speaker, I have on two different occasions—once in the House and once in the Committee on Reconstruction—voted against proceedings for the impeachment of the President. Having regard to the condition of the country, the unsettled state of public sentiment, the sacred character of the presidential office, I have been unwilling to attempt a movement so delicate and so important in its consequences, unless upon the clearest proof, not only of a violation of the law, but of a corrupt intent on the part of the President of the United States in the administration of the executive department.

But on the 21st day of the present month the House and the country were startled by the appearance of an order which I will read:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
WASHINGTON CITY, February 21, 1868.

SIR: General Thomas has just delivered to me a copy of the inclosed order, which you will please communicate to the House of Representatives.

EDWIN M. STANTON,
Secretary of War.

HON. SCHUYLER COLFAX, Speaker of the House of Representatives.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
WASHINGTON, D. C., February 21, 1868.

SIR: By virtue of the power and authority vested in me, as President, by the Constitution and laws of the United States, you are hereby removed from office as Secretary for the Department of War, and your functions as such will terminate upon receipt of this communication.

You will transfer to Brevet Major General Lorenzo Thomas, Adjutant General of the Army, who has this day been authorized and empowered to act as Secretary of War ad interim, all records, books, papers, and other public property now in your custody and charge.

Respectfully yours, ANDREW JOHNSON.
Hon. EDWIN M. STANTON, Washington, D. C.

This order was by the House referred to the Committee on Reconstruction, who reported it back, accompanied by a resolution for the impeachment of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, for high crimes and misdemeanors. By the terms of the order the President assumes to remove the Secretary of War from his office and to appoint a Secretary of War ad interim. Two questions arise here: first, had he lawful authority to make the order; second, if he had not the power, was the act performed with corrupt intent? The authority of the President touching appointments, in so far as it is derived from the Constitution, is to be found in article two, section two, of that instrument, in which it is provided that—

"He shall nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law."

And in the same section it is further provided that—

"The President shall have power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session."

It will be seen that the Constitution provides for only two classes of cases in which the President may appoint, the one with the advice and consent of the Senate, (when in session,) the other to fill up vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate. It does not, in express terms, authorize him to remove an officer in any case. I do not forget that it has been insisted that the power of the President to remove from office without the consent and advice of the Senate arises by necessary implication; yet I do not stop to discuss the power of removal. But in the order in question the President assumes not only to remove but to appoint on his own responsibility; and this he does, not during a recess of the Senate, but on the day and at the very hour when that body is in session, ready to receive and act upon all proper executive messages. He assumed to appoint without the advice and consent of the Senate, for which, in the Constitution, he had no authority. He did not appoint to fill a vacancy, under the last clause of article two of the Constitution, because, first, there was no vacancy, and secondly, the act was not performed during a recess of the Senate.

It is said that the President created a vacancy by the same act which made the appointment; but this will not help his case, because, if it be conceded that he could remove, the Senate was in session, and no clause in the Constitution, under such circumstances, authorizes him to appoint, and the vacancy would remain until filled by the consent of the Senate.

The language of the Constitution seems to be plain and unambiguous touching the appointing power. What was the intention of its framers? Our fathers were jealous of executive power, and therefore they determined to put a check upon executive appointments. They therefore provide that appointments shall be by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. And yet a contingency might arise in which such consent could not be obtained. There might be a vacancy by death or resignation, or by removal, if you please, occurring in vacation, which the public interest would require to be filled; but even in such a contingency the framers of the Constitution were careful to provide that the appointment should be temporary, by commission to expire at the end of the next session of the Senate.

Now, in view of these provisions of the Constitution, will any candid man assert that the President is authorized, in the presence of the Senate in open session, to create a vacancy in the office of a head of a Department in order to fill it with an officer ad interim, thus relieving himself from the plain obligation to consult and advise with that body? What would result from such a construction of the organic law? Simply this, that though appointments by the express terms of the Constitution are to be made by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, nevertheless, by the President's interpretation, he may dispense with the services of a Secretary of War, the officer provided by law, altogether; and in lieu thereof he may employ a Secretary ad interim during his entire term of office. At the commencement of his term he may remove the Secretary of War and appoint an officer ad interim. This he may do while the Senate is in session. He fills the vacancy which he himself has created with a creature subservient to his will, and this being done, despite the wishes of the Senate, he may continue this officer ad interim during his entire administration.

Such a theory as that of the President needs only to be presented in order to be rejected. It is evident, then, that General Thomas has not been appointed Secretary of War ad interim under any authority contained in the Constitution.

But the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] relies upon acts of Congress to sustain the President's position, and quotes from the act of 1792, as follows:

"And be it further enacted, That in case of the death, absence from the seat of Government, or sickness of the Secretary of State, Secretary of the Treasury, or of the Secretary of the War Department, or of any officer of either of the said Departments whose appointment is not in the head thereof, whereby they cannot perform the duties of their said respective offices, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, in case he shall think it necessary, to authorize any person or persons at his discretion to perform the duties of the said respective offices until a successor be appointed, or until such absence or inability by sickness shall cease."

But it is sufficient to say of this section that the Secretary of War was neither dead, nor absent from the seat of Government, nor sick, whereby he could not perform the duties of his office, and his case is not brought within the statute.

The gentleman from New York also cites from the first section of the act of February 13, 1795, as follows:

"That in case of vacancy in the office of Secretary of State, Secretary of the Treasury, or of the Secretary of the Department of War, or of any other officer of either of the said Departments, whose appointment is not in the head thereof, whereby they cannot perform the duties of their said respective offices, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, in case he shall think it necessary, to authorize any person or persons, at his discretion, to perform the duties of the said respective offices until a successor be appointed or such vacancy be filled."

Upon this section of the act of 1795 I remark that it is clear that at the time of its passage it was not understood or pretended that the President was invested by the Constitution with an unlimited power of appointment beyond the control of Congress. It was not pretended that Congress could not limit or enlarge or regulate the power to appoint; otherwise this law never would have been passed. And by parity of reasoning it is evident that the Congress of 1795 did not believe that the Constitution gave to the President power to make temporary appointments except as is provided in the last clause of article two of the Constitution.

It must also be remembered that the statute of 1795 is to be construed in connection with the Constitution, and so interpreted as to be in harmony with that instrument. The language of the statute is—

"To authorize any person or persons at his discretion to perform the duties of the said respective offices."

When? Why, "in case of vacancy in the office of Secretary of State," &c., "whereby they cannot perform the duties of their said respective offices." It was intended clearly to provide for cases of emergency when for the time being the vacancies could not be filled in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution. Now, in the case of the Secretary of War there was no vacancy. The same order that assumed to appoint General Thomas Secretary of War ad interim undertook to remove Mr. Stanton. The latter was not incompetent to discharge the duties of the office.

And it is very clear that unless you propose to charge the Congress of 1795 with the stupidity and wickedness of attempting to nullify the Constitution of the United States, and with an attempt to authorize the creation of an irresponsible officer ad interim, to continue without limit, you cannot believe that the statute was ever intended to cover a case like the one now under consideration. It was never intended to exclude the Senate from a supervising care over Executive appointments. It was never intended to authorize the President to remove officers and make appointments without the advice of that body during its session.

But, suppose you assume that by the act of 1795, the President was authorized to make the order in question, then the answer is, that act is repealed. Was it constitutional to enact a statute giving the power to appoint and regulating the power of appointment? Then it is equally constitutional to repeal such statute and to make other regulations touching appointments. Was it competent to provide by law that the President might appoint a temporary officer or an officer ad interim? Then it was equally competent to declare that no such officer should be appointed. Is the tenure-of-office bill unconstitutional because it assumes to interfere with the appointing power? Then the law of 1795 was void for the same reason. Let it be borne in mind that I am not now discussing the power of removal; I am considering the power of appointment without the advice and consent of the Senate when in session.

The first section of an act entitled "An act regulating the term of certain civil officers," approved March 2, 1867, provides—

"That every person holding any civil office to which he has been appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and every person who shall hereafter be appointed to any such office, and shall become duly qualified to act therein, is and shall be entitled to hold such office until a successor shall have been in like manner appointed and duly qualified, except as herein otherwise provided: Provided, That the Secretaries of State, of the Treasury, of War, of the Navy, and of the Interior, the Postmaster General, and the Attorney General shall hold their offices respectively for and during the term of the President by whom they may have been appointed, and for one month thereafter, subject to removal by and with the advice and consent of the Senate."

The sixth section of the same act declares:

"That the removal, appointment, or employment made, had, or exercised contrary to the provisions of this act, and the making, signing, sealing, countersigning, or issuing of any commission or letter of authority for or in respect to any such appointment or employment, shall be deemed, and are hereby declared to be high misdemeanors, and upon trial and conviction thereof every person guilty thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding ten thousand dollars, or by imprisonment not exceeding five years, or both said punishments, in the discretion of the court: Provided, That the President shall have power to make out and deliver, after the adjournment of the Senate, commissions for all officers whose appointment shall have been advised and consented to by the Senate."

Does the law of 1795 authorize the appointment by the President of "a person or persons" in case of vacancy during the session of the Senate? Then the act of 1867 repeals it and makes the appointment or employment of any such "person or persons" a high crime and misdemeanor. It is clear, then, that the order of the President of the United States, whereby he undertakes to remove the Secretary of War and to appoint an officer ad interim to fill the assumed vacancy, was unconstitutional, illegal, and void.

Hence we are led to inquire, was this act of the President corrupt and criminal? This question is important, because I frankly admit that a violation of the law by the President would not, of necessity, be ground for impeachment. If under any great, pressing, public necessity the President should go beyond the strict letter of the law by mistake or even with knowledge whilst acting in good faith with the view to avert national danger, for such act he would not necessarily be impeachable.

But was there in this case any such urgent necessity? Was Mr. Stanton incapable of discharging the duties of his office? Was there any malfeasance in office? Was there any vacancy to be filled? Was the Secretary of War a dangerous man? The Senate had just declared that he was not; and had recently disapproved of his suspension. The Senate was in session, and a nomination could have been made and confirmed, if need be, in thirty minutes. Unfortunately for the honor of the President, we have conclusive evidence that he was not trying to obey the law, but, on the contrary, he was seeking to evade—nay to violate it. His correspondence with General Grant is before the House and before the country. This correspondence shows that he knew that the removal of Mr. Stanton was contrary to the wishes of the Senate, contrary to the will of the loyal people of the country. He knew that among all the distinguished men who rendered valuable services to the country during the civil war, no one was more firmly seated in the affections of the people than the Secretary of War.

He had conceived the intention of overthrowing the liberties of his country, and that man who had, with so much ability and fidelity, resisted the rebel hordes, was in his way. He must have some pliant tool in the Department of War through whom he could issue secret orders to the Army. In the recess of the Senate he suspended the Secretary, and on the reassembling of that body, under color of a pretended compliance with the tenure-of-office bill, he communicated his flimsy reasons for the suspension, which were not approved. He was not disappointed by the decision. He knew they would not be approved. He knew that his reasons were invalid and malicious. It was a mere trick to get Mr. Stanton out of office under color of law, and then to keep him out by force. Hence, anticipating the decision of the Senate, he attempts to draw General Grant into a conspiracy to violate the law; but that sturdy soldier had dealt with rebels and traitors before, and he could not be induced to do an improper act even by the desire of the Commander-in-Chief of the Army and the Navy. In this transaction the conduct of the President was not simply illegal; it was intriguing, corrupt, criminal, and an outrage upon all the patriotic sentiment of the country.

I regard the issuing of the order in question as a high crime and misdemeanor in office, for which Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, should be impeached and removed from his high office; yet, in candor, I must say that I do not regard this as the greatest of his offenses. True, I have twice voted against impeachment; but not because I had any doubt that he was an enemy of his country or that he was an insidious usurper. For two years I have been satisfied that he richly deserved impeachment; but until this last act the evidence did not seem to be of that direct, pertinent character, pointing to a distinct, criminal act which would appear to be necessary for the arraignment and trial of the President of the United States.

On the 22d day of February, 1866, his real character and designs became obvious; nevertheless, he attempted, in a certain degree, to mask them under professions of regard for the Constitution and laws; yet he has practically set at defiance the laws of Congress and resisted the restoration of the rebel States.

While professing to execute the reconstruction laws he has been plotting to obstruct them. Whenever he has found a district commander disposed to execute the laws in good faith he has removed him. He has removed loyal civil officers and put rebels in their places. For the greater portion of the thousands of murders that have been perpetrated in the rebel States during the last two years he is responsible. He has denounced the law-making branch of the Government as an unconstitutional body. His entire administration has been characterized by tyranny, corruption, disregard of the Constitution and laws, and a revolutionary spirit; and lately he has been attempting to tamper with the Army. His attempts upon Grant, Sherman, Thomas, and others show but too plainly his ulterior designs, and we have to thank these patriotic gentlemen that we are not falling under a military despotism.

But the time has arrived for misrule to cease. His boldness has increased and kept pace with the progress of his iniquity, and he has gone on from one step to another until at length his crimes have become so manifest as to produce conviction in the minds of all loyal men. Andrew Johnson, as President of the United States, obstructs the due execution of the laws of the land. He stands in the way of the restoration of thirty-five million people to peace and prosperity. He must be put aside in order that the nation may live.

Impeachment.

SPEECH OF HON. GODLOVE S. ORTH,
OF INDIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 24, 1868,

On the resolutions reported by the Committee on Reconstruction for the impeachment of the President.

MR. ORTH. Mr. Speaker, among the most important principles of republican government, that which we teach our children in their earliest lessons, and which is constantly impressed upon every citizen, is that the laws of the land must be respected. Under the influence of this principle we grow to man's estate, and upon its enforcement is based alike the security of the individual and the perpetuity of the Republic. Habitual respect for law has always characterized our people and made our nation one of the best and strongest of governments—a strength not upheld by the bayonet and the sword, but by the indomitable will of a pure and patriotic people.

Public sentiment, springing from and based upon virtue and intelligence, is more potent than armies or navies, and that which can only be accomplished in other lands by the use of material forces, by bloodshed, and revolution is here obtained by the potent voice of the people, expressed through the forms of law which they themselves have placed upon the statute-book. This is, therefore, a Government of the people, organized by themselves, founded by their own volition, based on the natural rights of man, and erected for the maintenance of those rights and the security of individual and general welfare. The several powers of the Government under our Constitution are divided into the legislative, executive, and judicial departments; the former springs directly from, and is also directly amenable to, the people. In theory, as well as in practice, it represents more nearly than either of the other departments the sovereign will of the people, from whom all political power is derived. The executive and judicial departments of the Government are amenable to the people through the power of impeachment, which, by the Constitution, is reposed in the Senate and House of Representatives, the latter having "the sole power of impeachment" and the former "the sole power to try all impeachments."

By another provision of the Constitution—"The President, Vice President, and all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment for and conviction of treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors."

In my judgment the offenses here contemplated are not merely such "crimes and misdemeanors" as the criminal courts take cognizance of under the laws of the land, but embrace such acts of omission or commission in the discharge of official duty as in the judgment of both Houses of Congress render the officer impeached unfit as the further depository of power. This House, as the grand inquest of the nation, is now considering the subject-matter of the pending resolution, declaring that the President of the United States shall be impeached of high crimes and misdemeanors in the exalted official position he now occupies. In the consideration of this question we should exercise the utmost calmness and caution, and deliberate with that spirit of candor and justice befitting the Representatives of a great people, sitting in solemn judgment upon the acts of their Chief Executive. In this spirit we have thus far acted, and I doubt not the same spirit will characterize our proceedings to the end. These are no "Star-Chamber" proceedings, hidden from the outside world. The eyes of the American people, yes, of all Christendom, are upon us, and what we shall do or shall fail to do will undergo the ordeal of the severest and most searching criticism.

In this grand drama there is no place for the partisan—the feelings of the hour must die with the hour—but our acts will rapidly assume the form of solemn records and pass into history, in whose cold and stern spirit they will be examined and approved or condemned. Who, then, is Andrew Johnson, and what are some of his official acts which now demand our attention? These questions can only be answered very briefly, indeed, in the limited time allowed me by the rules of the House.

During the convulsive throes which preceded the outbreak of the late rebellion he occupied a seat in the Senate of the United States as a Senator from the State of Tennessee. In the debates of that stormy period we find him hurling unmeasured anathemas against the embryo traitors who then occupied seats in that Chamber. In season and out of season, in the Senate and out of the Senate, he continued these philippics, which, by their force and virulence, soon attracted the attention of the public.

An ever confiding people, always willing to accord the purest motives, regarded these efforts as the outbursts of patriotism and loyalty, but which, viewed in the light of his subsequent career, are now seen only as the effervescences of personal hatred against those who, while plotting their treason, were unwilling to take him into their councils. Being thus separated from his former political, personal, and sectional friends—a separation made deeper and wider by the rapidly succeeding events of the rebellion—but one course remained to him, and this was to join his fortunes with those who were struggling for the maintenance of the Union.

During the rebellion the separation was complete, and a grateful but woefully deceived people, out of gratitude for patriotism apparently so disinterested, nominated and elected him to the second office in their gift.

He left his home in February, 1865, to assume the reins of office at the national Capitol. It appears from the testimony on the files of the House that while at Cincinnati he had an interview with Colonel Stanley Matthews, during which he remarked to Colonel Matthews, "You and I were old Democrats." Receiving an affirmative response, he continued, "I will tell you what it is, if the country is ever to be saved, it is to be done through the old Democratic party."

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that this most remarkable conversation furnishes a key by which to unlock all the subsequent character, conduct, and actions of Mr. Johnson. The loyal men of the land, who had submitted to every sacrifice, endured every hardship, and periled life and limb to save the Republic; these men who had so generously taken him into their confidence and made him one of their chosen and trusted chiefs; these men, in the language of Mr. Johnson, were unequal to the task of saving the country. If it were to be saved at all it must be through the instrumentality of the old Democratic party. Could unblushing impudence and effrontery go further?

"The old Democratic party alone can save the country," says the man who was about to assume the duties of that high office, conferred, not by the old Democratic party, but by the men who had rescued the country from the traitorous grasp of that party. Who were the "old Democratic party" who are thus lauded and thus to be trusted? Jeff. Davis, Toombs, Slidell, Mason, Vallandigham, and the long list of Johnson's former friends and associates, who, after being humbled, defeated, destroyed, are now to be trusted by him; to these he is willing to go, if now, in their low estate, they are willing to receive him as an associate whom they formerly rejected from their councils. I repeat, this conversation with Colonel Matthews solves the whole enigma of his subsequent conduct.

But let us proceed. He arrives at the Capitol, and on the allotted day of inauguration he appears in the Senate Chamber to take his official oath, in a state of beastly intoxication. Those of us who witnessed that most disgusting scene will never forget the ineffable disgrace which Johnson then brought upon the American people. The President-elect, his Cabinet, Senators, Representatives, judges of the Supreme Court, ambassadors from the nations of the earth, and thousands of citizens, all, all hung their heads in very shame.

Here, Mr. Speaker, was the first opportunity for impeachment, and the remedy provided for his removal should then have been used.

Shall it be said that the commission of a crime eo nomine must be committed before an officer can be impeached? Shall it be said that our people must endure the nuisance of a drunken President or Vice President for four long years, and have no power to remove the nuisance? Preposterous! A drunken debauchee is unfit for political station, and the Constitution gives ample power of removal in all cases of unfitness. It is that, among others, which constitutes the "misdemeanors" spoken of in the Constitution.

While this opportunity for impeachment was neglected his debauch continued. He had said that the "old Democrats" alone were capable of saving the country, and it is fair to presume, under all the circumstances, that he now sought and obtained association with "old Democrats." But how could these "old Democrats" save the country so long as the reins of Government were held by that great and good man, Lincoln? The rebel army was scattered, the rebel government was crushed, the "old Democrats" could not even "save" the confederacy; and all over the land the glad tidings of peace and of a living, undiscovered Union were hailed with words of joy and hymns of praise.

Men felt everywhere that the country was saved, and saved, too, despite the efforts of the "old Democrats," who had plotted its destruction. All men felt and believed this except, alone, Andrew Johnson and his "old Democratic friends."

Lincoln yet lived. His pure and elevated character, his lofty patriotism, his untiring energy and watchfulness, aided by millions of countrymen, were equal to the great task; and the Republic also lived. But while Lincoln lived how could the "old Democrats" have an opportunity of "saving the country"? He would not associate with them; he would not take counsel of them; he would not repose any confidence in their professions of patriotism; he would not confer upon them the high offices of the Government; he would not be governed by their wishes; he would not set aside the tried men of the country at their bidding; he would not recognize traitors as patriots, and hence, while he lived, he was a stumbling-block in the way of the "old Democrats" "saving" the country. This stumbling-block must be removed. The "old Democrats," who struck at the life of the country, would not hesitate very long in striking at the life of Lincoln, and thus remove this obstruction in their path to power. Lincoln fell, fell by the hands and under the machinations of the "old Democrats," whom Johnson affirmed were alone able to save the country.

Johnson succeeded to the vacant Presidency, and was now in a position to render aid and comfort to his "old Democratic" friends. But not so fast; the country must not be roused into suspicion by any hasty or injudicious action. On the contrary, it must be made to feel that a sterner man has succeeded to the Presidency; instead of suspicion being aroused it must be allayed, and the confidence of the loyal millions, bewailing the untimely death of their beloved Chief Magistrate, must be secured.

Johnson to his many other vices adds that of a most accomplished demagogue; and he felt called upon to play his rôle of deception, and he played it well. He denounced traitors more rigorously than ever; he became perfectly frantic in his assimulated ferocity—"traitors must be made to take back seats;" "traitors must be impoverished;" "traitors are unfit to live"—these are only a few of the choice epithets which he daily furnished to a confiding public. The caught and convicted murderers of the President must be speedily executed. His indignant wrath can hardly even thus be appeased. Whether this hasty and almost indecent execution was upon the principle that "dead men tell no tales" is best known to his own soul.

But the traitors, these "old Democrats," did not quake at his threatenings. They knew their man; alas! they knew him much better than those of us who had elevated him to power. They feared not, neither did they tremble, but approached him, not on bended knee, but with upright mien, and soon became the welcome guests and associates of the new major-domo of the White House.

With a profligacy amounting to corruption he pardoned thousands of these traitors, restored to them in violation of law the large estates, amounting in the aggregate to millions of dollars—estates which had been forfeited to the Government by the treason of their owners, and the proceeds of which should have been placed in the public Treasury to relieve a tax-ridden people from the burdens which the unholy rebellion had placed upon us. Not satisfied with this he issued pardons to leading rebels, whose hands were yet crimsoned with the blood of the bravest and best in the land, and appointed them to high offices of trust and responsibility, made them Governors of States, collectors of internal revenue, postmasters, district attorneys, and enabled them to become members of conventions to frame new constitutions for governments overthrown by the rebellion. Why should he not do these things? Was it not in full accordance with his declaration "that if this country is saved it must be saved by the old Democrats?" But because he does these things must we stand by and see him trample under foot the laws of the land, which by his oath of office he was bound to execute? In his public and official acts he entirely ignored the true and loyal men of the South who, at double peril of life and property, defied the power of the "confederacy," and in the midst of persecutions, trials, and hardships unparalleled in history dared to stand up for the defense of the old flag and the old Constitution.

He not only ignored this meritorious class of our fellow-citizens, but did all in his power to place them under the iron heel of their former masters, the self-styled aristocracy of the South. And yet, forsooth, he is not guilty of any "crime" or of any "misdemeanor" within the true intent and meaning of the Constitution!

But let us proceed. A great and powerful people can afford to be magnanimous even to its greatest criminal. We have been accustomed, throughout our entire history, to bear wrongs and outrage with a patience that was almost commendable. His purpose was deliberately formed; and, to its accomplishment, he brought all the vast powers and resources with which the Executive of our Government is clothed; and that purpose, judging from the testimony before this House and from the public acts of his administration, was to place the entire political power of the Government in the hands of the traitors who had attempted its destruction, and thus enable them to do precisely what they had failed to accomplish by their rebellion. In open defiance of the law he appointed traitors to office, who were unable, in consequence of their treason, to take the oath prescribed by the act of Congress of July 2, 1862, and in equal defiance and contempt of law he paid these officers their salaries out of the Treasury of the United States.

40TH CONG....2D SESS.

Impeachment—Mr. Sitgreaves.

Ho. OF REPS.

To thwart the efforts of a loyal Congress, in providing for the speedy restoration of peace and the adjustment of our troubles upon a liberal and enlightened public policy, he used the veto power on the false assumption that said Congress ought not to legislate upon questions of national concern without the unconditional admission of the rebel States to representation in Congress. He maliciously and wickedly used every effort in his power to bring Congress, the direct Representatives of the loyal people, into public contempt, by proclaiming that it was an unconstitutional body hanging on the verge of the Government. The same Congress which had provided the men and the money to crush out the rebellion; the same Congress which, during the four years of Mr. Lincoln's administration, had passed all the laws necessary to restore peace at home and command respect abroad; the same Congress which the sovereign people had time and again fully indorsed, was not a Congress of "old Democrats," and hence, in his judgment, not able to save the country.

Knowing well that there are those in every community who are ever willing to

"Crook the pregnant hinges of the knee
Where thrift may follow fawning," he has corruptly used his vast patronage in bestowing office upon those who became the laudators of his policy, thus attempting to demoralize the people and break down the serried ranks of the friends of the Union. Without law he has handed over to the rebels of the South, without money and without price, the railroads of the confederacy, with all their rolling stock, amounting to many million dollars. roads which were conquered by our Army, and many miles of which were constructed by the toil and labor of our own soldiers.

When Congress, in June, 1866, with singular unanimity, submitted to the several States of the Union an amendment to the Constitution, known as article fourteen—an amendment which addressed itself to the patriotism, the justice, and the mercy of our people, and calculated to rebuild the shattered portions of our Union upon the enduring basis of an elevated republicanism—he steps aside from his path of duty, impugns the motives of the Congress, misrepresents and distorts the principles of the proposed amendment, opposed its ratification, and willfully and maliciously uses the power and patronage of his office to accomplish his purposes.

In violation of law and the solemn obligations of our Government, he has given to red-handed rebels millions of acres of the finest lands of the South, which the former owners had forfeited, and which had been given to the freedmen for purposes of ownership and cultivation, depriving them of homes to which they were entitled, as a small recompense for the years of abject slavery which a cruel and bloody "patriarchal" system had forced upon them. Did he not incite, aid, and abet the riot in New Orleans, where peaceable and unoffending citizens were maltreated, wounded, and murdered without provocation and without cause? But the mind shrinks with horror from the contemplation of these multiplied wrongs, these gross infractions of the law. And yet we must be told that these atrocious and wicked acts are not high crimes and misdemeanors.

Mr. Speaker, at the first opportunity which presented itself to this House, I voted to impeach Andrew Johnson. I did so under a sense of my responsibility as a Representative of the people and the obligations of my oath to discharge my duty faithfully. Time and much reflection have but served to confirm me in the correctness of that vote; and, acting in the light of the evidence then presented, I cannot hesitate as to my duty to-day, when other wrongs, other crimes, other misdemeanors have been added to the long, dark, and bloody catalogue. Emboldened by our non-action heretofore—a failure not the result so much of a disbelief in his guilt as a belief that it were better for the country not to press impeachment, all of which he has woefully misinterpreted—the President has proceeded with rapid and insane strides in his treasonable designs.

Having read enough of history to know that all revolutionary purposes, to be successful, must have the support of military power, he sets himself to work to seduce our brave soldiers from their path of duty and their love of country.

He approaches the General of the Army, the great captain of the age, with his seductive wiles, but finds Grant as devoted to the Union as he was brave and brilliant in battle. Failing in this, he seeks to degrade this noble soldier or entangle him in the cunning toils of an unscrupulous politician. He turns toward Sherman for comfort, offering advanced rank for no other purpose than to complicate him with his comrade in arms and in victory, but the offer is repelled with the just indignation of a gallant and chivalrous chieftain. Foiled again, and still intent upon corrupting the Army, he makes court to the grim hero of Nashville, and with the same result. Johnson ought to know that the soldiers who for long and dreary years were battling for the Republic cannot be seduced from their integrity and made the supple tools of a corrupt Executive in his attempt to subvert the institutions of his country.

The possession of the War Office was long an object of his heart's desire. He recollects how, during Buchanan's administration, this office, under the auspices of the traitor Floyd, was made subservient to the purposes of the rebellion; how the arms and munitions of the country were placed within reach of the rebels; how the Army was so stationed as to be of no service to the then incoming Administration in stemming the torrent of treason then threatening to overwhelm the land. Johnson knew all this, and hence his anxiety for the control of this most important Department of the Government; but he saw it in the possession of a brave, true, and resolute man, who could not be swerved from his duty—neither cajoled by flattery nor intimidated by threats. When requested to resign, as early as last August, he told the President plainly that he should refuse, that he should hold possession of the office, because he believed the public good required it. Stanton was then suspended by virtue of the provisions of the "tenure-of-office" law, and by this act the President acknowledged the binding force and validity of that law, for he submitted the reasons for such suspension to the Senate. These reasons were afterward adjudged to be insufficient, and Stanton thus reinstated in his former position. Stanton thus became the President's Mordecai, and sat in the gate through which the President expected to pass in his revolutionary march. Blinded with rage at this "obstruction" in his path, he attempts a removal, and in this attempt palpably violates the plain letter of the Constitution and the equally plain letter of the law.

I will not stop to present this violation in detail, for it has already received ample elucidation.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, permit me to say that our duty in the premises is clear and simple. We present the President to the Senate charged with the commission of "high crimes and misdemeanors." It is the duty of the Senate to try the question of guilt or innocence. Let the charge be preferred, and let the trial be had. For three long years the country has been agitated, when it should have had peace; for three long years the people have been arrayed against their Executive; for three long years the struggle has continued to the detriment of the material interests of the country; and it is high time that this unnatural and unnecessary state of things should cease. If the President be found innocent the people will acquiesce in the judgment of the court; if found guilty, as I honestly believe him to be, let such be the judgment of the court, and that judgment will be sustained by the same stout arms and brave hearts which have thus far saved the nation. The instrument of mischief will be removed—the criminal receive the punishment his acts have merited—the country restored to a condition of peace, progress, and prosperity, and the world will be furnished with another proof of man's capacity for self-government.

Impeachment.

SPEECH OF HON. C. SITGREAVES,

OF NEW JERSEY,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 24, 1868.

The House having under consideration the following resolution, reported by the Committee on Reconstruction:

Resolved, That Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, be impeached of high crimes and misdemeanors in office—

Mr. SITGREAVES said:

MR. SPEAKER: I do not rise for the purpose of attempting to dissuade this House from its manifest determination to impeach Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, for high crimes and misdemeanors, for I well know that such an attempt would be futile.

I rise only to vindicate the history of facts, and to protest against a great wrong, in the name of justice and the people of a State who have ever stood firmest among the firm for the impartial administration of the laws and for the compacts of the Constitution in all their entirety, both in letter and spirit.

Andrew Johnson will be impeached by this House of Representatives, and in all probability the impeachment will be sustained by the Senate. The malignity of partisan hate will then be fully gratified. The last bulwark erected by the Constitution against the consolidation of power in the General Government will be broken down. With the judicial branch rendered powerless by your legislative acts, and with a creature of Congress in the executive chair, the work of consolidation will be complete.

We sit here as a grand inquest of the nation under that article of the Constitution which ordains that—

"The House of Representatives shall choose their Speaker and other officers, and shall have the sole power of impeachment."

Against the display of partisan hate, partisan denunciation, and appeals to partisan vengeance so freely indulged in the debate on this floor by members sitting in the high capacity of national grand jurors I have no protest to make. The propriety and justice of such a course are matters to be settled by members with their consciences, their country, and their God. But I do protest against the extraordinary efforts to excite the prejudices of the members of this great inquest on this great question by personal and political charges against the President not included in the indictment. I refer more particularly to the charges impeaching the private character of the President just made by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN,] and the charges made on Saturday by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] when he affirmed his belief that on the 22d of February, 1866, it was the intention of Andrew Johnson—

"To overthrow the Government and execute the purpose he had intimated before leaving Tennessee, to wit, that should he become President, and believe it to be necessary to save the life of the nation, he would perpetuate his power."

Now, sir, let facts answer this last charge. It is a fact that on the 6th of February, 1866, Congress passed a bill which was presented to the President for his signature, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to establish a Bureau for the Relief of Freedmen and Refugees,' and for other purposes." It is a fact that this bill extended the military power over every State in the Union containing freedmen and refugees, loyal or disloyal. It is a fact that this bill invested Andrew Johnson with the power of an autocrat—a bill which enabled him, with fifty thousand bayonets at his back, to imprison, try, and condemn the citizen without even the forms of law; to drag the judge from the bench and to "ride booted and spurred" over the Constitution and the liberties of the people. It is a fact that Andrew Johnson spurned this more than imperial power so freely laid at his feet by a Republican Congress, then representing, as they alleged, a large majority of the people. It is a fact that Andrew Johnson vetoed that atrocious bill on the 19th of February, 1866.

If Andrew Johnson then intended (as solemnly affirmed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania) to overthrow the Government, an opportunity was here offered to him by Congress that he, nor no other man ever dreamed would be offered by the Representatives of a free people to any man in any age or in any clime. Why, I ask, did he "reject the crown?" And for this bill the gentleman from Pennsylvania recorded his vote. Sir, if he knew that Andrew Johnson on the 22d of February, 1866, was plotting to overthrow the Government in accordance with his intimations given before leaving Tennessee, why, I ask, did the gentleman from Pennsylvania vote on the 6th of February, 1866, in favor of a bill which would have given Andrew Johnson this very power to subvert the Constitution and overthrow the Government?

We have been reminded by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] that we only prefer charges of impeachment but do not try the impeached, implying, I suppose, by this gratuitous information that we are not responsible for the result. Sir, we are responsible for the result. There is not a member on this floor but knows that if the Senators are true to their utterances on Friday last, the moment that the resolution of impeachment passes this House Andrew Johnson is, in effect, convicted of high crimes and misdemeanors, that all the subsequent proceedings of an appearance at the bar of the Senate to prosecute the impeachment, the organization of the court, and trial and conviction are but the enactment of a miserable farce, because the Senate have pronounced a decision by deciding the law and the facts in advance. I refer to the proceeding of the Senate convened in executive session on Friday last, and quote from the Globe:

"Whereas the Senate have received and considered the communication of the President, stating that he had removed Edwin M. Stanton, Secretary of War, and had designated the Adjutant General of the Army to act as Secretary of War ad interim: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate of the United States, That, under the Constitution and laws of the United States, the President has not the power to remove the Secretary of War and designate any other officer to perform the duties of that office."

Mr. Speaker, I quote this to let the country know that Andrew Johnson cannot have that fair and "impartial trial" which has been awarded to criminals of every grade by the usage and laws of centuries, and which is incorporated in the Constitution. I protest against it as a great wrong in every case to the individual, but in this case as an outrage and wrong to the people of the United States. I quote from Story's Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States, volume one, pages 517, 518, and 519; sections 743, 744, and 745:

"It is obviously incorrect in theory and against the general principles of justice, that the same tribunal should at once be the accusers and judges; that they should first decide upon the verity of the accusation and then try the offenders."

"The practice of impeachments seems to have been originally derived into the common law from the Germans. When it was adopted in England it received material improvements. In Germany, and also in the Grecian and Roman republics, the people were at the same time the accusers and judges, thus trampling down at the outset the best safeguards of the rights and lives of the citizens."

"The great objects to be obtained in the selection of a tribunal for the trial of impeachments are impartiality, integrity, intelligence, and independence. To insure impartiality the body must be in some degree removed from popular power and passions, from the influence of sectional prejudice, and from the more dangerous influence of mere party spirit."

Sir, I want the country to know that the charge of high crimes and misdemeanors against the President of the United States, upon which in a few hours we will record our votes, was first made by the Senate of the United States; that they have decided the verity of the facts; and that they have decided the removal of the Secretary of War to be a violation of the Constitution and laws of the United States; yet they, the accusers, will be the judges. Sir, I protest against this grim joke of the form of a trial before a tribunal who have pronounced judgment on the law and the facts in advance, as an act abhorrent to every principle of justice, as abhorrent to the instincts of every honest heart. The form of the trial will be in accordance with the forms of the Constitution, but what is form without the spirit? Sir, I am sick of hearing these words "forms of the Constitution" and "forms of republican Government," while the spirit is ignored or repudiated. Destroy the spirit of the Constitution and you have anarchy or the worst of despotisms under the form of a Republic. Destroy the mind or spirit of a man and you will have, indeed, the form of a man but that form will be a loathsome corpse or a drivelling idiot.

From the judgment of the Senate Andrew Johnson can appeal to God and his country, and if history, as it is said, reproduces itself, that appeal will not be in vain.

An American Senate, in a spirit of party hate, once declared that Andrew Jackson, in his acts relative to the removal of the deposits from the Bank of the United States, were not warranted by the Constitution or laws, but in derogation of both. The malignity of party hate triumphed over that incorruptible patriot, that great and good man, for a brief season; but what was the result. The hand of an indignant people expunged the resolution from the records of the Senate, and a hand, like the hand on the walls of Belshazzar's palace, wrote a sentence of political annihilation on his enemies, and now there are none so poor as to do reverence to that act of that Senate.

Mr. Speaker, if the President should be convicted by the Senate, and if history should repeat itself, the future student of history will learn the astounding fact that a personal and political enemy of the Chief Executive was forced by a party controlling the Government on that Executive as a confidential adviser; that when the Executive, impelled by his duty to the Constitution, the country, and himself, removed that adviser, he was impeached before the grand inquest of the nation for that act as a high crime and misdemeanor, with furious appeals to party vengeance, and tried and convicted by a Senate who had decided on the law and the facts in advance.

Mr. Speaker, I have no doubt of the result of an appeal to God and the country from such an impeachment. History will again repeat itself. The principles of right will triumph. There are some within the hearing of my voice who will live to see the black lines of expurgation traced around your resolution of impeachment. The memory of Andrew Johnson, now the victim of party vengeance, will be cherished as a bold and able defender of the Constitution when the memory of some of his persecutors is forgotten, or remembered only to be denounced by the patriot of future ages.

The Funding Bill.SPEECH OF HON. JOHN SHERMAN,

OF OHIO,

IN THE UNITED STATES SENATE,

February 27, 1868.

The Senate having under consideration the bill (S. No. 207) for funding the national debt and for the conversion of the notes of the United States—

Mr. SHERMAN said:

MR. PRESIDENT: The attention of the Senate has been so long occupied with grave political questions deeply exciting the public mind that I have no doubt it will appear a dull change in our debate to turn to questions purely of a financial and economic character; yet, as our constituents are laboring under the burdens of taxation and the acknowledged evils of a depreciated currency and demand relief from us, it becomes the imperative duty of Congress to give attention to this subject. The House of Representatives is now engaged in the performance of its constitutional duty of diminishing taxes; and your Committee on Finance deem it their duty to lessen, if possible, the burdens of the public debt and to give increased value to the United States notes, now made the compulsory basis of your circulation. We have, therefore, reported this bill after careful consideration. In advocating it I do not appeal to any political bias; I do not appeal to any sectional interest; nor have I any pride of opinion; and I shall only appeal to those considerations which actuate us all alike, the desire to relieve our people from all the burdens of taxation consistent with the public faith.

The Committee on Finance acknowledge that it is the first and highest duty of a Government to maintain inviolate the public credit. A strict compliance with public engagements is the first duty of every legislative body. Public credit is the highest property of a nation, its sure reliance in time of danger and war; it is a more valuable property than any other, and is not to be tarnished or soiled by any consideration whatever. But, subordinate to this great principle, it is our duty as legislators to relieve our constituents from every exaction not demanded by the national safety or the public interests. We have a right to take from our people their money to the extent necessary to carry on the ordinary expenses of the Government and maintain the public faith, but not one cent further. The great mass of mankind have nothing to protect except the reward of their daily labor. This is their only capital. In every community—and ours is more favored than most in this particular—the majority of men depend only upon their daily labor and enjoy nothing of the blessings of civil government except in the protection of the result of their labor. It is, therefore, our duty to take not one cent from them unless it is demanded by the public exigencies.

It is with this view, and actuated by this principle, that the Committee on Finance have endeavored to make this bill a bill of relief, reducing, if possible, consistent with the public faith, the interest of the public debt, and giving increased value to United States notes. We have endeavored in this bill to accomplish three results: first, to reduce the rate of interest with the voluntary consent of the holders of our securities; second, to make a distinct provision for the payment of the public debt; and third, to give increased value to United States notes, and to provide for a gradual resumption of specie payments. All these are objects admitted to be of the highest importance. The only question is, whether the measure proposed tends to accomplish them.

PRESENT CONDITION OF THE PUBLIC DEBT.

The body of our public debt consists mainly in the form of securities commonly known as the five-twenty bonds. Nearly all of the debt of the United States is either reduced already to that form of security, or is reducible within a very short period of time. I have prepared a statement from the official documents showing the amount and time of maturity of the five-twenty bonds. There are of the first issue, which became redeemable on the 30th of April, 1867, now outstanding $514,780,500. Of the second issue there will be redeemable on the 31st of October of next year $129,443,800; there will be redeemable on the 30th of June, 1870, $301,880,250, and on the 31st of October, 1870, $181,427,250. There are of the seven-thirties, which have either been funded into five-twenties or are in process of being funded, something over $480,000,000, making an aggregate of what might now be regarded as five-twenty bonds of $1,618,442,650, of which a little over $200,000,000 is yet in the form of seven-thirties, and will be funded before the 1st day of July next. In addition to this, there are of debts that are now matured, or which will mature this summer, an aggregate amounting to $106,042,949, the chief part of which are the compound-interest notes and the three per cent. certificates, making an aggregate of $1,719,485,599, all of which are either redeemable now or become so within five years from this period; the great body of them, however, are redeemable within the present and the next year.

REDEMPTION OF THIS DEBT MUST NOW BE CONSIDERED.

The first question that arises, Mr. President, is whether it is wise now to provide for the redemption of these bonds. If we were at liberty to choose we have not the power to choose. We are compelled to consider this question. It is already made the subject of political disputes. While it is being considered by us in Congress it is being considered by the people, and it is daily discussed all over this broad country as to how and when the five-twenties shall be redeemed. Especially in the West this has been made the subject of political contention. I might show you by the resolutions of political parties, both Republican and Democratic, that we cannot avoid or evade this issue. We must meet it. I have here the resolutions of both political parties in the State of Indiana, both declaring that these bonds ought to be paid in greenbacks and differing only as to the limit of greenbacks. I have also resolutions adopted in different parts of the country. The tendency of the Democratic party is to drift into a political declaration that these bonds shall be paid in greenbacks; and great masses of patriotic men all over the country of the political faith to which the majority of the Senate belong have come to the same conclusion. We are, therefore, compelled to consider this question. It will be made the basis of every election next fall in nearly all the northwestern States. No man can be elected to Congress unless he commits himself for or against this proposition. Therefore we are not at liberty to choose whether or not we will consider this question.

Sir, it was the first topic that was introduced into this session of Congress in both Houses. My honorable friend from Vermont, [Mr. Edmunds,] in a very elaborate speech, and altogether the best yet presented on his side of the case, introduced it on the first or second day of the session. The same subject was presented in the House of Representatives by a distinguished Representative from the same portion of the country, taking the opposite view. It is now more discussed than any other question except the question of reconstruction. It must be met by us here, and in anticipation of the movements of political parties. If other Senators have not, I certainly have been overwhelmed with propositions of all kinds and character from every part of the country, from every State in the Union, proposing various schemes of finance affecting the very question proposed to be dealt with by this bill.

My own conviction was, that two years ago this question ought to have been settled, and the ground and character and mode and manner of redemption of these bonds ought then to have been settled. I addressed the Senate on this subject on a bill containing similar provisions to this, on the 22d of April, 1866. I will read what I said then:

"Now, Mr. President, the only additional question I need present in this connection is: is this the time to fund the public debt? I say emphatically it is. I believe we have wasted four or five precious months in doing it. I believe that the process would have been easier at the beginning of this session than it will be now; and why? In order to fund the public debt of the United States a large amount of currency is necessary; but it is necessary for us to reduce our currency as soon as possible. We cannot get back to specie payments without some reduction of the currency. Every one desires to resume specie payments. Before we return to specie payments this debt ought to be funded. It cannot be funded on as favorable terms after we return to specie payments. The very abundance of the currency obviously enables us to fund the debt at a low rate of interest; and it is just and right, as this debt was contracted upon an inflated currency, that upon that same currency the debt ought to be funded in its permanent form."

THE POLICY OF CONTRACTION.

Mr. President, I believe that most reflecting men will now admit that if two years ago we had adopted some provision, comprehensive in its character, to fund the public debt and to provide for the redemption of the five-twenty bonds when they became redeemable, it would have been wiser. At that time no portion of them were redeemable. The first became redeemable about one year ago; but the whole country was then filled with the idea of Mr. McCulloch, that the only safety was in contraction, to get back to specie payments before anything was done with the public debt; and the policy was adopted of authorizing a contraction of the currency without any regard to funding whatever. That policy was entered into; and by the act of April 12, 1866, passed against my earnest protest, we gave to the Secretary of the Treasury almost unlimited power over the currency and over the public debt. We authorized him to convert every form of indebtedness into any form of indebtedness provided for by previous acts. There was no other limitation upon his power over the public debt or the currency except that he could only reduce the greenback currency at the rate of $4,000,000 per month. In every other respect he had the most unlimited power. I have no doubt that he exercised his power conscientiously; I have never thought otherwise; but what has been the result? Within two years he contracted the legal-tender currency $160,000,000, and the plain United States notes over forty million dollars. He also converted all the floating-currency debt into gold-interest bonds. At the time this law was passed, April 12, 1866, the total amount of five-twenty bonds was $666,000,000, and the great mass of the debt was in what are called currency obligations, the principal of which, undoubtedly, could have been paid in currency. But conscientiously believing, as he did, that the best way to the resumption of specie payments was by a rapid and steady contraction of the currency, he entered upon the policy I have stated.

Now, what has been the result? Why, sir, in April, 1866, the price of gold was 125. It had steadily declined from the close of the war until it had reached its lowest point, I believe, in April, 1866, the very time of the passage of this law. What was the result? I do not attribute it all to that measure; but what was the result? From that time to this gold has advanced, varying between 130 and 140, and has never from that day to this reached the price at which it stood at the passage of the act; and are we any nearer specie payments now than we were then? Not at all. We have converted our debt into a more oppressive form of obligation. The interest of the great mass of it is now payable in gold at the high rate of six per cent., and the bonds are less valuable in gold than then. I still think that if we had looked rather to the funding of the debt with the currency then afloat we could have passed the whole of it into a five per cent. instead of into a six per cent. loan. The state of the money market from that day to this justifies the assertion that the whole of this maturing and redeemable debt might have been converted at par into a five per cent. ten-forty bond. If the bill I refer to had passed two years ago a great part of our debt would have gone into the five per cent. loan provided for by it, and the country would have been saved many millions of gold per annum, and would have escaped the dangerous question now presented to us.

FIVE-TWENTY BONDS—THE RIGHT TO REDEEM THEM.

Let us now consider the legal meaning of the contract between the United States and the holders of the five-twenty bonds.

Mr. President, this form of debt contains one feature that was considered its chief virtue, and that is the right of redemption after five years. We all remember the time when this first five-twenty loan was introduced. Up to that moment the bonds that had been sold were long bonds, payable twenty years after their date, now called the bonds of '81; but in February, 1862, Congress, for the first time, upon the recommendation of the then Secretary of the Treasury, introduced the idea of retaining the right to redeem the bonds after five years. That provision was inserted in the act of February 25, 1862, by which after five years the United States had the right to redeem the principal of the bonds upon paying the amount of them. The right of redemption was considered the most favorable feature of that loan. The Secretary of the Treasury, in his report to Congress, said it was important to always retain the right to redeem the principal debt with a view at any time to take advantage of the money market and reduce the rate of interest; and he proposed, and upon his recommendation Congress concurred in the idea, that in future loans a short time should be fixed after which the debt might be redeemed, while a longer time was fixed within which the debt must be paid. This was a valuable privilege reserved by the United States for a valuable purpose. We were then engaged in war, and by the experience of nations it was known that during war we must submit to hard and exacting terms in order to borrow money; but the right to get better terms was reserved at the end of five years.

HOW FIVE-TWENTIES ARE REDEEMABLE.

Now, the question arises, how may these five-twenty bonds be redeemed? Four different modes have been suggested, in regard to each of which I intend to make a few observations:

First. That these bonds may be paid, the principal in gold, at any time after five years.

Second. That these bonds may be paid by a new issue of legal tenders similar in character to the kind issued when they were sold.

Third. That either by selling a new bond or by levying taxes we may draw into the Treasury existing United States notes, and with those pay off or redeem the five-twenties.

Fourth. The plan suggested by the committee of giving to the holder of the bond at his option the right to take another bond bearing a less rate of interest.

Mr. President, let me briefly present the view taken of these different propositions. Is the United States bound in law or equity to postpone the redemption of the five-twenties until they rise to par in gold? My friend from Vermont discussed this question with great ability, and he affirmed that we were so bound; that we had no right to redeem these bonds until the bonds rose to par in gold. That is his position, and he maintained it with great force.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If my friend alludes to me as the Senator from Vermont, he does not quite apprehend my position. It was not that we were bound to postpone, but that if we exercised the option we must pay in what the bond called for, and that was coin.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes. In other words, that we could not exercise this right until the bonds rose to par in gold. That would be the legal effect.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We have the option to pay them in coin after five years. If we have the coin, we are not bound to wait. Whether we have the ability is quite a different question.

Mr. SHERMAN. That comes back to the point that he would postpone the exercise of this right of redemption until these bonds rose to par in gold.

Mr. CAMERON. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. CAMERON. I did not understand the Senator from Vermont as saying that we were bound to pay in coin at the end of five years.

Mr. SHERMAN. Oh, no, not at all; I understand that; but we could not exercise the right to redeem after five years until we could redeem them at par in gold.

Mr. CAMERON. In other words, if we do not exercise the right to redeem after five years, we cannot until the twenty years have gone by.

Mr. SHERMAN. And then we must pay in gold.

Mr. CAMERON. Of course; and long before that we shall be able to pay in gold.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I intend to put this question with the greatest candor, and if possible to present the argument in as fair a light as I can, because I do not wish to misrepresent any one.

AS TO OLD BONDS ISSUED PRIOR TO 1862.

Now, I confess that this would undoubtedly be the rule as to all the old bonds issued before the act of February 25, 1862; and why? Because those bonds were issued when no one could have contemplated any other mode of payment except in gold; and therefore the Secretary of the Treasury has always decided, and properly decided, that bonds issued before the legal-tender act took effect must be paid in gold to the last dollar; and why? The bonds issued in 1861, the bonds issued many years ago, were all issued when no one contemplated any other mode of payment, when there was no other money in which to pay except gold and silver coin; and as a matter of course these old bonds must be paid in that way. This question was first presented to Secretary Chase and decided by him when a portion of the Texas loan matured in the fall of 1862. A small portion of that debt matured, and he paid it in gold because it had been issued at an old date. His decision, to which I shall have occasion to refer in discussing another point of this subject, was not based at all upon the question of legal tender; it did not raise the question; but it was decided upon the ground that as gold was paid for those bonds gold must be returned to the bondholder.

A Government may, as a matter of paramount authority, compel its citizens as between each other to receive and pay out its notes as money on preëxisting contracts; but it cannot debase its money to make the payment of its own debts easier. We have no right to debase our coin so as to make the payment of our debt easier. We may, if there is no stipulation to the contrary, pay in that kind of coin or money which existed when the debt was created; but after we have created a debt and after we have received gold or good money we cannot then debase that coin and pay it in inferior coin. That principle I admit. Although we may do it as to contracts between individuals, because we have the power over individuals, we have no right to do it as between ourselves and public creditors. A nation in dealing with a public creditor stands on a different footing from what it does in transactions between individuals of that nation. We may prescribe a rule as between our own people; but subsequent to a contract entered into by us as a nation we have no right to vary the contract between ourselves as a nation and our public creditor. The only rule is the contract, the law, and we have no right to change that without being guilty of repudiation. That is the doctrine. I therefore assume that all the old bonds issued before the legal-tender act are payable in coin.

AS TO BONDS ISSUED UNDER LEGAL-TENDER ACT.

But the question is, whether the bonds issued since the legal-tender act took effect may be paid in legal tenders. Upon this question I may as well state now, the Committee on Finance do not pass any opinion, and in the observations I make on this point I speak for myself, not for them. They deem the occasion a proper one to offer an exchange to the public creditor, leaving for the future to settle the result of a refusal. When we look at the law, which is the contract, it so happens that the identical act which provided for the legal tenders also provides for the five-twenties bonds. Every man who bought a bond bought it under an act which also provides for the legal tenders. They were contemporaneous. However, the notes were issued before the bonds were issued. The notes were all outstanding before a single bond was issued.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What was the limit of the legal tenders?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will come to that presently. Now, this legal-tender clause provides that—

"Such notes herein authorized shall be receivable in payment of all taxes, internal duties, excises, debts, and demands of every kind due to the United States, except duties on imports, and of all claims and demands against the United States of every kind whatsoever, except for interest upon bonds and notes, which shall be paid in coin, and shall also be lawful money and a legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private, within the United States, except duties on imports and interest as aforesaid."

Does not this act, in so many words, declare that while coin shall be paid for the interest of the public debt, yet the notes provided by this act shall be a lawful tender in payment of all public debts?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will my friend permit me to inquire whether he ought not to read what he has read in connection with the succeeding clause, which authorizes the conversion of the legal tenders into bonds? Take the whole statute together.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will come to that. I cannot read it all in a minute. But here is the legal-tender clause which I have read. Now, I will come to the point. If this case stood upon this legal-tender clause alone, if there was no other provision of law, would the Senator from Vermont have any doubt of the legal construction of that clause?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Probably not; but there is another provision, and I think my friend will agree that we are bound to look at the whole of the statute in order to get at the meaning of any of its parts, to construe it altogether.

Mr. SHERMAN. My friend has already stated all I expected him to state. He admits the meaning of the legal-tender clause, but answers me now, by reference to another clause in the act, that it could not have been contemplated that under this act the principal of the debt should be paid in legal tenders. Why? Because the clause he refers to limits the amount of legal tenders to $150,000,000, and with this limit it could not be presumed they would fall much below par in gold.

Mr. CAMERON. If the Senator will allow me—

Mr. SHERMAN. Let me answer my friend from Vermont first.

Mr. CAMERON. I wish the Senator to answer what I shall say at the same time if he will allow me. It seems to me the remarks the Senator is making would come better after he had read that clause which relates to the issuing of the five-twenties bonds. If he will defer his remarks until then he will be able to give us some information; but I think he is now explaining his opinions upon a part of the text which will have no influence upon the decision of the country when it comes to pay the debt. In other words, I think that that part of the law creating the debt, authorizing the issue of five-twenties bonds, settles the whole question. I will not interrupt the Senator further.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I intend to meet all these points as near as I can, and to read the sections of the law; but I trust Senators will allow me to do it in my own way.

My friend from Vermont admits that if the matter stood on the legal-tender clause there would be no doubt, there could be no resisting the conclusion, that the legal contract between the Government and bondholder was that the interest should be paid in coin and the principal should be paid in the kind of legal tenders specified by this act. That is the point he wishes to make, and I agree that if these bonds were issued under this act and under the restrictions contained in it, namely, that the legal tenders were confined to $150,000,000, with the right to convert them into bonds, then his argument would be irresistible; but the misfortune of his argument is, that these restrictions were repealed before the bonds were issued, but I anticipate the argument and wish again to refer to the act of February 25, 1862. This act further provides that the amount of legal tenders shall be limited to $150,000,000. It also provides that the holder of these legal tenders may at any time convert them into five-twenties bonds, the very bonds we are now discussing; and the second section goes on and provides for the issue of those bonds. If those bonds had been issued and negotiated solely under the act of February 25, 1862, it would have been irresistible logic that it was not contemplated that the $500,000,000 authorized by this act should be paid with $150,000,000 legal tenders, themselves convertible into bonds. But here is the weakness of the argument, in my opinion, of my friend from Vermont: no bonds were issued under that act.

Mr. EDMUNDS rose.

Mr. SHERMAN. I trust my friend will not interrupt me, because I have not the time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly not, if my friend does not wish it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Every one of these restrictions was removed and repealed before these bonds were negotiated. In July following, before a single bond was sold, the limitation as to the amount was increased to $300,000,000. In December following the Secretary had failed to negotiate the five-twenties loan; and in his report, to which I will now refer, he says to Congress that it is impossible for him, under the restrictions contained in these acts, to sell these bonds; that after all his efforts he has sold only a few millions; that the loan has been a failure, and asks us for additional legislation. I now ask attention to the report. In a previous part of it he states the failure to negotiate the five-twenties loan, and that he had received but a small amount, comparatively, from it. He then says:

"The act of last session"—

The one to which I have already referred—"authorized the Secretary to issue bonds of the United States, already often mentioned as five-twenties, to the amount of $500,000,000, and to dispose of them for coin or United States notes at the market value thereof. In the same act authority was given to issue $150,000,000 in United States notes, which authority was afterward enlarged to $250,000,000; and it was provided that any holder of such notes to the amount of fifty dollars, or any multiple of fifty, might exchange them for five-twenty bonds at par.

"The effect of these provisions was to make negotiations of considerable amounts impossible; for considerable amounts are seldom taken, except with a view to resales at a profit, and resales at any profit are impossible under the law."

Then he goes on to say:

"The Secretary respectfully recommends the repeal of both these provisions. The first imposes, it is believed, a restriction which Congress did not intend; and the second has been followed by the inconveniences which were feared, rather than by the benefits which were expected."

Then he goes on to say:

"Should Congress, however, be of opinion that these clauses should be retained, it will be necessary to provide for other laws, at rates more favorable to the takers than convertibility into five-twenties. This can be done either by authorizing bonds at longer time or by increasing the rates of interest offered."

"The Secretary cannot recommend either course except as an alternative to no provision at all."

My friend from Maine [Mr. FESSENDEN] will remember that when we were called upon to consider this question we had to choose between three alternatives: the repeal of these restrictions which prevented the sale of five-twenty bonds, or selling the bonds at a higher rate of interest, or selling them below par. We all remember that. The Senator from Maine, in reporting the bill, stated these alternatives. Finally, after long consideration—for the subject was debated over and over again—the Committee on Finance agreed upon the act to which I will now refer, the act of March 3, 1863. That act repealed the limit as to the amount of circulation and raised it to $450,000,000; and it also took away the right to convert, which the Secretary said was the other restriction that prevented the sale of the bonds; and by an ingenious device, suggested by the then Senator from Vermont, [Mr. Colamer,] it was proposed to limit to the holders of the outstanding greenbacks the right to convert them up to the 1st of July then next; but if they did not do it by that time the right was to cease. By this legislation in the act of March 3, 1863, the limitations which prevented the sale of the first five-twenty bonds were repealed, and then, for the first time, this loan was taken. Then it was that an agency was organized and means were taken to spread these bonds all over the country, and they were sold; but they were not sold until these restrictions were removed, and they were sold upon a basis of $450,000,000, without the right of redemption, with no privilege whatever except that of being receivable in payment of taxes. That was the state of the law upon which the legal right of the holders of the five twenties rests. They refused to buy these bonds upon the terms of the act of February 25, 1862. They did buy them under the act of March 3, 1863; and it is idle to rest their claims upon restrictions repealed before their bonds were issued.

I wish to read a little further, to show that the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Chase, a year afterward, in December, 1863, in his report, again stated that Congress, having relieved him from the restrictions of the act of 1862, enabled him to sell the five-twenty bonds. He says:

"On that day, March 3, 1863, the act to provide ways and means for the support of the Government received the approval of the President and became law. In addition to various provisions for loans, it contained clauses repealing the restrictions affecting the negotiation of the five-twenties, and thus disengaged that important loan from the embarrassments which had previously rendered it almost unavailable."

Then he goes on and says that every dollar of it was sold in a short time, presenting a remarkable case of success; but it was not sold, as my friend from Vermont says, under the act of February 25, 1862. On the contrary, there was an utter failure to sell the loan under that act. It was sold under the subsequent law which repealed the restrictions of the act of 1862, and it was sold upon a basis of currency amounting to $450,000,000, and when the notes had been so depreciated by our legislation, purposely, for wise purposes, when the right to fund was taken away, and no right was given to these notes except to be paid to the Government in the way of taxes.

AS TO REPRESENTATIONS BY AGENTS.

Now, Mr. President, there is another point in the argument of my friend from Vermont that is much more difficult to answer. It is true—and he has collated the proof in his speech very well—that the various agents of the Government stated that these bonds would be paid in coin, and that creates the embarrassment in regard to this matter that has always affected my mind more than any legal difficulty in the way; because I think the nation is not only bound to observe the law, but it is bound to pay a reasonable degree of respect to the representations made at the time these bonds were sold. It is true, as matter of law, that no agent could vary the contract; that every man who bought these bonds bought them upon the face of the law, and not upon the mere advertisements of agents; still every wise legislator would consider the extent of those representations and how far they affected the public mind.

It has been sometimes said, and my friend from Vermont said that this was done, and Congress silently acquiesced. Congress never acquiesced in it. Congress was not in session when any portion of this loan was sold. We adjourned on the 4th of March, 1863, and did not convene here until the December following, and within that time all these bonds were sold. The silence of the subsequent Congress could not change the contract which was made in March, 1863, and has no effect upon the case.

The first reference made by the Senator from Vermont is to the decision of Secretary Chase on the payment of the Texas bonds in December, 1862. The Senator in his speech states this decision too strongly. He says that the Secretary of the Treasury then decided that the legal-tender clause did not apply to Government securities. Now, I will read the decision of the Secretary. I read from his letter of January 5, 1863, in reply to a resolution of the House of Representatives. He states that he concluded to pay this loan in coin for these reasons:

"My judgment was determined in favor of payment in coin, not merely by the weighty considerations growing out of its beneficial influences on public credit, but by the circumstance that I found myself able to obtain the needed specie at a cost so small that payment in coin was, in fact, a less inconvenience to the Treasury and a less interference with payments to and for the Army and Navy than payment in notes would have been. The whole amount of coin required was advanced by moneyed institutions, most of which, it is believed, had no interest in the loan, nor any interest in the transaction, except what arises from the general support of the public credit; and the advance was made without premium and at an interest of four per cent., and is not to be called for until it can be reimbursed from receipts from customs, dedicated by act of Congress to the payment of interest and to the redemption of the principal of the public debt."

In this decision there is no reference whatever to the right to redeem the new debt in currency. It was an old debt, and he merely paid it in gold because he thought that would have a beneficial effect on the public credit and because he could negotiate for a loan of gold at a cheaper rate and on more favorable terms than for a loan of paper. Even if the question had been so decided in that case it would apply to no loan except one which was issued before legal tenders were thought of. The only decision furnished by the Senator in his ample collections of the representations made by the officers of the Government (which after all, it seems to me, are rather bare) was a letter which he introduced signed by George Harrington, Assistant Secretary, dated May 26, 1863, pending this loan, and a letter of Mr. Field, also Assistant Secretary. Mr. Harrington said in his letter:

"The five-twenty sixes, payable twenty years from date, though redeemable after five years, are considered as belonging to the funded or permanent debt; and so, also, are the twenty-years' sixes, into which the three-years' seven-thirty notes are convertible. These bonds, therefore, according to the usage of the Government, are payable in coin."

The Senator also introduced a letter of Mr. Field when he was Assistant Secretary, the only other letter introduced from the Treasury Department before these bonds were all negotiated; and that simply stated as a fact that they would be paid in gold. There was no reference to the law, no decision upon the terms of the law, but a mere reference to the custom of the Department as to old bonds issued before the legal-tender act, and no doubt it was made upon the common expectation that long before the five years should run out specie payments would be resumed in this country; and no doubt they would have been if our arms had been victorious during that summer; but certainly none of these letters can be regarded as a formal construction of the legal-tender act, which is not even referred to.

Mr. President, I will not follow this matter further, because it is not necessary for my argument that I should do so; but I submit to Senators whether the presentation of the law and the facts in regard to the five-twenty loan does not at least raise a reasonable doubt upon which honest men may disagree. All that is necessary for my argument is to show that a doubt does rest upon the mode and manner of paying these bonds. I am not here to advocate either view of the question, although I am willing to express my own opinions. I merely show you that there is such a doubt that reasonable and honorable men may differ as to whether or not the Government of the United States may pay these bonds in some other way than in coin. If so, that doubt ought to be removed, or some other bond substituted, and not leave this question unsettled to poison the public credit.

REDEMPTION IN NEW LEGAL-TENDER NOTES.

There is a second mode proposed by partisans in which to pay off the five-twenty bonds, and that is by issuing a new batch of greenbacks. This is a plausible and a dangerous device. No man can justify it. Why? Because the very acts under which these bonds were issued contain limitations which we cannot and dare not exceed. These limitations were put in every loan act and finally embodied in the form of a guarantee in the act of June 30, 1864, to which I will now refer. The limitation contained in the last preceding act, that of March 3, 1863, in force when the five-twenties were negotiated, was $450,000,000. The act of June 30, 1864, modified and repeated this limitation, as follows:

"Nor shall the total amount of United States notes issued or to be issued, ever exceed $400,000,000; and such additional sum, not exceeding $50,000,000, as may be temporarily required for the redemption of temporary loan."

This limitation upon the amount of greenbacks was always a part of the loan laws, and why? Because the amount of those notes issued would regulate and fix the value of the bonds themselves. In all the loan acts, therefore, the amount of greenbacks issued from time to time was limited by law, and that limitation was a part of the contract under which the bonds were issued, and hence any proposition which looks to an increase of the legal tenders with a view by this increase to pay off the five-twenties would be a plain, palpable violation of a public engagement, just as much as would be a clipping of the coin, or, to follow the example of the Middle Ages, a debasement of the coin with more alloy. Every additional greenback issued tends to depreciate the value of the security, and therefore, as the law itself limits the amount, it must be complied with, whatever is the consequence.

SENATE

The Funding Bill—Mr. Sherman.

I take it, then, that no proposition will ever receive the sanction of Congress in the face of this law, providing that the five-twenties shall be redeemed with any other notes than those in existence at the time they were sold; that any proposition of that kind would be dishonorable to the country and dishonorable to any one who should seriously propose and advocate it. It would be to create a depreciated currency in order to evade the payment of an honest debt.

But, sir, aside from that, as an act of public policy, it would be fatal and injurious. It would reopen the flood-gates of paper money. It would impair all values; it would unbinge all standards; it would affect all prices. None would suffer from such a debasement of the currency so much as the laboring man. Labor is the last thing, except real estate, to feel the effect of a change in the currency; because labor is more abundant than any other commodity. Labor feels last the advance caused by the inflation of paper money. I trust this proposition when discussed by the people will be generally repudiated, and I believe it will be. I regard this limit upon the amount of greenback currency as the sheet anchor of public safety; that in no event whatever is it to be violated.

BANK NOTES AND LEGAL TENDERS.

It is sometimes said, why will not the proposed increase of banking circulation have the same effect as the increase of greenbacks. This question is put in regard to the bill reported by my friend from Missouri [Mr. HENDERSON] to repeal the limitation upon the amount of banking circulation. I answer that the effect is very different. The amount of bank notes may be left free without any legal limit if only the right to present the note for redemption is always enforced.

Mr. MORTON. Redemption in what?

Mr. SHERMAN. Redemption at present in legal tenders, but we all look to an early resumption of specie payments. There is no check on banking, there is no use in banks, unless you have specie payments. Bank notes, unless they are based on the payment of specie or something that is equivalent or will soon be equivalent to specie, are injurious, and therefore I am not in favor of any increase of the bank note circulation unless it is in view of the speedy resumption of specie payments. But, sir, if bank notes are based on coin, or if they are redeemable in coin, their amount may be left to the demands of trade, to the wants of the community. The power to present them for payment at any time is a sufficient check on the amount. That is shown by the experience of many countries. In England the limit is very rarely reached. In New York they had a very good State system, which, if it had been extended all over the United States, under the control of the General Government, would have been a wise one. That was a system of free banking under which any man might bank who would keep up the specie standard, and give the requisite security to the public and redeem his notes in specie.

REDEMPTION OF BONDS IN EXISTING CURRENCY.

I come now to the third mode that has been suggested, and that I have necessarily discussed as I have proceeded. I here again desire to repeat that, in what I have to say in regard to the manner of paying or redeeming the bonds, I do not speak for the Committee on Finance, because, in the view which they took of it in the bill which they reported, they did not decide that question. I merely present the argument. I say that equity and justice are amply satisfied if we redeem these bonds at the end of the five years in the same kind of money, of the same intrinsic value it bore at the time they were issued. Gentlemen may reason about this matter over and over again, and they cannot come to any other conclusion; at least, that has been my conclusion after the most careful consideration. Senators are sometimes in the habit, in order to defeat the argument of an antagonist, of saying that this is repudiation. Why, sir, every citizen of the United States has conformed his business to the legal-tender clause. He has collected and paid his debts accordingly. Every State in this Union, without exception, has made its contracts since the legal-tender clause in currency and paid them in currency. Indeed, every State in this Union except Massachusetts has gone further, and, as I think, improperly, in paying either principal or interest of preëxisting debts contracted on the basis of gold.

Mr. COLE. The Senator must except California from that statement.

Mr. STEWART. And Nevada also.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. And Maine also.

Mr. SHERMAN. Maine paid her interest in paper, even on old debts, and certainly on new.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I think not.

Mr. DIXON. The Senator should except Connecticut.

Mr. SHERMAN. Connecticut pays her interest in paper.

Mr. DIXON. Only on debts contracted since the passage of the legal-tender act.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is what I said, and that is all I propose the United States shall do. In the Pacific States, where they have always had a gold circulation, their contracts are based on coin, and they have always paid gold. Massachusetts is the only other State that has done what the United States has done, and always will do, pay preëxisting debts in gold.

Mr. DIXON. Allow me to say to the Senator that Connecticut had no debt before the war. Her debt has been contracted in view of the legal-tender act, and for that reason she has paid the interest in paper.

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly, and that is precisely what I say the United States may lawfully do. Every citizen of Connecticut, rich and poor, has availed himself of that privilege, and has paid his debts in paper; and every community, every city, every town, every municipal organization in Connecticut has availed itself of the privilege of paying its debts in paper, and in ninety-nine cases out of one hundred have paid debts contracted before the legal-tender act in paper.

Mr. DIXON. But the Senator began by saying that there was a wide distinction between the right of a citizen to pay a debt under the legal-tender act and the right of a State or a Government to do it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do say that as to preëxisting debts, but as to debts contracted since the legal-tender law took effect, they were contracted in currency, and upon the express stipulation in the law that their principal should be paid in legal tenders and the interest in coin. If that stipulation was not in the law the right to redeem would only rest upon the general principle that a debt may be paid in the kind of money in which it was contracted.

But public as well as private debts contracted since the legal-tender act do not rest upon inference but upon the express stipulation in the law; and it is equitable and right that the United States should avail itself of this part of the contract.

IS THE OFFER TO EXCHANGE A THREAT.

Sometimes this bill has been regarded as a threat. We do not so intend it. We say to the holder of our demand notes, we say to the holder of our bonds, we say to the holder of a compound-interest note, we say to the holder of any public security, except the existing ten-forties, "We will give each of you, at your option, this form of security in exchange for that which you now have; if you accept this offer by the 1st of November next we will give you certain exemptions; if not, you stand upon your existing right, and all questions affecting it shall be postponed until the next session of Congress."

It is said that this is a threat. I do not so regard it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Will my friend allow me to ask him a question, with his permission?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I ask whether the committee have provided any alternative in case the bondholders do not accept?

Mr. SHERMAN. None. Their bonds still stand, and no one proposes the alternative adopted by the English Government, which I intend to refer to in a moment, of stopping the interest, or the alternative adopted by our own Government under Hamilton's plan of reducing the interest. We leave the bondholders to stand precisely as they are, and they will be paid their six per cent. interest in gold until their bonds are redeemed, and they cannot be redeemed under existing laws without further legislation, and that legislation will have to be provided by the present Congress at its next session or by some future Congress. All that the Committee on Finance do in this bill—and, perhaps, in discussing the other points I have gone beyond the necessity of the case—is to offer to all the public creditors these new bonds in exchange for the old, to be done without expense to the Government, to be done without sacrifice by any one, leaving every man to judge for himself whether his interest and substantial equity would not be promoted by this exchange. If he does not do it he stands by his bond, and then the next Congress or the present Congress at its next session will decide the question whether the redemption of these bonds shall be postponed to some indefinite future when we may be able to pay gold for what we received in depreciated paper. We do not decide it and do not undertake to decide it, but we simply submit that option.

Even if Senators do not agree in the view that I take of this matter, it is necessary to provide this new loan for this reason: we must provide for the funding of some one hundred and odd millions of loan that is maturing; we must provide for the redemption of the compound-interest notes; we must provide for the conversion of the greenbacks, which we do in another section; we must provide some bond into which even the floating debt may go; and it is necessary in making that bond to select, if possible, a bond into which the whole mass of the public debt may from time to time be converted according to our future laws.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Are not those obligations convertible into five-twenties as the law now stands?

Mr. SHERMAN. Undoubtedly; but would any Secretary now convert any more of our currency debt into five-twenty bonds bearing six per cent. interest in gold? As I shall show hereafter, there is no such burdensome loan negotiated by any civilized nation in the world as our five-twenty loan, if it is to be paid in gold. Therefore, I would say, in reply to my friend's question, as I said two years ago, that I never would issue another five-twenty bond, because it is the most expensive form of loan. Just consider it: seventy-six dollars of gold will buy a five-twenty bond bearing six per cent. interest in gold, and that bond cannot be redeemed, according to one construction, until the United States are ready not only to pay six per cent. on $100 for the use of seventy-six dollars, but also to pay $100 in gold for what now costs seventy-six dollars. That is the proposition, and I say I never would issue another five-twenty bond. I think our great mistake has been that we have funded a great mass of our floating debt already into five-twenties and given to the public creditors the right to demand this large rate of interest for so long a time.

FUNDING OF ENGLISH DEBT.

Now, I wish to show, as we are governed in a great measure by example, that the proposition made by the Committee on Finance is in exact accordance with the course that has been pursued in England six or seven times, and once in our own country. In England, prior to 1715, the rate of interest was six per cent., which was reduced by an act of Parliament to five per cent., and without negotiation. In 1725, after the explosion of the South Sea bubble, the rate of interest on the mass of the public debt was reduced from five per cent. to four per cent. This was done mainly by negotiation through the great corporations of London, the Bank of England, the South Sea Company, and one of the India companies. They reduced the interest by issuing four per cent. annuities in payment of five per cents., paying off what were called the dissentients.

In the middle of the eighteenth century the rate of interest all over Europe became lower than ever was known before. It fell to three per cent. In 1737 it was proposed in England to reduce the interest on the public debt from four to three per cent. I read now from a well recognized authority on finance:

"In 1737 the three per cents. being at 103½ to 107 the House of Commons came to a resolution that all the public fund, redeemable by law, which carry an interest of four per cent. per annum be redeemed according to the respective provisos or clauses of redemption contained in the acts of Parliament for that purpose, or be converted into an interest or annuity not exceeding three per cent. per annum."

This passed the House of Commons two readings and was lost on the third. In 1742 a similar attempt was made to reduce the rate of interest, and in 1749, under the administration of Mr. Pelham, it was carried into execution, and we have in Hansard's Debates, and also in the biography of Mr. Pelham, an exact account of this transaction. Mr. Pelham was warned before he made this proposition of the effect upon himself, but he persisted in it and finally carried it through, after quite an extended argument. His proposition, in short, was that any holder of any security bearing four per cent. interest might, within a given time, present it; not for redemption, but to receive in exchange a security bearing three and a half per cent. interest for four or five years, and after that bearing three per cent. interest. Nothing was said about redemption; but it was understood, no doubt, that in case holders did not accept it their securities would be redeemed. The result was an angry debate, in which it was alleged that this was a violation of the public faith. I read a note in Hansard's Debates, taken from Tindal, and also one from Smollet. Tindal says:

"This was generally looked upon to be a very bold measure in the minister, and some of his best friends, even the day before the vote passed in the House of Commons, endeavored to persuade him against it. But he appeared determined, and in a few weeks they approved of his steadiness as much as before they blamed his obstinacy."

Smollet says:

"The capital measure which distinguished this session of Parliament was the reduction of the interest on the public funds; a scheme which was planned and executed by the minister, without any national disturbance or disquiet, to the astonishment of all Europe; the different nations of which could not apprehend how it would be possible for the Government, at the close of a long, expensive war, which had so considerably drained the country, and augmented the enormous burden of national debt, to find money for paying off such of the public creditors as might choose to receive their principal, rather than submit to a reduction of the interest."

The proposition is given in full in the biography of Mr. Pelham. He was then Chancellor of the Exchequer, and I find there his speech reported at length, in which he goes over the ground which had been made by the speeches in opposition, which were very much such as have been made on this question. It was argued that, while there was a right to redeem the public debt, the plan proposed would be substantially a violation of the public faith. I read from Mr. Pelham's biography what is there said on the subject:

"Duly impressed with the importance of his financial plan, Mr. Pelham suffered no avoidable delay to intervene before he submitted it to the House. By this promptitude he manifested the decision of a great minister, for the proposal was at first so unpopular or so little understood that even on the very day before the resolutions were brought forward some of his friends endeavored to dissuade him from his purpose; but their remonstrances were ineffectual. He persevered in his determination, and the event fully justified his expectations. On the 28th of November a motion was made for a committee of the whole House, to take that part of his majesty's speech into consideration which related to the national debt. The expediency of reducing the interest had been so clearly demonstrated by Mr. Pelham, that his plan was unanimously approved."

The great corporations which had aided in the former reduction in the interest of the public debt combined against it, and for two years defeated it. The House of Commons was firm and threatened to repeal some of their privileges, and finally compelled them to acquiesce.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I desire to ask my friend what the character of the security was that it was proposed to reduce the rate of interest upon. Was there any time within which the Government might redeem it?

Mr. SHERMAN. These were annuities. There was no stipulation as to redemption.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Precisely. They differ from our securities. It was not a question there as to the right to redeem. There is no doubt about our right to redeem.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is no doubt about our right to redeem; but the question is as to the mode of redemption.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There was no such question in that case, and hence, I suppose, the ground of opposition.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is a still more interesting case, and one more applicable to our present condition, which occurred in England in 1822. During the wars which probably tested the power of England more than any event in her history—her wars with Napoleon—she was compelled to resort to great sacrifices. She issued all manner of securities; she sold her bonds at one time at fifty or sixty cents on the dollar; she issued five per cents., four per cents., and three per cents., and all other forms of security. After the war was over, before the resumption of specie payments, Mr. Vansittart, then Chancellor of the Exchequer, proposed to fund the public debt by a proposition very similar in language to the one submitted now by the Committee on Finance. The great mass of their floating debt consisted of five per cent. exchequer bills—navy bills, as they were commonly called—which were very much such bills as our five-twenty bonds. They bore five per cent. interest. Mr. Vansittart introduced his bill on the 25th of February, 1822; and we have the whole debate in Hansard. His proposition is in substance like our own. It simply declared that the holders of those five per cent. bills might present them at such a time for exchange for a four per cent. annuity. If they did not present their securities their assent was implied. There was some opposition to the measure. It was alleged to be a violation of the public faith; it was before specie payments were resumed in England, when all payments were made in Bank of England notes. It was finally carried, after debate, and acquiesced in. His funding bill had this feature: it only proposed a reduction of interest of one half per cent. for the first five years, and then a reduction of one per cent. He proposed a reduction to four and a half per cent. until 1828, and then a reduction to four per cent. In this way the navy fives, as they were called, the great mass of the English floating indebtedness, were funded. One gentleman, opposing it, said he would like to ask the honorable gentleman how, with an impoverished treasury, &c., he was going to pay off £142,500,000. It is the same objection we hear here. The answer was that it took a very small amount of currency to pay a very large amount of debt, and if the present holders would not make the exchange others would be found to furnish the money to pay them off. The plan was carried into execution and was acquiesced in; and this very debt which was reduced in 1822 and 1823 was afterward twice reduced, and is now part of the three per cent. debt of England.

There is also one case in our own history, and that is the funding system adopted by Alexander Hamilton. The Constitution of the United States declared that the public debt of the United States should be inviolate, and the new Government assumed the debt of the old confederacy; but, as a matter of course, it was in a condition of great uncertainty; the interest had been unpaid for a long time, and there were disputes as to the amount. Alexander Hamilton, as first Secretary of the Treasury, proposed a plan of funding and grouping together all this mass of indebtedness. His report on the public credit was regarded by his friends, and has been regarded by the whole world, as a remarkable production; and yet, what was Alexander Hamilton's funding plan? He proposed first, to ascertain the amount of the national debt, which was finally computed to be and was settled at $54,000,000, foreign and domestic. Did he propose to pay that off in precise conformity with the terms on which the debt was contracted? Not at all; he took that and he also ascertained the amount of the State debts? Nearly all the States were overwhelmed with debts that grew out of the revolutionary war, and they were ascertained and apportioned; the general aggregate of all was $74,000,000. How was this funded? By offering the fundholders six per cent. bonds for two thirds of their debt, and the other third was paid by three per cent. bonds, some of it by four per cent. bonds, some of it by public lands, and some of it by annuities. The plan of Alexander Hamilton embraced various forms of loan, all of which was submitted to the voluntary will of the fundholders. Some of them refused to agree. What did he do then? He only paid them in accordance with the stipulations made as to the rest of the loans. I will read a short paragraph or two from this document of Mr. Hamilton to show how he regarded the public debt:

"The interesting problem now occurs: is it in the power of the United States, consistently with those prudential considerations which ought not to be overlooked, to make a provision equal to the purpose of funding the whole debt, at the rates of interest which it now bears, in addition to the sum which will be necessary for the current service of the Government?"

"The Secretary will not say that such a provision would exceed the abilities of the country; but he is clearly of opinion that to make it would require the extension of taxation to a degree and to objects which the true interests of the public creditors forbid. It is therefore to be hoped, and even to be expected, that they will cheerfully concur in such modifications of their claims, on fair and equitable principles, as will facilitate to the Government an arrangement substantial, durable, and satisfactory to the community. The importance of the last characteristic will strike every discerning mind. No plan, however flattering in appearance, to which it did not belong, could be truly entitled to confidence."

Then his first proposition was "that for every hundred dollars subscribed payable in the debt, (as well interest as principal,) the subscriber be entitled at his option either to have two thirds funded at an annuity or yearly interest of six per cent.," the residue to be paid in three per cent. annuities, the interest on which did not commence till 1802. As an alternative for a part of the debt he proposed a system of annuities in which a small portion of the debt was finally paid.

Mr. FESSENDEN. What provision did he make for those who did not agree to the offer?

Mr. SHERMAN. He merely provided for four per cent. interest to be paid to them, two per cent. less than they were entitled to under the law creating the debt. After speaking of those who might refuse the offer he proceeds to say:

"Hence, whatever surplus of revenue might remain, after satisfying the interest of the new loans, and the demand for the current service, ought to be divided among those creditors (if any) who may not think fit to subscribe to them. But, for this purpose, under the circumstance of depending propositions, a temporary appropriation will be most advisable, and the sum must be limited to four per cent., as revenues will only be calculated to produce in that proportion to the entire debt.

"The Secretary confides for the success of the propositions to be made on the goodness of the reason upon which they rest; on the fairness of the equivalent to be offered in each case; on the discernment of the creditors of their true interest; and on their disposition to facilitate the arrangement of the Government, and to render them satisfactory to the community."

Mr. FESSENDEN. Four per cent. on the principal.

Mr. SHERMAN. But their debts bore six per cent. really. Subsequently the dissentients came in, but it was after three years, when, by a subsequent law proposed by Mr. Hamilton, they were allowed the same privileges as if they had assented in the first year. That was the plan of Alexander Hamilton, which finally led to the consolidation of the national debt. I say the plan now proposed by the Committee on Finance is in accordance with precedent, holds out no threats, deals with all alike, holders of five-twenty bonds, greenbacks, and all. It gives them a proposition to fund their debt at their own option by the 1st of November next, or if they will not choose to do it, then, as a matter of course, the question is to be decided at the next session of Congress, what provision ought to be made, whether or not Congress will redeem the five-twenty bonds in the currency in which they were contracted or postpone its redemption, paying the interest at six per cent. in gold, until we can redeem the principal in gold. Whatever view Senators may take of this, they cannot avoid making some provision by some loan less onerous than five-twenties for funding the greenbacks and for funding the floating debt of the United States; and into that loan, whatever it may be, the whole debt may eventually float.

TERMS OF THE NEW LOAN.

Now, Mr. President, the question is whether the terms of the proposed loan are reasonable and fair, such as we ought to propose to our own citizens, and such as our constituents may reasonably hope to fulfill, such as are equitable and fair as between creditor and tax-payer. The first question that arises is the exemption from State taxation.

No Government that I have been able to find ever allowed its bonds or securities to be taxed. The United States never did. In the absence of stipulations to the contrary the courts have always held that no State or subordinate authority could tax the national securities. It has been so held by every judge who ever sat upon the supreme bench, because it has happened that cases of the kind were brought before the courts from time to time from the earliest foundation of the Government until the last case in 2 Black, in 1862, and it has been uniformly held that there is no power in the States to tax Government bonds. It may, it is true, be made a part of the loan that the States shall have a power to tax them, but who would buy such bonds? I never would vote for such a provision. I never would allow a subordinate authority to thus control the public credit of the United States or have a voice in the matter. The effect in time of war would be disastrous. Such a power would prevent the citizens of a State where the power was exercised from loaning money upon Government securities. I take it, therefore, as an axiom, that in no event shall we allow subordinate authorities to tax the national securities. I need not refer to the authorities on this subject. I have done that before, and I suppose that Senators are familiar with them. There are at least five or six different decisions of the Supreme Court to this effect.

The next provision is the exemption from any discriminating property tax. Men who do not understand the question have proposed to tax Government securities specially, like a special tax on manufactures; and the proposition has been, perhaps, broached in Congress to tax Government securities one or two per cent.

in lieu of all other taxes. Such a provision would be a clear and palpable violation of the Constitution and of the law. It would be worse than repudiation; it would be the meanest kind of repudiation. Why? Because it would be a special discriminating tax on property. A tax on manufactures is a tax on consumption. The manufacturer may add that tax to the cost of the article, and the consumer who finally uses the article pays the tax. That is the principle upon which it rests. A special tax on property is a diminution of the property. It cannot be collected from any one else or shared with any one. It is a direct tax—as much so as if levied on farms—and being a direct tax is unconstitutional, unless apportioned among the States according to population.

One of the earliest cases which came before the Supreme Court was the well-known case involving a tax on carriages. There the court held that it was the use of the carriage which was taxed, and that was a proper tax, because it was a tax on the use of a luxury. It was the enjoyment or use of the carriage that was taxed, not the property in the carriage. No special tax can be levied on property. If this principle once prevailed, that we might select any kind of property and levy a discriminating tax on that property, the time might come when shipping might be selected as the subject of a special tax; when property in lands, plainly against the intention of the Constitution, might be selected for the levying of a discriminating tax. We propose, therefore, to avoid all controversy, to put a stipulation in the new loan law exempting these bonds from all discriminating taxation by Congress, but leaving them subject to the same income tax that other income is subject to.

This question was once presented in the English Parliament; and it is a little remarkable that as early as 1724 a proposition was made to levy a tax of one per cent. on Government securities. That was before the second reduction of interest I have referred to. A remarkable pamphlet then appeared on the subject, the writer of which, to this hour, is unknown; or, at least, it is disputed who wrote it. This secrecy is as remarkable as the authorship of the Junius papers. It was a pamphlet on the inviolability of the public securities, which attracted so much attention as utterly to defeat the proposition. It is preserved now, and is regarded as one of the most remarkable and beautiful productions in the English language. It answers now, as well as then, the argument for taxing public securities. From that time to this in England it has never been proposed. It has not heretofore been proposed in this country, and it ought not to be thought of.

AS TO THE RATE OF INTEREST

There is some difference of opinion; and you will hear more of it from my friend from Missouri [Mr. HENDERSON] as to the rate of interest of the new bonds. The Committee on Finance took great care in deciding this question. We believed that five per cent. was as low a rate as we could now hope to negotiate a loan. It is the lowest rate of interest ever provided for in any loan act of the United States, except in the funding scheme of Alexander Hamilton, already referred to, where a certain portion of the debt was funded at three per cent. I have looked with care into recent foreign loans, and I find that no Government in Europe has recently sold its bonds at a less rate of interest than five per cent. When the nominal rate was lower they were sold at a discount. The English loans, during the Napoleonic war, yielded the lender a rate of interest averaging over five per cent. I have on that subject a number of authorities, and I will refer to one or two of them.

In the compendium of finance which I have before me there is a statement of the amount of the various loans negotiated by the English Government during the second French revolutionary war. The whole amount of loans negotiated was £420,905,400 sterling, or over two thousand million dollars. The amount actually received from those loans by the Government was £266,800,000 sterling, or at the rate of about sixty per cent. The securities were mainly three per cents, though large sums bore four and five per cent., so that the rate of interest actually paid was over five per cent. In 1815, after Bonaparte had left the island of Elba, when it became necessary for the English Government to negotiate a large loan, they sold £66,000,000 of three and four per cent. consols for £36,000,000 sterling, or about fifty-six cents on the dollar. I have a statement of the whole national debt of Great Britain, and it is apparent from it that the English Government has paid at the rate of about five per cent. interest. As a matter of course, this has been done by selling their three and four per cent. securities below par.

So it is in France. We have all heard about the popular loan in France during the Crimean war, and it was regarded as a remarkable success in its time. It was undoubtedly very popular in France. The first loan, on the 14th of March, 1854, was for 250,000,000 francs. It was sold at the rate of 100 francs of three per cents. for sixty-five francs and twenty-five centimes, and at the rate of 100 francs at four and a half per cent. for ninety-two francs and fifty centimes, making really a little over five per cent. So the second loan of 500,000,000 francs was issued at the rate of 100 francs of the three per cents. for sixty-five francs, 100 francs of the four and a half per cents. for ninety-two francs. So the subsequent loan of 750,000,000 francs in 1855 was issued at about the same rate, being a little over five per cent.

I have also a statement of the debts of various foreign countries showing that the rates of the most powerful nations of Europe are nearly always five per cent. or, if less, have been sold under par. When we reflect that in this country the rate of interest is necessarily higher than in most of the countries of Europe, this being a new country, with a vast development, and active population increasing rapidly all over our diversified area, it is perfectly idle to suppose that the United States can get money at a less rate than five per cent. The ordinary legal rate of interest in most of the States is seven per cent., and the actual rate among merchants often amounts to ten per cent. We have by the discrimination made in favor of these bonds reduced the rate to five per cent., and it seems to me that is as low as it is possible to negotiate this loan. As a matter of course, if I believed it was in the power of the Government without adopting measures injurious to the public interest to negotiate a bond at a less rate of interest, I would gladly do it; but after full examination of this question the Committee on Finance came to the conclusion that five per cent. was as low a rate of interest as the loan could be negotiated.

There are various reasons why the rate of interest all over the world is now higher than it was one hundred years ago. The artificial wants of society have been very much increased. We have railroads and steamboats and telegraphs, vast avenues and sources and demands for wealth and capital that one hundred years ago Benjamin Franklin and Doctor Johnson never thought of. The railroads in this country at this time are worth more than all the country was worth at the time of the revolutionary war. All these new elements of social progress make demands for money, and therefore raise the rate of interest. There is another remarkable fact which causes a general advance of the rate of interest all over the world in this as compared with the last century, and that is the vast addition made to the coinage of the world. The discovery of gold and silver has caused an advance in the rate of interest. Why? Because every man who loans money now, especially on long time, knows that he will be paid off at the end of the period in a commodity with less productive, purchasable power than he loans. The actual depreciation in gold and silver coin for a number of years has been a little over one per cent. per annum, so that if a man now lends $1,000. payable in gold twenty years hence, he will get back his $1,000 at the end of twenty years with one fifth of its purchasable power shorn off by the additions in the meantime to the value of the gold and silver of the world. The truth is now that while real estate is advancing money is depreciating. All productions are advancing, while the relative power of gold and silver coin to other commodities is diminishing. A productive four per cent. investment in real estate is a more profitable investment than six per cent. in the best bonds in the world. Why? Because those bonds in the future will be paid off in gold and silver coin when it has less purchasable power than it has now, while the lands, by the gradual increase of the country, are increasing in value. The one diminishes at the rate of one per cent. per annum, according to the best statisticians, and the other increases in this country at the rate of one and a half per cent. per annum.

Mr. STEWART. Allow me to suggest that that depends on the continued production of gold.

Mr. SHERMAN. If California and Nevada give out there is plenty of gold in other portions of the world. There is no danger of any diminution of the quantity. It has been going on increasing year by year, and I have no doubt this process will go on for a hundred years, perhaps for a thousand years, to come. The gradual diminution of the relative value of gold and silver has gone on since the dawn of light in the Middle Ages. In England the difference between the intrinsic value of the pound sterling now and what it was three hundred years ago is nearly six hundred per cent. I believe Macaulay puts it much higher than that for even two hundred years. This process is going on continually; and therefore the rate of interest is increasing as the commodity in which the money is to be eventually repaid is diminishing in value.

Besides that, we have the new wants of mankind—wants that our ancestors never dreamed of. The value of the steamboats of this country is more than the whole amount of the national debt at the close of the revolutionary war. You cannot, therefore, test this question by what England may have done one hundred years ago. She may have reduced her rate of interest to three per cent.; but how was it done? It was done by selling her bonds in time of war at a discount of twenty, thirty, or forty per cent., and then, when peace came, availing herself of the condition of the money market at favorable moments to reduce the rate of interest.

I say, Mr. President, we cannot negotiate a bond bearing a less rate of interest than five per cent. except first by increasing and depreciating the greenbacks, and that certainly we ought to oppose to the utmost; or second, by the English plan of selling the loan below par, to which our people are not accustomed, and to which they would not submit. That resort would increase nominally the public debt. Even if the rate of interest should be more favorable, the popular judgment would condemn it, because they look upon a debt as a temporary thing to be paid off in full, and not, as in England, a permanent thing, the principal of which is never to be paid, and the interest only to be provided for.

There is this great difference between our system and the English system. In England they sell their credit below par. They fix the rate of interest and they sell securities in open market at what they will bring. In this country we fix the price of our bonds at par and ask money lenders at what rate of interest will you loan us money. That is the difference. Why is it so? Because in England they do not anticipate the payment of the principal. I have before me the statement of one of the most eminent writers on English finance, who says that the system of England is a vicious one. William E. Gladstone, in a recent speech made by him in Parliament, declared that the system of finance by which the English have perpetuated their debt for ages is a vicious one. Here is what Sir Robert Hamilton says on that subject:

"In the early part of the funding system the capital assigned to the public creditor seldom exceeded the sum advanced by him. We find only two slight deviations from this rule during the seven years' war and one in the American war, before 1781. Annuities for years or lives were granted as a bonus on many of the loans during these periods. Afterward, when the difficulty of raising loans increased, capitals were assigned to the creditors much higher than the sums advanced, and this practice has been continued since to a great extent.

"It has been maintained in the House of Commons on the part of the ministry, and, if we mistake not, even admitted by the Opposition, that it was the duty of a financier to raise the loan at the least annual expense it could be procured for, without regard to the amount of the nominal capital. We apprehend that this opinion is indefensible, except upon the supposition that all views of discharging the national debt, or any part of it, are forever laid aside; and that the measures founded on it are very pernicious. The nation ought to pay no more in discharge of debt than the sum borrowed, together with the interest during the time the debt subsists. By the system now followed it pays, besides, the excess of the capital assigned above the sum borrowed, in case the redemption be at par; or, if the price of the funds enable the public to redeem the debt on lower terms, the nation pays, in addition to the sum borrowed, the difference between the price of stock at the times of borrowing and paying, which is always great."

There is another way in which I suppose we might negotiate a bond at a low rate of interest; and that is, by postponing the payment of the principal to an indefinite period. That, however, is against the American notions of finance. Our people have always looked upon a debt as a burden to be paid off as rapidly as possible, and public opinion and good policy would not tolerate the making of a very long loan, and I for one would not, under any circumstances, vote for one which it would not be within the power of the Government to redeem within twenty years. When we were involved in the war we always reserved the right of redemption. The idea of redeemability was always ingrafted in all our loans. I would not desire to see loans made except with that power reserved, so that when a favorable opportunity offered we might step forward in strict accordance with the public faith and redeem the principal of the bonds by paying the amount.

The public is already familiar with the ten-fifty five per cent. loan. They know what it is. It is known in every cabin in all this land. A bond at four per cent. or any other less rate of interest would be looked upon as confiscation; you could not negotiate it; five per cent. is now about par, and we can sell a five per cent. bond without increasing the greenbacks a single dollar. I do not desire to see the greenbacks increased beyond their present amount. There is no necessity for it. We can reduce the rate of interest from six to five per cent. without increasing the volume of greenbacks, and we can thus save to the people of this country $17,000,000 in gold per annum without deranging the currency, without disordering the money market, without depreciating our credit. I do not desire to force upon the market a loan bearing a lower rate of interest, which will either require more greenbacks to float it, or require us to sell it below par, or require us to prolong the time of payments. We can negotiate a five per cent. loan now in the present state of the money market, disordered as it is by political complications, and I desire to secure that, maintaining, however, the right within a reasonable time, say ten years, to make a further reduction to four per cent., if we can, after that to three per cent. or whatever public credit will allow; but the attempts now to reduce the rate of interest to four per cent. would be regarded in this country and abroad as a species of confiscation.

THE PAYMENT OF THE PRINCIPAL.

The section of this bill in regard to the payment of the principal of the debt only establishes the general idea that the debt itself shall be paid in a period of time. The Committee on Finance, after much reflection, agreed to fix the amount which should be annually applicable to the payment of the principal and interest of the debt at $135,000,000. The amount of the interest now is $129,500,000, so that we appropriate about five and a half millions to the payment of the principal; but, as a matter of course, this sum being applied annually, while both the principal and the interest of the debt is being reduced, partly by funding, partly by payment, partly by the operation of this law, the interest will gradually be decreased, and the amount applicable to the principal will thus annually increase. If all our debt is funded into a five per cent. loan except the long bonds of 1881, and the amount should be $2,200,000,000, leaving outstanding the present amount of greenbacks and no more, the interest on the debt would cease to be a burden, and the difference between the amount appropriated and the amount required to pay the interest would gradually pay off the principal of the debt. I have a table, prepared at the Treasury Department, showing the precise operation of this plan, by which it will appear that it would pay off the debt by 1909.

This plan is free from the objection made to our former sinking fund, which is a fund placed in the hands of commissioners, to be invested annually. It is in constant danger of being diverted from its purpose. This appropriation will, on the contrary, be applied constantly to the payment of the national debt. It so happens that our debt can be arranged under this funding bill so that some of it will be due every year for many years. Some of it will be within our reach within periods of two years for more than twenty years to come; so that by the application of this specific sum we can pay off the principal of the debt. When the bonds are below par we can buy them in the market; when they are equal to par we can pay them off; and under the operations of the bill, which, I believe, received the general assent of the committee, the whole debt will be paid off in a period of forty years.

CONVERSION OF UNITED STATES NOTES.

Mr. President, I desire now to make a few observations in regard to the sections of the bill relating to the United States notes; and these I consider as vitally important. We propose to restore to the United States note the right to be funded at the pleasure of the holder into the new bonds whenever he desires. There is more ground of discontent and more real discontent among the people of this country because of the discrimination made between the bondholder and the holder of the greenback than from any other cause. You compel every citizen of this country to take the greenback as money, willing or unwilling. It is the measure of the value of his labor; and yet it has no purchasable power except the hope that in some future time the United States will redeem it. It may be forced upon another man in payment of a debt; it may be applied to pay taxes; but it cannot be converted into income except at a discount.

A man cannot take United States notes payable on demand to any broker and receive in exchange any form of security issued by the United States. There is a wide discrimination made between the bondholder and the noteholder, which gives rise to popular clamor and is the cause of a great deal of just complaint. In 1863 we were compelled for wise purposes to take away the right of the holder of the greenback to fund it, because we wished then to force our loans upon the market; and while that right was outstanding we could not do it. Now that the war is over, that the whole process of funding is intended to be voluntary at the discretion of the noteholder, we ought promptly to restore this right to allow the note to be converted at any time into some kind of bond; and we propose also to allow the bond to be converted into notes keeping within the limit of notes fixed by law. Then there is no discrimination; the bondholder and the noteholder are both public creditors; both depend upon the public faith. The noteholder may go to the Treasury of the United States and demand his bond; the bondholder may go also and demand his note. They are put on a basis of equality. This destroys all speculation in Government securities. Both will then stand on the same footing, and both will be of equal value. The noteholder may at his option draw interest in gold by converting it into bonds, and the popular cry of demagogues that we have provided gold for the bondholder and notes for the people will be silent.

SENATE.

The Funding Bill—Mr. Sherman.

And, sir, there is now no reason why the note issued to the laboring man should now be less valuable than any other form of Government security. It makes one of those salient points before a popular audience just and correct, which is the cause of complaint, and will be until it is removed. An important effect of this provision will be to furnish money to redeem the bonds or any other securities that offer, and without resorting to a sale of bonds. I do not propose, nor do the committee contemplate, the issue of any new greenbacks. We suppose that the process of funding these notes, they pouring into the Treasury, will furnish ample means to redeem all the outstanding bonds and securities as they become redeemable. I have no doubt the same process will go on here that occurred in Europe—a very small amount of money will pay a large amount of bonds. The mass of the bonds will be exchanged without money. The transactions paid by money compared with the transactions paid by checks and other forms of paper are as one to a thousand. The daily balances in the exchanges in the New York clearing-house amount to many millions, and yet the amount of currency to pay these balances is often less than one per cent. of their nominal amount. Other reasons may be given for the new feature of this bill giving the holder of these bonds the right to convert them into notes. This is indispensably necessary to guard against sudden contraction and panic. There are times when the notes will float into bonds so rapidly as to contract the currency, and thus derange business and prevent the movement of crops. This privilege will give flexibility and movement to the currency of the country. Every exchange will be a benefit to the Government. If the holder of a Government security bearing interest surrenders it to the Treasury for a note without interest the United States saves the interest. If, on the contrary, the notes are funded for a bond the notes may be used in the redemption of other bonds bearing a higher rate of interest. If the money-market becomes stringent, if currency becomes scarce, the holder may be willing to surrender his bond bearing five per cent. interest in gold in order to get currency with which to pay his debts, and why not give him that privilege? It is a benefit to the United States, and it is the only mode by which, during the suspension of specie payments, we may make a flexible currency.

And, sir, this loan will be the great saving fund of the people of the United States. Every man having money for a time idle will float it into these ten-forty bonds, and while we have the money we shall pay off bonds bearing a higher rate of interest. When he desires it again, he can come back and get the bond, and so this operation may be carried on with perfect safety. Now the deposits in the saving banks amount to over five hundred million dollars. Why should not this money be deposited in the Treasury? Why should not these little streams of the savings of the laboring man help to float the public credit? The Government of the United States ought not to feel too high to acknowledge the services of such a fund. They will be useful. They will enable the depositor to get the full value of his money. Now he deposits in savings banks, where he gets four or five per cent. interest in paper money. Under this provision he may put his money in these bonds, and the money thus deposited will enable the Government to pay off bonds bearing a higher rate of interest. In every view we could take of this proposition, after the most ample consideration, we thought it was a wise provision, and would work well. The trouble and cost of printing these bonds and exchanging them one for another, being carried on at the Treasury Department or at the depositories, or other proper places of exchange, will be done without cost except that of printing. It is purely voluntary, and will be adapted to the wants of trade. It will tend to give increased value to the United States notes; and my firm conviction is that under this process both notes and bonds will gradually rise, step by step, until they reach the standard of gold, and then this whole process ceases according to the provisions of the bill. I look upon this provision as the most rapid way to specie payment.

The only other section of the bill to which I have not alluded is that which legalizes contracts in gold. That is right in itself. I always supposed that the legal-tender act was not intended to affect the right of the people to negotiate, buy, and sell gold, if they chose. Some of the courts, however, have decided otherwise. Whatever the law may be, there is no objection to unlocking the hoards of gold, and allowing the people to deal in it as they choose. It makes another addition to the currency, and will gradually make our people become accustomed to dealings and transactions in gold and will tend in the right direction. Where one man lends gold to another man, it is equitable that he should have gold back in payment, and it is very inequitable for the debtor in such a case to refuse to pay it, and make a fraud of the law. I think it will be beneficial to insert this provision, because dealing in gold will have a tendency toward specie payments.

I have thus, Mr. President, presented the leading provisions of this bill. I appreciate the difficulties of the subject and the personal responsibility I assume in advocating a measure that may fail of its purpose. It is far easier to sit quiet, to propose nothing, and criticize the measures of others; but such I do not understand to be the duty of your Committee on Finance. We are actuated by the earnest desire to reduce the burdens of the people without injury to the public credit or injustice to the public creditor, by a firm conviction that the offer here made to the bondholder is fair, equitable, and honorable, and that its acceptance would not only save an annual expenditure of $17,000,000 in gold, but would settle, upon a proper basis, all uncertainty as to the mode of payment of the public debt, and still leave open, after a reasonable time, a further reduction of interest, if practicable. Further than this the committee does not go. It does not provide for a rejection of this offer; but I repeat, that if this offer is rejected I will not hesitate to vote to redeem maturing bonds in the currency in existence when they were issued and with which they were purchased, carefully complying, however, with all the provisions of law as to the mode of payment and as to the amount of currency outstanding. This conclusion I have arrived at against the earnest arguments of personal and political friends and against my own personal and pecuniary interests.

But, sir, I saw two years ago—and we all see clearly now—that the existing relation between the public creditor and the tax-payer, by which the former enjoys all the blessings of a Government without cost, receives without diminution a higher rate of interest than your courts would enforce between citizens, and may demand payment of the principal in gold for paper lent, while your courts refuse to enforce a special contract for the return of gold for gold.

Such a system cannot endure in a Government not entirely despotic without creating discontent that may endanger the fair and equitable performance of the public engagements. You cannot disguise your knowledge of this growing discontent. The unavoidable effect of approaching specie payments in reducing prices and shrinking values will increase this discontent. In that painful process the people will see that the untaxed productive annuities of the bondholder alone will be increased in value, while all other forms of property will be reduced in value. It is not the interest, nor do I think it will be the desire, of the public creditor to invite this discontent. The same motive that induced him to trust the Government in its hour of peril will induce him to accept equity from those who are willing to do equity. And, sir, his patriotism will not be lessened when he reflects that while his money aided in the good cause it has been the most profitable investment of capital he could have made.

Senators often tell us that we must not be influenced by public discontent or clamor. I agree with this when the discontent is not founded upon substantial equity, but when it is founded upon equity it will make itself felt through you or over you. And Senators must remember that this is a Government of the people, for the people, and by the people. It is not, like the Government of Great Britain, a despotic oligarchy, where the rights of property override the rights of persons; where the laws are made to add to the accumulations of the rich, though hundreds of thousands may thereby be pinched with poverty. That is the land of entails, where the offices of the church are bought and sold as property, and where all that is good in life—office, honor, property—is confined to less than one tenth of the population—where the laws are studiously framed to exclude the poor from all political rights. We borrow from these people of kindred blood many of the best guards of liberty, but we must take care not to ingraft on our republican system the leading feature of their present Government, the supremacy of property over labor.

Their wealth consists of vast accumulations of property produced by ages of labor. A generation adds but little to this aggregate of wealth; therefore their laws protect property at the sacrifice of labor. Here all the acquisitions of the past, all the accumulations to this hour, are only equal to the accumulations that will be made by labor during the next ten years. Our wealth is in the energy and sinews of thirty million free people—all equal—each working for himself, with no privileged hand to press him down in the race of life. It is this that has made our history like the tales of Arabian fiction. Our railroads alone, built since we were all young, are worth $1,600,000,000, or more than the property of the United States when she took her place among the nations of the earth. The property of the State of Ohio is now worth more in gold than that of all the colonies when they proclaimed independence, and yet Ohio was then a pathless wilderness where no white man dwelt.

The entire debt of the Revolution, which Alexander Hamilton approached with terror, which our ancestors debated over for years, upon which parties were formed and dissolved, was $75,740,111 80, including over seventeen million dollars of State debts assumed; and yet now we appropriate one half of that sum for pensions, and will this year reduce our current expenses more than that sum. All this vast progress is the result of labor. To encourage, maintain, and reward labor must be the principal object of our legislation. Capital can take care of itself. It has many advantages in competition with labor. It may be idle—labor cannot be. It does not grow hungry; it does not become cold or sick, while the hand of labor must be supported by food and clothing, and awaits sickness and death. Capital is only useful to the country as it gives employment to labor, as a means to further development, while all labor tends to create new wealth.

When capital is invested in Government bonds it is useful, so far as further development is concerned, only in supplying the wants of the owner. When employed in most other pursuits it adds to the national wealth. Certainly it is not the public interest to make this investment so profitable and attractive as to draw into it the capital of the country or to make it so permanent as to become a privileged aristocracy. No privilege should be granted to the bondholder that is not granted to the noteholder. Both are public securities, and both, and equally, can appeal to the public faith. No privilege should be given to the bondholder unless it is compensated for by some advantage reserved by the Government, and the whole public debt should be made to assume such form that it may be a part of the circulating capital of the country bearing as low a rate of interest as practicable, and only with such exemptions as will maintain it at par with gold. Whether this bill will promote these objects it is for the Senate to say. I confidently believe it will. I do not appeal to any party for the support of this measure, for it affects all alike. All must contribute to the public taxes, and all will share in the benefits of any relief.

But while we trust our political adversaries may support this as a measure of relief to our constituents, yet the fate of the bill must rest mainly upon the Republican party. It is my pride and hope that this powerful political organization, having conducted the country with safety and honor through the most memorable scenes of our history, may, still retaining the confidence of the people, gradually guide them back into the channels of peace, reduce their burdens, relieve them from oppressive taxes, and start again in productive labor the millions now waiting to develop the greatest country God ever gave to man.

Now distrust seizes upon every one. Wild schemes have been proposed, which drive capital from its moorings. Taxes are bearing heavily upon unprofitable industry, and complaints are made of the burden and distribution of these taxes. Sectional divisions are already showing their hydra heads, and disputes as to the terms of public engagements cast doubts upon the public faith. It is in such a time that Congress is able to perform its highest duty—that of an arbitrator. Upon questions involving the public debt it is the only arbitrator. It cannot shrink from this duty. I trust, sir, before this session closes, that Congress will provide for the redemption of our maturing bonds, thus saving ultimately $17,000,000 a year; that it will adopt such measures as will gradually make the dollar in greenback in the hands of the laboring man equal to a dollar in gold; that it will throw off the great mass of our internal taxes, and reduce our ordinary expenses to the lowest practicable limit. These measures adopted, we may safely leave to our constituents the renewal of trade, the restoration of confidence, and the development of industry.

SPEECH OF HON. C. A. NEWCOMB,

OF MISSOURI,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 22, 1868,

On the resolutions reported by the Committee on Reconstruction for the impeachment of the President.

Mr. NEWCOMB. Mr. Chairman, never since I have had the honor of occupying a seat on this floor have I had a doubt but that the country would be brought to this crisis, and when the question of impeachment was before this House in December last I voted to sustain the report of the majority of the Committee on the Judiciary. And yet, sir, I enter upon the discussion of the resolution reported by the Committee on Reconstruction with mingled feelings of sorrow and joy—sorrow in the consciousness that a man honored by the loyal and true men of the country with one of the highest positions in their gift, and by his right of succession elevated to the highest position on earth, should have so far fallen as to betray their confidence in a systematic career of State crime that has disgraced the American nation; and joy in the opportunity afforded the American people of demonstrating to the friends of liberal Government everywhere the superiority of Republican over monarchical institutions in the work of removing an unworthy and wicked ruler.

The impeachment and removal of Andrew Johnson will be looked upon all over the world as the grand crowning triumph of freedom and republicanism, and do more to overthrow arbitrary power and oppression and establish the universal Republic than any other act of this Government up to this present time. The war of 1812, the war with Mexico, and the late civil contest with rebellion demonstrated the power of the Republic to repel invasion, to prosecute foreign war, and defend itself against the machinations of internal foes. The impeachment and removal of Andrew Johnson will prove the power of the people, under the forms of law, to remove a ruler of their own selection whenever he proves false to the ideas that underlie the institutions of our country or his elevation to power. The contests of arms resulted in victories of force over force, while the successful impeachment of a criminal Executive will prove the grandest of the many grand victories of liberty and peace, more noble and enduring in its influence upon the future of the nation than ten thousand victories won upon the field of carnage and strife.

This one victory of peace is wanting to secure the perpetuity of the Republic and make impossible in the future internal wars for the attainment of political rule. And it is for the Fortieth Congress of the nation to determine whether this grand and final triumph of truth, liberty, and law over domestic treason and executive treachery shall be achieved. Approaching the subject with such views, and having no ambition beyond the good of my country and a desire to discharge my duty to my constituents under my oath, and fully realizing that the people demand action rather than words, yet I should not feel that I had discharged my whole duty should I remain entirely silent.

Mr. Chairman, I was scarcely prepared for the strange and violent utterances that fell from the lips of the learned gentleman from New York, [Mr. Brooks,] who intimates that this is a contest for the control of a few miserable offices. The gentleman would fain make the country believe this proceeding in regard to the removal of Mr. Stanton and the impeachment is a grand scramble for office and spoils—only a question about who shall control the offices. It would be natural to judge that persons who place so low an estimate upon the patriotism of others have but little themselves. If by a desire to control a few wretched places he means that the Representatives of the people have been keeping their vigils around the temple of American liberty for the last two years with an anxiety that has known no sleeping, and have worked steadily and faithfully to this day to save the nation from the rule of the treacherous, incapable, and corrupt incumbent of the executive chair, then he may be right.

Does the gentleman suppose men are actuated by no higher motive than a desire to control a few miserable offices? I tell the gentleman he little understands the character of the men he thus reviles, and it will be well for him to reflect that all the men of this Republic are not degraded to the level of the habits of the dens and stews of New York city, and all the Representatives on this floor do not owe their elevation to political gamblers who engage in the traffic in fraudulent votes in that corrupt metropolis.

Gentlemen of the Opposition comfort themselves with frequent reference to the Democratic gains in the elections of last year, and the gentleman from New York, in discussing this great question, by way of intimidation, speaks of "the thundering majorities whose voices are heard outside of this Capitol." I tell the gentleman he has much yet to learn of human nature. I see a very different significance in the result of the elections of 1867 from what the Opposition discover on this floor.

If the people faltered in the last elections, and failed to meet the great questions of the hour with the enthusiasm of 1866, it was because Congress had faltered and failed to do its duty the previous spring, and they intended to rebuke their unworthy Representatives. If the people failed to do their whole duty it was because Congress had failed to meet their expectations, and proved itself unequal to the demands of the hour. And if the Representatives of the people in either House fail again I trust in God the people will accept no excuse, but spur them out of their mouths, and confide the high trust to those who are worthy. To trifle longer with this momentous question is to trifle with the dearest interest of the Republic and with the demands of the true men all over the land; let him who falters now beware.

Let not the Opposition on this floor lay the flattering unction to their lips that the result of the elections of 1867 shows a reaction in favor of the party that declared "the war a failure." I tell them nay, verily, but rather a rebuke to Congress that they had not done their whole duty in the removal of a President whose continuance in office they feel to be a continual menace to the loyal people of the country, an obstruction in the way of reconstruction, and a disgrace to the American name.

The gentleman warns us to beware, for behind him are thousands and millions of the great Democratic party, the bone and muscle of the country, ready to sustain him. These Halls, sir, are not unfamiliar to such sounds as these. In 1861, when the Representatives from the rebel States were retiring from this Chamber, their words of warning, like the gentleman's from New York, echoed from this and the other wing of this Capitol; but now, as then, we heed them not. We hear not in such sounds the voice of friendly warning, but rather threats and menaces, and in the name of the loyal men of this nation answer, beware. The time was when the Democratic party was a great party; when in its ranks were found such patriots and statesmen as Thomas Jefferson, Andrew Jackson, Martin Van Buren, Silas Wright, Thomas H. Benton, Lewis Cass, and Stephen A. Douglas. Those were the days of its purity and greatness, and in those days the gentleman was its better enemy. But, sir, most that was good in that party has left it, and most that was bad in the old Whig party has united with it, until now it is but little else than a party of treason and treason sympathizers, inspiring neither the fear nor respect of any loyal man in the nation.

I, too, could tell the gentleman that behind Congress, ready to vindicate its action in the enforcement of law against Andrew Johnson, stand a million of the survivors of the Grand Army of the Republic, and still behind them are the great loyal people of this country, who have made sacrifices for the maintenance of the Constitution and laws such as no other people ever made on the earth, and if the sound of your slogan again calls them forth, they will come from every hillside and valley, they will come from city and town. Sir, they will "Come as the winds come when forests are rended, Come as the waves come when navies are stranded."

But I tell you there is no need for alarm. The people of this country, through their Representatives, and under the forms of law, can impeach, try, and remove a bad President and scarcely produce a ripple on the surface of society beyond a momentary flutter in the gold market or a little variation in the scale of values, all to settle back at a lower point than has been touched since 1861.

The gentleman "bids us beware that in so doing you follow every form of the Constitution and every form of the common law." That, sir, is just what we propose to do. To prevent further violation of law and bring the guilty to justice is why this proceeding is now being considered. The loyal people of this country, by the sacrifices they have made of the best blood of the nation, fathers, husbands, and sons, have done quite enough to satisfy the world that they are in favor of law, and are determined to insist upon obedience thereto by all persons, be they high or low. I cannot conceive why it is that the resolution now before the House should be so bitterly opposed. It cannot be because gentlemen believe the proceeding one not authorized by the Constitution and laws of the land. But what are the points of law and the facts in this case? I propose a simple statement of them, without stopping to argue, in the few moments allotted me. The most learned lawyer on the other side of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Woodward,] in a speech delivered a few weeks since on this floor, sustained the legal principles of the majority report of the Committee on the Judiciary on the subject of impeachment, and could not accept the narrow views of the minority report.

But what says the Constitution itself? Section two, article one, of the Constitution of the United States says:

"The House of Representatives shall choose their Speaker and other officers, and shall have the sole power of impeachment."

Not only is the power to impeach conferred upon this House by the Constitution, but here rests the sole power. If the Representatives of the people refuse to enforce this remedy there is no appeal, for it possesses the sole power of impeachment. The Constitution further provides, in section three, article one, that—

"The Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments."

And from that high impeaching tribunal there is no appeal. So we see the Constitution places this high and responsible duty in the two Houses of Congress, and beyond that there is no such remedy. It must be too plain to admit of doubt that this House has the sole power to impeach and the Senate to try cases of impeachment. There is where the framers of the Constitution confided this power, after a searching debate upon the several propositions to give the Supreme Court or an independent court jurisdiction in such cases.

The Constitution further provides, in section four, of article two, that—

cers of the United States, shall be removed from office on impeachment for and conviction of treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors."

It is not necessary here to inquire what are high crimes and misdemeanors within the purview of the Constitution, whether the offense, as defined by common law, or, as some insist, that it must be defined by positive statute, for in this case all seem to agree that the offense charged against the President is a high misdemeanor.

The civil-tenure law, section six, says:

"SEC. 6. That every removal, appointment, or employment made, had, or exercised contrary to the provisions of this act, and the making, signing, sealing, countersigning, or issuing of any commission or letter of authority for or in respect to any such appointment or employment, shall be deemed, and are hereby declared to be, high misdemeanors, and upon trial and conviction thereof, every person guilty thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $10,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding five years, or both said punishments, in the discretion of the court."

The only question, then, for this House to consider is, have we such proof before us as should satisfy rational, sensible men that there is such cause for believing the Chief Magistrate of the nation guilty of an offense for which he may be held by this House to answer at the bar of the Senate, sitting as a high court of impeachment, to answer for high crimes and misdemeanors in office? This is the whole question before the House. The House of Representatives sits as a grand inquest to find a bill preparatory to sending him before the lawfully constituted tribunal for trial. It is not for this inquest to find him guilty or not guilty. All it has to do in the matter is to ascertain if the evidence is sufficient to satisfy the tribunal having jurisdiction of the offense, of the guilt of the accused, and if so, to present to the Senate formal articles of impeachment and make good the same. The House must be convinced that there is probable cause for believing the accused guilty. If, in the case before us, the evidence uncontradicted is sufficient to satisfy a reasonable man that there is cause for believing the Executive guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors in office, then every member on this floor is bound by his oath to vote for impeachment. As the members of the Opposition insist that everything shall be done in strict conformity with law, I say to them apply the law against the President in precisely the same manner you would apply it against the lowest offender in the land, were you trying such offender for violating a statute of the State. Apply to this investigation the strict rules of law, so much talked about, and I fear so little appreciated by gentlemen in the Opposition, and not one can escape from voting for impeachment. Therefore I say to Democrats apply the rigid rules of law and let Andrew Johnson stand or fall by law. Now, let us see from the facts as they are before us, how the case will stand with the President.

The civil-tenure law provides that—

"Every person appointed to office by and with the advice and consent of the Senate shall be entitled to hold such office until a successor shall have been in like manner appointed and duly qualified."

The President may suspend any such officer for cause and certify his reasons for such suspension to the Senate, within a given time fixed by law. The President very properly gave his reasons to the Senate in the case of Mr. Stanton. The Senate considered the same and found they were not sufficient to justify the President in the suspension, and reinstated Mr. Stanton. And in the face of this proceeding it is said that Mr. Stanton was removed by the President when he assigned General Grant to duty as Secretary of War ad interim; but the fact that he sent his reasons to the Senate and addressed Mr. Stanton as Secretary of War in his notice of removal of February 21, sets this pretext aside. In his notice assigning General Thomas to duty he tells Mr. Stanton that his "functions will cease at the date of the reception of this communication," clearly recognizing him up to that time. And in the notice served upon him he says:

H_o. OF REPS.

"You will transfer to Brevet Major General Thomas, Adjutant General of the Army, who has this day been authorized and empowered to act as Secretary of War ad interim, all records, books, papers, and other public property now in your custody and charge."

Can any one doubt but that this act of the President is a deliberate defiance of the Constitution and laws made in pursuance thereof, and is one of those acts defined to be a "high misdemeanor," and cannot be permitted to pass without appeal to the constitutional remedy if we would save the Republic from ruin and overthrow by executive usurpation.

That an open, willful violation of the provisions of positive law is an impeachable offense can scarcely be doubted by any one, and that the acts of the President in this case are in open and willful violation of a positive statute as well as the provisions of the Constitution of the United States I think his own acts and words clearly prove.

But it is claimed that the civil-tenure law is unconstitutional. The President has the constitutional right, if a bill is passed by Congress that he thinks is in violation of the Constitution, to veto the same, and return it with his objections to the House where it originated. If it is then considered and passed by a majority of two thirds of both Houses of Congress it becomes a law, the President's objections to the contrary notwithstanding; and such was the case with this civil-tenure bill. And it is now as much one of the laws of the nation as any other on the statute-books. After the President returns a bill with his objections to the House where it originated he has exhausted his constitutional power to prevent it becoming a law, and here his opposition must end. After it becomes a law his sworn duty is to see that it and all the laws of the land are faithfully executed. If we admit that the President is the judge of what laws are constitutional and what are not we exalt the President above the legislative and judicial departments of the Government, and invest him with an arbitrary power that would be subversive of all law and liberty. If the civil-tenure law should hereafter be adjudged unconstitutional, and such construction be given to the Constitution as the President claims is the true one, it would not relieve the President from the charge and guilt of violating the law, for he must obey and see that the laws are faithfully executed until they are repealed or adjudged to be unconstitutional.

In any other view of the subject what would prevent an ambitious and wicked President from declaring such laws to be unconstitutional as stand in the way of his ambitious plans? And as President and Commander-in-Chief of the Army assume to be the Government, might he not strike down the liberties of the people in a single day, or might not the transition from a Republic to an empire be as sudden as in France, when, on the night of the fatal coup d'etat, the day went out on the republic and the following one dawned upon an empire? And, sir, we have some reason to believe that but for the patriotism and incorruptibility of the commanders of our Army something more fatal to the liberties of the people might have been attempted by the man now acting President of the United States. But upon the question of the power of the President to remove from office we are not without authority. The question has been frequently before the courts and ably argued, but not as often decided. In Marbury vs. Madison (1 Cranch, 154) the court decided "when the tenure of office was fixed the President had no power over the officer." It has hardly been disputed for seventy-five years but that Congress has the right to regulate the tenure of such officers, and no attempt has been made for that length of time by any President to remove such an officer as Secretary of War and to appoint a successor while the Senate was in session and without its consent.

I will now refer to another branch of the subject. In December last I voted for the impeachment of the President on the evidence reported by the Committee on the Judiciary. I regarded that all-sufficient then, and have seen no reason to change my opinion since. The facts since added are not more important than those then offered in evidence. The removal of Edwin M. Stanton from the War Office, in violation of the civil-tenure law, will hardly, in the eyes of posterity, be a justification of a great party for removing a ruler placed in power by the people. And I do not believe this House would resort to such a measure for that cause alone were it not for the multitude of other crimes he has committed in the last two years. The removal of Secretary Stanton from the War Office is, in my judgment, one of the smallest and least criminal of his many criminal acts, though it doubtless is the most direct and positive violation of positive law, and one violation of law, knowingly and willfully committed, is as much an impeachable offense as a thousand.

History, however, will justify this proceeding, if it justifies it at all, not only because the President has defiantly violated a positive penal statute of the country by appointing and removing officers, but because, to use the language of the minority report on a former occasion on this subject, the "President has disappointed the hopes and expectations of those who placed him in power, betrayed their confidence, and joined hands with their enemies."

Because he has proved false to the express and implied conditions which underlie his elevation to power, and deserves the censure and condemnation of every well-disposed citizen of the Republic, because, "guilty of many wrongs, he has been blind to the demands of the times and to the demands of a progressive civilization."

Because he is "incapable of appreciating the grand changes which the last six years have wrought, and seeks to measure the great events which surround him by the narrow rules which adjusted public offices before the rebellion and its legitimate consequences had destroyed them and established others."

Because he has created provisional governorships and other civil offices unknown to law, appointed persons to fill offices who were disqualified because of their participation in the rebellion from holding any office under the Government of the United States, and permitted them to exercise the duties thereof, fixed the salaries of such officers, and paid them with money belonging to the Government without authority of law.

He has assumed and exercised the right to form new State governments without authority of law, thereby usurping a power that belongs exclusively to Congress.

Because he has ordered officers of his own creation to call conventions for that purpose, and drew money from the contingent fund of the War Department, without authority of law, to pay said officers.

Because he has surrendered immense quantities of railroad property that belonged to the Government to the rebels—roads captured from the rebels in time of war, and completed with money drawn from the public Treasury.

He has attempted to corrupt the public service of the Government by offering bribes to his subordinates.

He, in the language of the majority report of the Committee on the Judiciary, "by public proclamation and otherwise did, in the year 1865, invite, solicit, and convene in certain other States then recently in rebellion, conventions of persons, many of whom were known traitors who had been engaged in an attempt to overthrow the Government of the United States, and urged and directed such conventions to frame constitutions for such States.

"He used and applied property taken from the enemy in time of war for the payment of the expenses and support of illegal and unconstitutional governments set up in States recently in rebellion; and, for a like purpose, and in violation of the Constitution and of his oath of office, he authorized and permitted a levy of taxes upon the people of said States, thus usurped and exercising a power which, by the Constitution, is vested exclusively in the Congress of the United States.

"He has in messages to Congress and otherwise denied substantially the right of Congress to provide for the pacification, government, and restoration of the rebel States to the Union. And in like manner he has asserted his exclusive right to provide governments therefor, and to accept and proclaim the restoration of said States to the Union, all of which is in derogation of the rightful authority of Congress and calculated to subvert the Government of the United States."

He has encouraged the spirit of rebellion in the South after it was crushed out by armed force until the sentiment of loyalty could only assert itself at the peril of life and property. He has fanned the spirit of revenge in the minds of men recently in rebellion until it has exiled thousands of the best and truest men of the South from their homes and household gods.

He has encouraged the spirit of persecution and revenge toward the colored population of the South until ten thousand have felt victims to the hate and vengeance of their former masters, and their unburied and unsheltered bones are scattered from Richmond to the Rio Grande, and methinks they point their fleshless fingers toward Andrew Johnson and say, "I will meet thee there"—not at Philippi, in the night time in battle array, but at the judgment bar of the great future, when the hollowness of his pretensions to be the "Moses of the black man" will excite the jeers of the world.

He has from the hour when, in a state of inebriation, in the Capitol of the nation, in the presence of the people and in the presence of the representatives of all the nations of the earth, he took the oath of office, down to this day, been a perpetual reproach to his high position and a disgrace to the American nation.

For these and other reasons that will be faithfully preserved by the sleepless chronicler, history will justify this proceeding, and assign to Andrew Johnson a place with Nero, Torquemade, George Jeffries, and other names that stand out in history as warnings to those who come after.

Others who differ with me in opinion will justify their vote upon other grounds; with them I shall have no dispute. It matters but little to me by what process a man arises at a correct conclusion; I rejoice without stopping to criticise the process of reasoning that led him there. To-day I am glad to believe that all my Republican friends are ready to vote for a measure I have for more than twelve months looked upon as inevitable and necessary to national prosperity and peace. For, with Andrew Johnson in the presidential chair, reconstruction cannot take place, and public confidence will not be restored. Legislate as we may, the restoration of the rebel States to their proper place in the Union, after all lies at the foundation of confidence and security. It is vain to talk of confidence and stability in business matters, or of giving such security to values as will justify investments, while ten States are disorganized and business prostrated, and financial ruin spreads all over that territory, and the difficulty cannot be remedied as long as the Executive uses the whole power of his high office to thwart every measure of Congress looking to the restoration of those States.

And, in conclusion, let me say to Representatives on this floor, that the American people, the true Democrats and real Republicans of the nation, the men who make and unmake Representatives, Governors, and Presidents, expect their Representatives this day to do their duty and their whole duty, loving justice, hating treachery, admiring courage, they will tolerate no shirking of responsibility on the part of those sent up here to remove in their name the only remaining obstacle in the way of a speedy restoration to national Union and peace. Educated to believe "There can be offered to God no more acceptable sacrifice than the death of an unjust and wicked king," they require at our hands the most acceptable act we can in their name perform—the immediate impeachment and lawful removal of a depraved, wicked, corrupt, and treacherous President.

HO. OF REPS.

Impeachment—Mr. Smith.

I will close in the language of St. Paul, that peerless man, whose words of wisdom and fervid eloquence has come ringing down through twenty centuries without having lost any of their strength or beauty. His words of instruction to the Ephesian church are peculiarly applicable to us this day.

"Put on the whole armor of God, that you may be able to stand against the wiles of the devil; for we wrestle not against flesh and blood, but against principalities, against powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world, against spiritual wickedness in high places. Wherefore, take unto you the whole armor of God, that ye may be able to withstand in the evil day, and, having done all, to stand."

SPEECH OF HON. W. C. SMITH,

OF VERMONT,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 24, 1868,

On the resolution reported by the Committee on Reconstruction for the impeachment of the President.

MR. SMITH. The question now suddenly and in a most unexpected and extraordinary manner forced upon the consideration and determination of the House is, indeed, one of surpassing interest and transcendent importance. In the decision soon here to be made rest great issues, issues commensurate with the greatness and fraught with the destinies of the Republic. Next, indeed, to the great measures inaugurated to save the life of the nation and preserve the entirety of the Union, no question has come before the American Congress for discussion and decision, affecting more vitally and permanently the welfare and safety of the country, and the perpetuity of republican institutions than the one now under consideration.

The great executive Officer of the American people—the representative embodiment of national honor, of national justice, and of national power, the sworn defender of the Constitution and the executor of the laws, is solemnly charged with such contempt and disobedience of law, such disregard and violation of the provisions and limitations of the Constitution, as, within the meaning and intent of that instrument, constitute high crimes and misdemeanors. It is incumbent on us, therefore, as Representatives of the people, watchful of their interests and jealous of their honor, to consider this great question with that candor and caution, that thoroughness and impartiality, which shall insure a wise and just decision.

On the 27th day of January last a resolution was referred to the Committee on Reconstruction authorizing them "to inquire what combinations have been made or attempted to be made to obstruct the due execution of the laws," and to report to the House "what action, if any, they may deem necessary." On the 22d instant they reported a copy of a letter or official order of the President removing Hon. Edwin M. Stanton from office as Secretary of War, and also a copy of another letter or official order authorizing Brevet Major General Lorenzo Thomas to act as Secretary of War ad interim, and ordering him to immediately enter upon the discharge of the duties pertaining to that office. The committee further report that, upon the evidence collected by them, they are of the opinion that the President be impeached of high crimes and misdemeanors, and recommend the passage of a resolution to that effect.

Under the solemnity of our oath of office we are now called to weigh and act upon the testimony, and to declare for or against the resolution of impeachment.

Has the President, in the acts or either of them referred to, violated the laws and the Constitution; and is he, therefore, justly charged with high crimes and misdemeanors? If both acts—that of the removal of Mr. Stanton and the appointment of General Thomas—were authorized by the Constitution and warranted by law, then he stands justified. If, however, either or both were in opposition to or in violation of either the Constitution or the law, then he is liable to such judgment as the intent or purpose of his acts may justify. To the Constitution, then, we first refer the acts committed by the President for consideration and judgment in the light of, and according to the letter and spirit of that instrument.

It is important here to ascertain, if possible, what, if any, authority there may be in the Constitution itself for the existence of such an executive department as is now established and recognized as the Department of War, and whether such an officer as is now known and styled as Secretary of War is provided for; and, if so, what is the rank, or order, or classification, of such official; and how the appointment of such officer may be made, and to whom it is intrusted.

By referring to section two of article two of the Constitution, prescribing and defining the powers and duties of the President, it will be seen that he is empowered to "require the opinion in writing of the principal officer in each of the Executive Departments upon any subject relating to the duties of their respective offices." Here is first, and clearly found, constitutional authority and provision for the existence and erection of those Executive Departments which were afterward organized and regulated by law, and for the appointment of a "principal officer" to each, to be known and designated as an officer of the United States at the head of an executive Department.

The Department of War was organized by law, in pursuance of and under the authority of this clause in the Constitution, as one of the Executive Departments of the Government on the 7th of August 1789, and the "principal officer" thereof was designated and styled as Secretary of War; and hence and thereby the Secretary of War became an "officer of the United States," and brought within the provisions and limitations of the Constitution in that clause where only it provides for, and prescribes the mode of, appointment of public officers.

In the next paragraph of the same section of the Constitution, relating to the appointment of public officers, it is provided that—

"He [the President] shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate shall appoint, ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law."

It will be noticed that by the first clause of this paragraph relating to the making of treaties the language is permissive, and the exercise of the power conferred is optional and voluntary, not obligatory or mandatory. It is entirely within the will and discretion of the President to propose for or to negotiate a treaty. Neither the Senate nor the House of Representatives, nor any power or department of Government, can require or compel him to undertake, or proceed, with any negotiation for any acquisition of territory, or for any treaty for any purpose, with any Power. Nor can he, for neglecting or refusing to undertake any negotiation for, or proceeding in regard to, a treaty, be held to account or justly chargeable with high crimes and misdemeanors. A wise restraint is, indeed, laid upon him from concluding or perfecting a treaty without the advice and consent of two thirds of the Senators present—and he is thus prevented from making, of his independent will or according to his individual judgment, unwise and unequal treaties, and from thus imposing upon the people, in the name of the Government, needless and burdensome taxation for the purchase of useless or undesirable territory. But, as before mentioned, neither the Senate, nor any department of the Government, can compel him against his will or judgment to initiate or to proceed in the negotiation for a treaty.

In regard, however, to the appointment of public officers the language of the Constitution stands in striking contrast. Here we find not a delegation of discretionary power, but a positive duty enjoined. The President has here no choice or discretion of nominating or withholding the nomination of any of the officers named. The Constitution designed and decreed that the Government which it ordained should be perpetuated in all its departments and functions, and it left to the President no power of choice to defeat its grand design.

And here, sir, I cannot forbear to express my constant wonder and admiration for the mastery and almost superhuman skill, and foresight, with which our great "Magna Charta" was formed and drawn. In every trial and every emergency of our eventful history as a nation, it has answered every want, and met every necessity. In the storm and waste of war—against riot and insurrection—against rebellion and invasion—against foreign enemy and domestic foe—against treachery and treason assailing the nation's life, and attempting its destruction—against all dangers and in every crisis, it has proved our shield, our guide, our guard, and the sure tower of our defense. Even if desertion and treachery are found intrenched in the very heart and citadel of the nation, attempting to corrupt the guards and undermine the very foundations of the fair fabric of our political structure, even then shall we find safety and deliverance in our Constitution.

With most remarkable skill and foresight, then, did the framers of the Constitution employ the language of compulsion, of command—in regard to the duty of the President touching the appointment of those officials named in the clause under consideration—and whose existence and continuance were deemed essential to the life and welfare of the Republic.

It therefore becomes not only the duty, but a binding obligation upon the President to nominate, and when, and as soon as, the Senate advise and consent—

"To appoint ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States, whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for and which shall be established by law."

Observe, the language is, not that "he shall have power" to nominate—not that he may nominate—but he shall nominate. To refuse or neglect to do it is at his peril. And to what end or purpose is he so plainly required first to nominate, and the Senate consenting then to appoint, but for the purpose and to the end that the form of government ordained in the organic law shall not fail; but that the powers of government shall be neither consolidated nor usurped; but that justice shall be maintained and administered; but that judicial and administrative officers shall be perpetuated, and the appropriate duties and functions of their several offices be continuously and independently discharged; and to the end that all the powers and departments of the Government shall move on, working harmoniously together for the promotion of the peace and prosperity of all the people, and the safety and glory of the Republic?

And how, except by asserting, and if need be enforcing, this duty and obligation of the Executive, can these high ends and purposes be secured? Indeed, the obligation of the President to nominate, and upon the assent of the Senate to appoint, is, therefore, in our view, essential to the preservation of our form of Government. And the admission of the right, or the concession of the power to the Executive to appoint such officers as are named in the clause under consideration, in the enumeration of which, we believe, all heads of Executive Departments are clearly included as being not only "officers of the United States," but necessarily such as being "principal officers" of such Departments, and essential to the administration of the Government, are utterly inadmissible, as being in violation of the express requirement of the Constitution, contrary to the genius of our institutions, and dangerous to if not subversive of the Government itself.

In the concluding clause of the paragraph referred to, it is declared that—

"Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of Departments."

But we have already seen that the Department of War is, under the authority of the Constitution and by virtue of law, an executive Department with a "principal officer" styled and known as Secretary of War, and consequently an "officer of the United States," the mode of whose appointment is clearly and definitely prescribed. Congress has, therefore, no constitutional power to declare the Secretary of War—being the "principal officer" of an executive Department—to be an "inferior officer," and then by law vest his appointment "as they think proper" in the President alone, in the "courts of law, or in the heads of Departments." Indeed the absurdity and danger of the position are apparent when it is considered that if the executive department can by legislation be made an inferior department, and a Secretary of an executive Department be made an "inferior officer," Congress might by law vest the appointment of the Secretary of War or any other head of Department in the head of such Department himself, thus empowering a Secretary to perpetuate himself in office, or to appoint his successor at his own pleasure or option, and thus enable him to take his Department and administer its affairs outside and independent of the knowledge or control either of the President or the Senate. Such a doctrine is alike dangerous and absurd.

The concluding paragraph of the same section provides that—

"The President shall have power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate, by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session."

This clause confers upon the President a wise, but limited power of temporary appointment to meet and supply the exigencies and requirements of the public service during the recess of the Senate. And here it seems worthy of special note, that only in this clause can there be found any grant of power to the Executive in relation to appointments or granting of commissions. But he cannot under this grant of power, make or force a removal, either while the Senate are in session or during their recess, nor can he of himself nor at his own option create a vacancy for the purpose of exercising the power to "fill it up." He can, constitutionally and safely, only use the grant for the purposes and under the conditions prescribed and limited. It is his duty also as bound to "take care that the laws be faithfully executed" to exercise the power here conferred with a sound discretion, and with an honest purpose and sincere desire to serve the public interest, and promote the public welfare, otherwise he perverts his power and abuses his high trust.

In the limited time allowed for the consideration of so important a question as is now before us it is impossible to do more than to make brief allusion and reference to those provisions and limitations of the Constitution which bear directly upon it, and to indicate, rather than to present, the conclusions therefrom. In now bringing the official acts of the President, as reported by the committee and upon which the impeaching resolution is based, to the test of the Constitution, that touchstone by which laws are to be proved and official misdemeanors tried, I am for myself forced to the conclusion, that there is no warrant or ground there to be found upon which the President can rest or defend his recent acts of removing Mr. Stanton from the office of Secretary of War and of appointing Adjutant General Thomas to that office ad interim. And inasmuch as the Constitution neither provides for, nor allows to, the President any power of removal of such officers of the United States as are therein named and described; and inasmuch, further, as the Constitution seems to confer no power upon Congress to vest by law the power either of appointment or removal of such an officer of the United States as the Secretary or head of an Executive Department in "the President alone;" and inasmuch, lastly, as the President has, in the official acts referred to, assumed and usurped to himself and attempted to exercise the right of removal of an "officer of the United States," and the appointment of another person to the position and duties of such officer so attempted to be removed, while the Senate were in session, I am led to the further conclusion that such acts were known, willful, and flagrant violations of the Constitution; that they are usurpations of executive power dangerous to the liberties of the people, and hostile to the peace and safety of the Republic; and therefore that they were high crimes and misdemeanors within the meaning and intent of the Constitution.

But, sir, we are not restricted, nor, perhaps, allowed to restrict ourselves, to constitutional tests alone, clear and conclusive as they may be, in judging of the recent extraordinary acts of the President. We, as the Representatives of the people, are bound to see to it that the laws which are made in their name to protect their rights and secure their liberties are not, with impunity, disregarded and trampled under foot by him who is solemnly bound "to take care that the laws be faithfully executed."

On the 19th of February, 1867, the House passed a bill entitled "An act regulating the tenure of certain civil offices." The Senate having passed it on the previous day, it was sent from the House to the President for his signature. He refused to sign it, and interposed his constitutional power of objection, stating at length his reasons for vetoing the bill, and thus exhausted all his rightful power to prevent its becoming a law. The bill was reconsidered and passed by the requisite two-thirds vote in each House on the 2d day of March, and thus became a law, notwithstanding the objections of the President. By the first section of the law it is provided that certain officers, and among them the Secretary of War, shall not be removed except by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Obedience to law lies at the very foundation of free government, for without law there can be no liberty, and is incumbent upon all, the high equally with the low. The Chief Executive of a free people, chosen and set for the faithful observance and execution of all the laws, is especially bound to give all the force and authority of his high position and example to their maintenance and enforcement.

But what do we find the President's course to have been relative to the law under consideration. He first admits its binding force upon him by suspending, under the provisions of the second section of the act, the Secretary of War and assigning to the duties of the office the General of the Army as Secretary ad interim. He again recognizes its authority and validity in complying with its provisions by reporting to the Senate, within the time prescribed, such suspension with the evidence and reasons for his action. The Senate did not concur with the President in his order of suspension, and thereupon General Grant, in obedience to the law, retires from the position; and Mr. Stanton immediately and rightfully resumes the office of Secretary of War. The President then proceeds, in contempt of the lawful action of the Senate, deliberately and defiantly to violate the same law which he had but a short time before assented to and complied with. Foiled in his purpose of getting Mr. Stanton out of the War Department by suspending him and making an ad interim appointment; exasperated with General Grant for his manly and prompt submission to law and the expressed will of the Senate, obstinately determined to obtain control of the War Department for the accomplishment of unworthy, if not illegal and revolutionary purposes, he next issues an official order under date of February 21st instant, addressed to Hon. Edwin M. Stanton, removing him "from office as Secretary for the Department of War," and next an order of same date directed to Adjutant General Thomas requiring him to act as Secretary of War ad interim, and "to immediately enter upon the discharge of the duties pertaining to that office."

In contempt of the order of the Senate annulling the suspension of Mr. Stanton, regardless of his obligation to faithfully execute the law, determined in fomenting strife and dissension, usurping power, and violating both the letter and spirit of the Constitution, the President now forces upon this body a question and an issue which we can neither ignore nor defer. With a strange perversity and an unyielding obstinacy he hastens to the accomplishment of his own purposes and ends, regardless of, and opposed to the welfare and peace of the nation. Shall he longer go on unchecked and unchallenged?

Sir, resistance to law, violation of constitutional obligations, usurpation of power, and renunciation of rightful authority, inaugurated the recent unparalleled rebellion, and made necessary the costly sacrifice which a loyal people freely made for the honor, the unity, and the integrity of the Government. That sacrifice must not be in vain; the fruits of victory, so dearly won, must neither be surrendered nor lost.

A faithless Executive must not violate the Constitution and nullify the laws, nor seek unlawful power by obstructing the execution of laws and attempting the corruption of high officials, with impunity; and, forced as I am, sorrowfully, to the conclusion that there can be neither peace, nor security, nor unity, nor prosperity to the country while the President pursues his willful and mad career of usurping power, defying law, and inciting and encouraging insubordination, I can recognize no alternative but to pass the resolution reported by the committee—and to present him before the high tribunal provided by the Constitution, for trial.

"That Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, be impeached of high crimes and misdemeanors."

Liberty and justice, law and order, present peace and future security, the welfare of the nation, and the safety and glory of the Republic, all and alike require it.

Ho. OF REPS.

Impeachment—Mr. Lawrence.

Impeachment.

SPEECH OF HON. W. LAWRENCE,

OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 24, 1868,

On the resolution for the impeachment of the President of the United States.

MR. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, the resolution upon which we will soon be called to vote declares that the President of the United States should be impeached of high crimes and misdemeanors.

It becomes a solemn duty, therefore, to inquire what the President has done—has he violated the Constitution or any law of the land?

Fortunately for the country and for us, the question what he has done is one of fact, about which there is no dispute. A brief historical summary will enable us to comprehend this fact—its nature, magnitude, and consequences.

From the formation of the Government up to the 2d day of March, 1867, the Cabinet officers of the Government, and many others likewise created by law, were appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and held their offices for no fixed term, but indefinitely until removed.

The Constitution had ordained that the President—

"Shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate shall appoint, ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States, whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law; but the Congress may, by law, vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of Departments.

"The President shall have power to fill all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate, by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session."—Art. 2, sec. 2.

The Constitution neither created nor prescribed the term of office of any Cabinet officer, but this was left to Congress, having the constitutional power—

"To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers"—

meaning those vested in Congress—

"and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States or in any department or officer thereof."—Art. 1, sec. 8.

Congress at an early day by law created various Departments of the Government with Cabinet officers at their head, but fixed no term of office.

When the First Congress established the Department of Foreign Affairs, the question arose whether its head should be made in terms removable by the President. On one side it was said that the power of removal was vested in the President, either as an executive power or as incident to the power of appointment, while on the other it was maintained that the power of removal, nowhere in terms being conferred on the President, could only be exercised with the assent of the Senate.

"The result was not a decision, but what better deserves to be characterized as a compromise or evasion of the question, by the substitution for the words, 'to be removable by the President,' of the phraseology, 'whenever the said principal officer shall be removed by the President, or in any other case of vacancy, the chief clerk shall take charge of the papers,' &c.

And so it stands in the law. (Act August 7, 1789, sec. 2; 1 U. S. Stat., 50.) From that time, for many years, the President had maintained and exercised as to all civil officers having no fixed terms the power of removal.

The practice had been when the Senate was not in session for the President to remove officers at his pleasure, and to issue commissions to new officers, as the Constitution requires, to "expire at the end of the next session" of the Senate.

But when the Senate was in session the practice had been for the President, when he desired the removal of an officer, not to issue an order of removal, but to nominate for confirmation to the Senate a new officer to supersede the one in office. The existing officer retained his place until the Senate confirmed the appointment of a successor, which ipso facto terminated the right of the incumbent and gave it to the new appointee. In no case had the President ever asserted the right to remove an officer holding by the advice and consent of the Senate except in this mode, that is, with the assent of the Senate. The President had, indeed, claimed that when the Constitution gave him "power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate" that he might create the vacancy by a removal "during such recess," but never when Congress was in session. The very fact that the Constitution had given the power to fill vacancies "during the recess of the Senate" had always been construed to mean that he might not create or fill vacancies during the session of the Senate without their consent. "Expressio unius exclusio alterius" is the maxim of the law.

Even this limited power of removal or creating a vacancy during the recess of the Senate was an innovation on the Constitution, which limited appointments in the recess to vacancies which might "happen;" and it was an unfortunate day for the Republic when the "removal" of an officer was regarded as presenting the occasion when a vacancy was said to "happen."

It made a vast army of officers dependent on the President's will, and subverted that freedom of thought essential to a republic. It inaugurated the political heresy that "to the victors belong the spoils of office."

It was contrary to the opinion of the framers of the Constitution.

Hamilton declared that the consent of the Senate would—"Be necessary to displace as well as to appoint officers."—Federalist, No. 77.

But this has been so conclusively shown by the unanswered and unanswerable argument of my learned colleague on the Judiciary Committee, [MR. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania,] in his speech of December 5, 1866, in this House, that I leave the question with that masterly specimen of logic and eloquence.

But whatever views may have prevailed as to the true interpretation of the Constitution, in the absence of all legislation it cannot be doubted that Congress has power to regulate by law the subject of appointments, and not only so, a tenure or term of office may be prescribed.

Congress has power to and did create the Cabinet and other offices. The power to create carries with it the power to prescribe a term of office.

If, as claimed, the power of removal is an incident of the power of appointment, a fortiori the power to prescribe a term of office is incident to the power to create it. The power to regulate appointments and to prescribe a term falls within the authority of Congress "to make all laws necessary and proper for carrying into execution" the powers of the Government. (2 Story on Const., 1537; Marbury vs. Madison, 1 Cranch, 155; Com. ex rel vs. Bassier, 5 Serg. and Rawle, 457; ex rel Heenan, 13 Peters, 230; United States vs. Guthrie, 13 Howard.) This power has been repeatedly exercised by Congress with the sanction of Presidents Lincoln and Johnson.

The act of February 25, 1863, creates the office of Comptroller of the Currency, and provides that—

"He shall be appointed by the President on the nomination of the Secretary of the Treasury, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and shall hold his office for the term of five years, unless sooner removed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate."

A similar provision is carried into the act of June 3, 1864.

The act of July 13, 1866, says:

"And no officer in the military or naval service shall, in time of peace, be dismissed from service, except upon and in pursuance of the sentence of a court-martial to that effect or in commutation therefor."—Section 5, Session Laws, 92.

This was approved by President Johnson.

By the act of August 7, 1789, the power of removal was conferred as to the Northwestern Territory. (1 Stat. 53.)

The act of Congress of March 2, 1867, "regulating the tenure of certain civil offices," provides—

"SEC. 1. That every person holding any civil office to which he has been appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and every person who shall hereafter be appointed to any such office and shall duly become qualified to act therein, is, and shall be entitled to hold such office until a successor shall have been in like manner appointed and duly qualified, except as herein otherwise provided: Provided, That the Secretaries of State, of the Treasury, of War, of the Navy, and of the Interior, the Postmaster General, and the Attorney General, shall hold their offices respectively for and during the term of the President by whom they may have been appointed, and for one month thereafter, subject to removal by and with the advice and consent of the Senate."

"SEC. 6. That every removal, appointment, or employment, made, had, or exercised contrary to the provisions of this act, and the making, signing, sealing, countersigning, or issuing of any commission or letter of authority for or in respect to any such appointment or employment, shall be deemed, and are hereby declared to be, high misdemeanors, and, upon trial and conviction thereof, every person guilty thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $10,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding five years, or both said punishments, in the discretion of the court: Provided, That the President shall have power to make out and deliver, after the adjournment of the Senate, commissions for all officers whose appointment shall have been advised and consented to by the Senate."

The validity of this act has been recognized by the President in hundreds of commissions issued by him to officers to act for a term as prescribed in the law, whereas the former commissions were "during the pleasure of the President." (Impeachment investigation of 1867, page 767.) The form of the commission has been changed to correspond with the new law. It has been recognized in cases of many officers suspended under its provisions and by submitting to the Senate the reasons therefor.

It was recognized when on the 12th August, 1867, the President by virtue of its provisions suspended Edwin M. Stanton as Secretary of the Department of War from the exercise of his functions.

It was recognized when on the 12th day of December, 1867, the President sent into the Senate his reasons for so suspending the Secretary of War.

On the 13th day of January, 1868, the Senate refused to concur in such suspension, and refused to consent to the removal of the Secretary of War. The President and all Departments of the Government, with his approval, treated the law as valid from that day to the 21st of February, 1868, by recognizing Mr. Stanton as Secretary of War, without question or cavil.

On the 21st February, the President recognized the validity of the law and of the action of the Senate, by addressing Mr. Stanton as Secretary of War in the order for his removal. What occurred after this we learn from the following official documents:

WAR DEPARTMENT.

WASHINGTON CITY, February 21, 1868.

SIR: General Thomas has just delivered to me a copy of the inclosed order, which you will please communicate to the House of Representatives.

E. M. STANTON, Secretary of War.

Hon. SCHUYLER COLFAX,

Speaker House of Representatives.

EXECUTIVE MANSION.

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 21, 1868.

SIR: By virtue of the power and authority vested in me as President by the Constitution and laws of the United States, you are hereby removed from office as Secretary for the Department of War, and your functions as such will terminate upon the receipt of this communication.

40TH CONG....2D SESS.

Impeachment—Mr. Lawrence.

Ho. OF REPS.

You will transfer to Brevet Major General Lorenzo Thomas, Adjutant General of the Army, who has this day been authorized and empowered to act as Secretary of War ad interim, all records, books, papers, and other public property now in your custody and charge.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

Respectfully yours,

Hon. EDWIN M. STANTON, Washington, D. C.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
WASHINGTON, D. C., February 21, 1868.

SIR: Hon. Edwin M. Stanton having been this day removed from office as Secretary for the Department of War, you are hereby authorized and empowered to act as Secretary of War ad interim, and will immediately enter upon the discharge of the duties pertaining to that office.

Mr. Stanton has been instructed to transfer to you all records, books, papers, and other public property intrusted to his charge.

Respectfully yours,

ANDREW JOHNSON.

To Brevet Major General LORENZO THOMAS, Adjutant General United States Army, Washington, D. C.

Official copy respectfully furnished to Hon. Edwin M. Stanton.

L. THOMAS,
Secretary of War ad interim.

On the same day the Senate adopted a resolution and furnished to the President, as follows:

"Whereas the Senate have received and considered the communication of the President stating that he had removed Edwin M. Stanton, Secretary of War, and has designated the Adjutant General of the Army to act as Secretary of War ad interim: Therefore,

"Resolved by the Senate of the United States, That under the Constitution and laws of the United States the President has no power to remove the Secretary of War and designate any other officer to perform the duties of that office ad interim."

In brief, then, on the 21st day of February, while the Senate was in session, the President, without their advice or consent, undertook to remove the Secretary of War and to appoint an ad interim Secretary. If he had power to do these things and did so for a legitimate purpose, he is guiltless.

But if he violated the Constitution or a law made in pursuance thereof in a mode calculated to subvert some fundamental principle of the Government, or if he attempted to do so, then he is guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors, and is amenable to the power of impeachment.

It has been said that this is a contest over an office, a mere controversy as to who shall be Secretary of War.

Sir, it is a contest to settle a grave principle of the power of Congress to pass the tenure-of-office law of March 2, 1867. It is a contest to determine whether every officer of the land, appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, may be turned out of office at the mere whim and caprice of the President. It is a contest to decide whether this Government is worse than a monarchy or whether we shall have liberty regulated by law. It is the old contest of the ages between executive usurpation and the rights of the people. It is the contest which has dethroned monarchs and given liberty to the people or enslaved them by establishing despotism. What, then, are the crimes of the President?

They are four in number.

1. He assumed and attempted, in violation of the Constitution, to exercise the power of removing from office the Secretary of War when there was no recess of the Senate, and without their advice or consent.

2. He assumed and attempted to exercise the power of removal in violation of the tenure-of-office law.

3. He assumed and attempted to exercise the right to appoint an ad interim Secretary of War when no vacancy had arisen in any mode recognized by the Constitution or law.

4. He assumed the unauthorized right to adjudge the tenure-of-office law unconstitutional and refused to faithfully execute it, although he is clothed with no judicial power.

The attempt of the President to remove the Secretary of War is not an indictable offense under the tenure-of-office law. The articles of impeachment founded on this attempt or the order of removal will show no indictable crime. I have examined that act of Congress critically, and no lawyer will controvert what I say. The signing of a letter of appointment is indictable, but not the issuing of an order of removal. (See section six of the act.) And this shows the absurdity of the claim that no act is impeachable unless indictable. But his conduct constitutes impeachable crimes.

A statement of these crimes, in view of the facts and the law presented, requires no extended argument.

If the power of removal exists in the President alone when the Senate is in session, it has been hitherto unknown and unexercised. It is a terrible power, and one which would make the President a dictator. In the absence of any law for a temporary or ad interim appointment, the President could vacate every office, and leave them vacant until the Senate would accept his nominees, if he may rightfully exercise the imperial power which he now claims.

Sir, it never was intended by the framers of the Constitution that the whole nation was to be made dependent on the imperial rule of one despotic master.

The President's act is a clear violation of the tenure-of-office law. It declares that every person holding office with the assent of the Senate shall continue to hold until a successor is appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. By this law the rule of the Constitution, when the Senate is in session, is applied to cases when the Senate is not in session. It makes the same law in both cases.

The President has disregarded this law and said it should not be obeyed. And what is his excuse or pretended justification? It is said he adjudges the law unconstitutional. But I deny his power to do this. By the Constitution all judicial power is vested in the courts, (article three,) except that judicial power exercised by the Senate in cases of impeachments. He did not appeal to the courts, but took the decision into his own hands, in disregard alike of the law of Congress and of the courts.

It is said the tenure-of-office law does not apply to the case of the Secretary of War because he was not appointed by President Johnson. The proviso to the first section is:

"That the Secretaries of State, of the Treasury, of War, of the Navy, and of the Interior, the Postmaster General, and the Attorney General shall hold their offices respectively for and during the term of the President by whom they may have been appointed, and for one month thereafter, subject to removal by and with the advice and consent of the Senate."

The Secretary of War and of State were appointed by President Lincoln during his first term as President, and have continued in office ever since.

The Postmaster General, Attorney General, and Secretary of the Interior were appointed by President Johnson.

When the tenure-of-office bill was before Congress the Senate insisted on exempting from its provisions the Cabinet officers. The House insisted on making them subject to its provisions, differing from other officers only in this, that their terms should expire at the end of one month after a President should be elected who did not appoint them. Congress expressly intended that the Secretary of War should not be removable by President Johnson, and the necessity for this was apparent in the known treachery of the President.

It is unreasonable to suppose Congress would leave the President with discretionary powers over this office.

It is said that as President Johnson did not appoint Mr. Stanton that he can be removed at or following the expiration of a month after—

"The term of the President by whom he was appointed"— and that President Lincoln's term expired with his death on the 15th April, 1865. But his term did not expire then.

The Constitution fixes the term at four years:

"He shall hold his office during the term of four years."

Now, whether he hold his office or not, his term is four years' time, and this is the period covered by the tenure-of-office law when it says that Cabinet officers shall hold during—

"The term of the President by whom they may have been appointed."

Any other construction of the proviso involves manifest absurdities. To hold that it does not apply to the Secretary of War is to say that he and the Secretary of State and the Navy, all appointed during President Lincoln's first term, and never reappointed, will continue indefinitely in office, while the Secretary of the Interior, Postmaster General, and Attorney General, appointed by President Johnson, will go out of office one month after the term of the next President-elect would begin.

To hold that the proviso applies to some but not all the Cabinet officers is to say that the term of office of every Cabinet officer appointed by President Lincoln expired one month after his decease on the 15th April, 1865, and had the retrospective effect of declaring them not to be officers from May 15, 1865, to March 2, 1867.

The proviso to the first section makes no distinction among Cabinet officers in office when the law was passed. It was not designed so much to protect the appointees of President Johnson as those he did not appoint. It put all on the same footing, and each is to be governed by the same law. As to each we may apply the rule of construction, noscitur a sociis.

If the construction contended for be correct, then all the multitude of officers in office when the law passed who had been appointed by President Lincoln are subject to removal by President Johnson in the same manner as the President claims he may remove Mr. Stanton, and this is precisely the evil, among others, the law was designed to prevent.

But if we could palliate the assumption by the President of a judicial power to pass on the constitutionality of the law, and then excuse his motives in its violation, the unheard of usurpation in removing from office in utter disregard of the Constitution, and while the Senate is in session, is without excuse, palliation, or parallel. It is one of the many outrages which we have so patiently borne, which we have so long endured, that the President imagined there was no retribution for any usurpation of which he might be guilty.

In attempting to appoint Lorenzo Thomas ad interim Secretary of War, when no vacancy had "happened" in any manner recognized by the Constitution or laws, the President was guilty of a high misdemeanor.

There are only four acts of Congress to which reference has been made in this connection. They are: act August 17, 1789, sec. 2, 1 U. S. Stat., 50; act May 8, 1792, sec. 8, 1 U. S. Stat., 281; act Feb. 18, 1795, sec. 1, 1 U. S. Stat., 415; act Feb. 20, 1863, Sess. Laws, 656.

These provide as follows:

"That there shall be in the said Department (of War) an inferior officer, to be appointed by the said principal officer, to be employed therein as he shall deem proper, and to be called the chief clerk in the Department of War, and who, whenever the said principal officer shall be removed from office by the President of the United States, or in any other case of vacancy, shall, during such vacancy, have the charge and custody of all records, books, and papers appertaining to the said Department."—Act August 7, 1789, sec. 2, 1 U. S. Stat., 50.

"That in case of the death, absence from the seat of Government, or sickness of the Secretary of State, Secretary of the Treasury, or of Secretary of the War Department, or of any officer of either of the said Departments whose appointment is not in the head thereof, whereby they cannot perform the duties of their said respective offices, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, in case he shall think it necessary, to authorize any person or persons, at his discretion, to perform the duties of the said respective offices until a successor be appointed, or until such absence or inability by sickness shall cease."—Act approved May 8, 1792, sec. 8, 1 U. S. Stat., 281.

"That in case of vacancy in the office of Secretary of State, or of the Secretary of the Department of War, or of any officer of either of the said Departments, whose appointment is not in the head thereof, whereby they cannot perform the duties of their said respective offices; it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, in case he shall think it necessary, to authorize any person or persons, at his discretion, to perform the duties of the said respective offices until a successor be appointed or such vacancy be filled; Provided, That no one vacancy shall be supplied in manner aforesaid for a longer term than six months."—Act February 13, 1795; United States Statutes, 415.

"SEC. 1. That in case of the death, resignation, or absence from the seat of Government, or sickness, of the head of any executive Department of the Government, or of any officer of either of the said Departments whose appointment is not in the head thereof, whereby they cannot perform the duties of their respective offices, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, in case he shall think it necessary, to authorize the head of any other executive Department, or other officer in either of said Departments whose appointment is vested in the President, at his discretion, to perform the duties of the said respective offices until a successor be appointed, or until such absence or inability by sickness shall cease; Provided, That no one vacancy shall be supplied in manner aforesaid for a longer term than six months."

"SEC. 2. That all acts or parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed."—12 Sess. Laws, 656; See vol. 43 Globe, Part 1, 1860—1861, page 304; Sen. Jour. of 1860, 1861, 2d Sess. 36th Cong., page 101, January 16, 1861; Message of President Buchanan, January 15, 1861.

The first of these acts confers no power of removal, but leaves it subject to the Constitution or laws thereafter enacted: The Constitution denies the power of removal during a session of the Senate without their consent, and the tenure-of-office law applies the same rule to vacations of the Senate.

There is no "death," "absence," or "sickness" to make a case for an ad interim appointment under the act of 1792.

No case of "vacancy" is presented under the act of 1795, "whereby they cannot perform the duties of their said respective offices."

There is no "death," "resignation," or "absence" to make a case under the act of 1863.

It is unnecessary therefore to inquire how far these laws remain in force.

The power of suspension independently of the tenure-of-office law is one never exercised and is now unauthorized except as prescribed in that statute. In any event the President is guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors.

His crime in the removal of the Secretary of War is magnified by the great principle that underlies it.

It is still more magnified by the manifest purpose to make the military power of the nation subservient to his will.

To accomplish this Sheridan and Sickles have been relieved of commands, and the President has successively tendered the brevet rank of General to Sherman and George H. Thomas. But they spurned the effort to win them over to the purposes of a corrupt President and rejected his bribes.

The unwavering loyalty and firmness of Stanton, the fidelity of the Army and all its officers, with scarcely more than an exception or two, have saved the nation from some of the meditated crimes of the President, and it only now remains for this House to arraign him before the bar of the Senate. The judicial power of impeachments is higher than Presidents or courts, and is competent to revise all their decisions and settle forever the fundamental principles of government. The Senate is the sole judge of impeachable crimes, and from its decision there is no appeal. It is the highest court of the nation, and when Presidents and judges seek to overturn the Constitution its ample jurisdiction may be invoked for the national safety and the public good.

During this debate the question has been to some extent discussed whether the President is liable to arrest, imprisonment, or suspension from office during a trial.

The facts upon which he is now charged are so brief as to require no material delay, and no necessity can arise for arrest, imprisonment, or suspension. Under the power to "make all laws necessary and proper," Congress may undoubtedly declare that the effect of preferring articles shall be to suspend the functions of the accused officer, and provide for arrest and imprisonment. But without this the Senate, as a necessary incident of the power to try the accused, may arrest and imprison.

The English practice sanctions this. It is said by May, in his treatise on the Law, Privileges, &c., of Parliament:

"If the accused be a peer, he is attached or retained in custody by order of the House of Lords; if a commoner, he is taken into custody by the sergeant-at-arms attending the Commons, by whom he is delivered to the gentleman-usher of the black rod, in whose custody he remains, unless he be admitted to bail by the House of Lords, or otherwise disposed of by their order."—Chapter 23.

Woodeson says it was customary for the Commons to request of the Lords that the person impeached—

"May be sequestered from his seat in Parliament, or be committed, or that the peers will take order for his appearance, according as the degree of the imputation justifies more or less severity."

The Commons demanded that Clarendon be sequestered from Parliament and committed. (6 Howell's State Trials, 295; 11 Howell, 733.) Lord Strafford was sequestered in 1641. (2 Nelson's Collections, 7.)

The Senate of the United States has asserted the same power.

In the matter of the impeachment of Blount it was ordered as follows, July 7, 1797:

"That the said William Blount be taken into the custody of the messenger of this House until he shall enter into recognizance himself in the sum of $20,000, with two sufficient sureties in the sum of $15,000 each, to appear and answer such articles of impeachment as may be exhibited against him."

On the 18th of June, 1788, in the Virginia convention, George Mason objected to the pardoning power vested in the President for ordinary crimes. Mr. Madison, in reply, said:

"There is one security in this case to which gentlemen may not have adverted: If the President be connected in any suspicious manner with any person, and there be grounds to believe he will shelter him, the House of Representatives can impeach him; they (evidently referring to the Senate, or the Senate in connection with the House,) can remove him if found guilty; they can suspend him when suspected, and the power will devolve upon the Vice President."

He doubtless contemplated a suspension in pursuance of law. For in Madison's report of the debates in the Convention which framed the Constitution it appears that on Friday, September 14, 1787—

"Mr. Rutledge and Mr. Gouverneur Morris moved that persons impeached be suspended from their offices until they be tried and acquitted."

"Mr. Madison. The President is made too dependent already on the Legislature by the power of one branch to try him in consequence of an impeachment by the other. This intermediate suspension will put him in the power of one branch only. They can, at any moment, in order to make way for the functions of another, who will be more favorable to their views, vote a temporary removal of the existing magistrate."

"Mr. King concurred in the opposition to the amendment."

This was rejected by eight States in the negative to three in the affirmative.

While the Convention were unwilling that an impeachment at the bar of the Senate should ipso facto suspend an officer it cannot be doubted that the Senate can imprison, and if necessary for the purpose of the trial, thus suspend the official functions of the officer impeached.

It is one of the inherent powers of every court to take the steps necessary to make its jurisdiction effectual. It might be necessary to suspend the President to prevent his forcible interference with the trial.

Imprisonment would present a case provided for in the Constitution, when in consequence of

"Inability to discharge the powers and duties of the said office, the same shall devolve on the Vice President."—Constitution, Art. 2, Sec. 1.

But I refer to these questions now, not because I suppose they will be practically important on the impeachment of the President, but because of the allusion made to them in debate.

The presidential crimes which now demand our notice, though grave in their character, are not the greatest of which he has been guilty; but they require the early and prompt action of Congress.

If in this hour we falter in our duty, usurpation will achieve a triumph from which the nation may never recover. If at last we meet this great occasion with that spirit of resistance to tyranny which inspired the founders of the nation, we will rescue the Constitution and the country from the usurper who imperils their safety and their existence, and new proofs will be given to the world that the great Republic is equal to every emergency, whether attacked by armed enemies from without or within our borders, or by the more insidious, but no less dangerous, encroachments of the highest officer known to the Constitution.

Impeachment.

SPEECH OF HON. J. S. GOLLADAY,

OF KENTUCKY,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 24, 1868,

On the resolution reported by the Committee on Reconstruction for the impeachment of the President.

Mr. GOLLADAY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make my voice heard on this occasion in earnest and solemn protest against the resolution now before the House. At a time, above all others, when the American people in celebration of the anniversary of the birth of the "father of his country" should have been in a condition to tender to his memory every emotion of gratitude and love for the blessings derived from the form of government he was so instrumental in establishing, and giving up all other occupations to an innocent enjoyment of the day, we find that their Representatives, forgetful of all other considerations, spent the time in discussing the matter now before the House—that, too, in the presence of a vast, excited, and expectant throng, filling every seat and corridor of this large building, while an awe-struck nation, rudely awakened from its dreams of peace, quiet, and prosperity, stood appalled at the action of this House, and every city, town, and hamlet in our broad land sent forth their prayers for the preservation of peace and liberty; and the hope that the madness which now rules the hour may not be the herald of impending destruction.

I admit, Mr. Speaker, the wisdom and the excellence of that provision of our Constitution which gives to the Representatives of the people's will the right to impeach, try, and punish the President "on conviction of treason; bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors;" and it is not only our right but our duty to exercise it upon all proper occasions. But I assert that no evidence is before the House to show that we are justified in the exercise of our high prerogative upon the present occasion. And, on the contrary, I propose to show that Andrew Johnson has been guilty of no "high crimes or misdemeanors," and that the present attempt, after two signal failures to accomplish the same end, is solely the result of partisan prejudice and personal malice. It is well understood that the "report of the committee" now under consideration was based upon the President's action in the removal of Edwin M. Stanton as Secretary of War and the appointment ad interim of Lorenzo Thomas, the Adjutant General of the Army, to that position. It is alleged that he has willfully violated the tenure-of-office act and the Constitution, and hence has been guilty of such a high crime or misdemeanor as to demand impeachment at our hands. I propose to show that he has acted strictly within the limits of his constitutional privileges; that he has violated no law; that he has been guilty of no crime to justify the report we are now considering.

40TH CONG....2D SESS.

Impeachment—Mr. Golladay.

HO. OF REPS.

Section two, article two, of the Constitution gives the President power to—

"Nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate to appoint, ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law."

In that instrument, which must be our highest guide in the consideration of this question, the appointment of Secretary of War is not "otherwise provided for," but it is "established by law" in the act of August 7, 1789, which created a Department of War and provided for its government. That Department has been in existence from that date to the present time. The right to appoint or remove its head at his own pleasure has never been denied to any of the predecessors of our present Executive, and such denial now is a gross outrage upon his prerogatives, an insult to his office, and violative of the Constitution.

It is well known that some months since Mr. Stanton was suspended from a discharge of the duties of the War Office and General Grant was appointed to discharge them ad interim, which he continued to do until the reasons assigned to the Senate for said suspension by Mr. Johnson were non-concurred in; when General Grant immediately, and with indecent haste, (if not with turpitude, and in accordance with a secret understanding to thwart and betray the trust of the Executive,) surrendered the office to Mr. Stanton. In bold defiance of the President's will the latter continued to hold the place, and still continues so to do. If any power on earth is possessed by the President of the United States it is the right to select and to remove at pleasure the members of his Cabinet, who are his constitutional advisers and a part and parcel of his political household. It was in the exercise of this power that Mr. Stanton was removed and General Thomas appointed to the place ad interim. It is alleged that in making this removal the President has violated the laws he swore to support. I deny it. Whether or not the concurrence of the Senate is necessary to a removal it is hardly necessary to discuss; the well-established usage of the Government for a long series of years has shown that it is not though the partisan efforts of the dominant party in the tenure-of-office act seek at this late day to establish a different doctrine; and while grave doubts of the constitutionality of this very measure pervade the minds of many of the gentlemen who voted for it with brazen effrontery the impeachment of the President is now sought, because he violated no law, but simply made an effort to have our judiciary decide whether or not this act is law at all. I am aware of the fact that in No. 77 of the Federalist Mr. Hamilton states "the consent of that body (referring to the Senate) would be necessary to displace as well as to appoint." In the foot note of the edition of that great constitutional authority, from which I quote, (edition of John C. Hamilton, page 568) on this very passage just cited, we find—

"This construction has since been rejected by the Legislature; and it is now settled in practice that the power of displacing belongs exclusively to the President."

This was the established law and doctrine of our land, as our records show—the wisdom of which is sustained by long experience—until an effort was made to change and overthrow the usage by the "tenure-of-office act," a measure violative of every sound principle of law or policy. Admit, for the sake of argument, that the act should eventually be decided constitutional, and still the President has done no wrong, and has violated none of its provisions. The second section of said act provides—

"That the Secretaries of State, of the Treasury, of War, of the Navy, and of the Interior, the Postmaster General, and the Attorney General shall hold their offices respectively for and during the term of the President by whom they may have been appointed, and for one month thereafter, subject to removal by and with the advice and consent of the Senate."

No one contends that Mr. Johnson appointed Edwin M. Stanton to the post of Secretary of War. He never sent his name to the Senate for confirmation; he never informed him that he was his choice for the position; he never signed his commission nor committed an act which estops him from exercising the power of removal under this very law and plainly granted therein, and for an alleged violation of which the President is now arraigned as a criminal by this House. Nor can any one with the most superficial knowledge of law or judicial procedures contend that a constructive appointment is to be implied from the fact that Mr. Johnson found Edwin M. Stanton in the War Office when he acceded to the Presidency and permitted him to continue in the discharge of those duties to which he had been appointed and assigned by President Lincoln. The object of this provision of the tenure-of-office act was clearly to limit the President in the power of removing any member of the Cabinet of his own appointment without the consent of the Senate, and by necessary inference he had and has the power to remove any member of the Cabinet appointed by his predecessor at his own pleasure and without the concurrence of the Senate in his action. The debates in the Senate when this very measure was under consideration there, more particularly the remarks of Senator SHERMAN, show that it was understood and admitted in that body that Mr. Stanton was not to be retained in the Cabinet by the passage of the act, but might be excluded therefrom at the pleasure of the President. It is a matter of history that Mr. Stanton himself, as an adviser of the President, declared in favor of the unconstitutionality of the act, and I have no doubt a majority of the finest legal minds in the nation concur with him in that opinion.

In support of this position, Mr. Speaker, I desire to read from the papers of the day the remarks made by several Senators at the time the recent action of the President, for which he is now threatened with impeachment, was first brought to their notice on Friday last:

"Executive Session on Friday.

"The President's Secretary, Colonel Moore, came in. Senator CONKLING was addressing the Chair on reconstruction. The executive documents were placed in a pile on the President's desk, and after a very brief lapse of time the Senate went into executive session, and the presidential documents were laid before the body, and Senator BAYARD took the floor in opposition to the resolution disapproving of the President's action and arraigning him for acting in opposition to the law, and argued at length upon both the unconstitutionality of the tenure-of-office bill and upon its entire inefficiency.

"Mr. DIXON followed, and took the ground that the President had the right to remove from positions in his Cabinet those whom he deemed were neither friends or advisers. The tenure-of-office bill contemplated nothing more than the protection of those who might be fairly designated enemies of the Executive. Mr. Stanton was included more especially in the number, and radical friendship for him sought, even at the expense of harmony in the Government, to retain him in defiance of law, common sense, and good taste, as so-called adviser, but really as a spy upon the Executive.

"Mr. HENRICKS spoke in very strong terms against what he designated an imposition on one of the coordinate branches of the Government, to which neither of the other two would tamely submit. He instanced the extraordinary change of sentiment which some Radical members of the Senate had undergone of late when an alteration of the political position seemed impending.

"Mr. SHERMAN, as chairman of the committee of conference on the part of the House when the tenure-of-office bill was under consideration, reported that the bill as amended and approved by both Houses did not attempt to restrain the President from changing his Cabinet.

"Mr. DOOLITTLE asked Mr. SHERMAN if the bill left the President power to remove Stanton?

"Mr. SHERMAN replied that it did.

"Mr. MORTON interrupted and said, at the time of the passage of the bill, it was admitted the power to remove Secretary Stanton was taken away from the President.

"Mr. FESSENDEN interrupted and said, nothing of the kind was understood by him, and if he had thought the bill meant to effect such an object as taking away from the Executive one of its principal elements of unity and effectiveness he should have voted against it.

"Mr. HOWE argued that the Senate had no power to curtail the organic privileges of the Executive; yet, though he was opposed to the general scope of the policy embraced in the tenure-of-office bill, he was unable to decide in this instance who was most to blame, Congress or the President.

"Messrs. TRUMBULL, FESSENDEN, and DRAKE followed, and each in turn confessed his inability to give an opinion on the law which would favor the construction of the resolution offered that the President had violated the law.

"Mr. FESSENDEN said he desired to read statutes more fully, and that he had little doubt he should find some law which would justify the President in his present course.

"Mr. DRAKE, like FESSENDEN, was unable to form an opinion favorable to the resolution; neither could TRUMBULL.

Thus it will be perceived, beyond all controversy, that Mr. Stanton having advised the President that the tenure-of-office act was unconstitutional, and the action of the Senate at the time of its consideration pending the passage of the bill indicating clearly that it could not be construed to keep Mr. Stanton in power, Mr. Johnson was justified in acting on these opinions, and can with no consistency be blamed for their adoption. We see presented to-day the most extraordinary spectacle that ever occurred in the history of legislation. An excited and reckless body arraigning the Chief Magistrate, whose high office, if not his person, deserves our respect, for basing a certain line of action toward a minister upon the very advice given by that minister, and similar opinions expressed by distinguished members of the national Senate, which if not distinctly expressed in the form of a statute, are certainly by any sound system of reasoning to be deduced therefrom. There must be union of act and intent to constitute a crime. The intent to be inferred from the act only when the latter is clearly proven, and subject then to rebuttal upon proof of justification.

In the case now before the House, as I have already shown, no act of crime or even a misdemeanor appears to have been committed. This House, by a decided vote, having, upon two former occasions, given a negative to all charges against the President, we know that the only act he has committed for which impeachment is now sought, is the removal of a Cabinet minister, odious not only to him, but to every refined and respectable person in the country. That there was no intent of wrong on the part of the President is manifest from many considerations. He had no motive for wrong, because he could derive no benefit from it; he intended no obstruction to the public service, as he assigned an old and experienced Army officer to discharge the duties of the War Office ad interim, and has nominated to the Senate one of the most venerable, pure, and experienced statesmen in the land as Secretary of War, Hon. Thomas Ewing; further than that, every member of this House, and every intelligent person in this country, knows that the General and Lieutenant General of our armies, two soldiers honored by our people as military chieftains were never honored by them before, wrote to the President that they would advise Mr. Stanton to resign; the latter General saying, in the event of his refusal, "ulterior measures" could then be resorted to to enforce said resignation; and both undoubtedly show that the good of the public service required said resignation.

It is absolutely astonishing, Mr. Speaker, that gentlemen here should seek to impeach Mr. Johnson for removing a man whom General Grant and General Sherman both advised to resign for the public good, and who, following a base ambition and partisan feeling, shows his utter and total disregard for the best interests of the nation. The President would have been more guilty, with this information in his possession, if he had not removed Mr. Stanton than he can possibly be for the removal. He must "take care that the laws be faithfully executed." The Constitution and regard for public interest are his highest laws, far above any statute regulations. Advised by the highest authority that the laws could not be faithfully executed with Mr. Stanton in the War Department, his constitutional oath required him to remove the obstruction. He would have been guilty of gross neglect of duty if he had failed to do so. He committed no crime or misdemeanor in the act, and any intent so to do is repelled by every circumstance in the case. The Constitution is his highest law, and so far from violating it he has vindicated its supremacy, and shown his love for its provisions. Mr. Jay, in No. 64 of the Federalist, says that—

"All constitutional acts of power, whether in the executive or in the judicial department, have as much legal validity and obligation as if they proceeded from the Legislature."

Mr. Johnson in selecting a constitutional adviser of his own, was carrying out the policy of every President from Washington down to Lincoln. He sought to violate no law, and made resort to the "ulterior measure" to which General Sherman made reference in his letter, and strictly following the Constitution as he did, according to the high authority of Mr. Jay, his act is as valid and binding as if approved by both Houses in Congress. While it may be doubted whether a simple ministerial or executive officer has the right to question the constitutionality of an act it is his duty to execute, unless his personal rights are thereby invaded, it is manifest that in this case Mr. Johnson's personal rights were invaded, and he had absolute power to test the binding force of the tenure-of-office act in the courts, and pursued the only course by which he could have done so. One of his personal rights is to select his own constitutional advisers.

This act sought to deprive him of it, and force him to retain a man in his Cabinet in whose opinions he had no confidence, with whom he could hold no personal intercourse, and whose removal was required for the public good. This gave him a clear and undoubted right to pursue his remedy in the courts of the land. He has attempted no other procedure. With dignified forbearance he has avoided all rash methods of getting his offensive and rebellious minister out of the Cabinet; he has attempted no violence, has made no resort to military force, has violated no law, but, with the integrity of a good citizen, has made simply an effort to have our judiciary define and construe the law; and, when defined and construed by the only tribunal to which the power is given under the Constitution, no man in the country will obey the decision of the court and more cheerfully adapt his action thereto than the President. I am sustained in my assertion of the right of the President to select his own Cabinet, not only by numerous precedents in the history of former Administrations in this country, but by Mr. Hamilton, the greatest expounder of our fundamental law. In No. 66 of the Federalist he says:

"It will be the office of the President to nominate, and, with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint. There will, of course, be no exertion of choice on the part of the Senate. They may defeat one choice of the Executive and oblige him to make another, but they cannot themselves choose; they can only ratify or reject the choice he may have made. They might even entertain a preference to some other person at the very moment they were assenting to the one proposed, because there might be no positive ground of opposition to him; and they could not be sure, if they withheld their assent, that the subsequent nomination would fall upon their own favorite, or upon any other person in their estimation more meritorious than the one rejected. Thus it could hardly happen that the majority of the Senate would feel any other complacency toward the object of an appointment than such as the appearances of merit might inspire and proofs of the want of it destroy."

If to fetter the President in his selection of a Cabinet by partisan legislation is not to choose for him—a choice, too, made not only on the part of the Senate, but of this House, also—then words have lost their power and language its meaning. Again, Mr. Speaker, it is the duty of the President to protect his prerogatives from illegal invasion, and stern dictates of self-defense made his recent action an imperative necessity. Elected by the Republican party, a Republican himself this day, for aught I know to the contrary, the vengeful course of his party friends toward him, their insidious efforts to so change the policy of our country as to strip the Executive of power, that it might be exercised by the Legislature—efforts, too, that are not dictated by honest conviction of their wisdom, but rather by fanaticism and personal hatred of the President—constitute a large part of the history of our legislation for the past two years. The experience of all forms of democratic government teaches us how great is the propensity of the legislative to usurp the power of the executive department of the Government. To again quote from Mr. Hamilton, in the Federalist, No. 78, we find:

"The propensity of the legislative department to intrude upon the rights and to absorb the powers of the other departments has been already more than once suggested; the insufficiency of a mere parchment delineation of the boundaries of each has also been remarked upon, and the necessity of furnishing each with constitutional arms for its own defense has been inferred and proved. From these clear and indubitable principles resulted the propriety of a negative, either absolute or qualified, in the Executive upon the acts of the legislative branches. Without the one or the other the former would be absolutely unable to defend himself against the depredations of the latter. He might gradually be stripped of his authority by successive resolutions or annihilated by a single vote, and in the one mode or the other the legislative and executive powers might speedily come to be blended in the same hands. If even no propensity had ever discovered itself in the legislative body to invade the rights of the Executive, the rules of just reasoning and theoretic propriety would of themselves teach us that the one ought not to be left at the mercy of the other, but ought to possess a constitutional and effectual power of self-defense."

How sadly prophetic these utterances of the great statesman appear in the light of recent events! Not satisfied with stripping the President of much of his power and concentrating it in your own hands, taking away privileges sanctified by custom and respected by law, enjoyed, as they were, by all of his predecessors, and never abused by him, you now seek his annihilation by a "single vote." I pray that passion may be still and reason remount her throne, and that we are not traveling to-day a road whose course will be reddened with the blood of our citizens, made wet with the tears of despairing widows and orphans, and to be filled with the wreck and mire of our once hallowed and glorious temple of liberty. Mr. Johnson, for asserting his own rights, for strictly heeding the Constitution and the laws, and for defending the executive branch of the Government from legislative encroachments, is to be hurled from power and disgraced in the eyes of the world. He knows full well that—

"Energy in the Executive is a leading character in the definition of good government. It is essential to the protection of the community against foreign attacks; it is not less essential to the steady administration of the laws, to the protection of property against those irregular and high-handed combinations which sometimes interrupt the ordinary course of justice, to the security of liberty against the enterprises and assaults of ambition, of faction, and of anarchy. A feeble Executive implies a feeble execution of the Government. A feeble execution is but another phrase for a bad execution; and a Government ill executed, whatever it may be in theory, must be in practice a bad Government." (Federalist, No. 70.)

With these great truths firmly impressed upon his mind, it was the bounden duty of Andrew Johnson, a duty required by his solemn oath, to protect the Constitution, a duty he owed to the American people and the friends of liberty and popular government throughout the world, to protect his office from usurpation and defend himself from illegal attacks upon his rights as the Chief Executive Officer of the nation; and, so far from having been guilty of either a crime or misdemeanor, his action is worthy of our highest commendation, and for it his memory will be held in grateful consideration by those who really desire the perpetuity of our institutions. And I fear, too, that the probable action of this House will furnish another argument to the enemies of representative government of the instability of freedom and the folly of vesting power in the hands of the whole people by giving evidence of the want of wisdom in its exercise and making manifest the fact that their Representatives are prone to be influenced by party faction and personal malice rather than by written constitutions and the forms of law their peers have enacted.

Mr. Speaker, I think I have shown beyond all question—

1. That Andrew Johnson has committed no high crime or misdemeanor; certainly none which could in any just sense be regarded as an attack upon the Constitution or any law passed in pursuance thereof, or that he has infringed or abridged the personal rights of any human being.

2. That in the removal of Edwin M. Stanton and the appointment first of General Thomas ad interim, and the nomination of Mr. Ewing to the Senate as Secretary of War, he exercised a constitutional prerogative, his right to which in law and in fact is recognized by Hamilton, Jay, Madison, Webster, and others of our greatest statesmen, and which has been exercised by all of his predecessors in office from the foundation of the Government to the present time.

3. That Mr. Stanton is not protected and kept in power by any just interpretation of the tenure-of-office bill, as he was not appointed or commissioned by Mr. Johnson, but owed his official existence solely to his sufferance, which he had a right to withhold at any time.

4. That while the power of rejecting a presidential nomination to office is clearly a right of the Senate, that body has no power to choose for him, and, least of all, to force upon him as a Cabinet officer a man with whom he can hold no friendly or confidential, personal or official, intercourse.

5. That his official and personal right to defend the executive from legislative encroachments is not only inferable from the very nature of the trust committed to him, but conceded and established by every sound writer upon constitutional law.

6. That the tenure-of-office bill, as admitted by its framers, was not designed to protect Mr. Stanton, and cannot be construed to a meaning opposite the intention of those who framed and passed it.

Mr. Speaker, I have now grouped together all the points that in my judgment bear upon this partisan iniquity for the purpose of showing to this House and the country the miserable and unfounded pretense set up by the calumniators and persecutors of the President.

No sane, unprejudiced man can for a moment doubt that all this "much ado about nothing" has its origin in virulent party malignity, and every pretense of legal argument or constitutional precedent proposed by these high-handed impeachers is but the dust under cover of which they hope to make an escape from that just public condemnation which awaits them at the hands of the sober, calm reflection of the whole American people.

It is of but little consequence to the American people whether Mr. Stanton, General Thomas, or Mr. Ewing is the Secretary of War, but the precedent to be established by congressional usurpation is altogether a different proposition.

Reflecting men have witnessed with pain the bitter contest which has been for nearly two years going on in the ranks of the Republican party between its President and its party dictators—the congressional majority. The President has seen fit to think for himself, and threw himself in every constitutional manner in the way of their vindictive and oppressive legislation, and they do not hesitate to denounce him in unmeasured terms as "traitor," "culprit," "great criminal," &c., for it. Indeed, they exhaust the whole vocabulary of Bilingsgate to show their contempt for him. I have listened to their denunciations with pain and mortification.

Mr. Speaker, why is this terrible excitement? Look at this vast multitude of excited men and women, as the lobbies groan with their weight of moving, interested spectators. Cast your eye over the trembling corridors of this vast Capitol, every niche and corner from turret to foundation-stones pressed by the foot of an excited people. The very wires of the telegraph corps fairly tremble with the electricity which flashes to all parts of this grand Republic the terrible information of the awful tragedy which is being perpetrated in the name of liberty—the impeachment of the President of the United States for high crimes and misdemeanors. Surely this man must be a great moral monster. He must have betrayed a generous and confiding people into the hands of a foreign Government, or he must have squandered the whole estate of that Government, or have brought down upon us war, famine, or pestilence, or surely this grand menagerie of howling patriots would not call him traitor, culprit, criminal, &c. Alas! no; nothing of that sort. Well, then, he has surely transferred the Government of the United States to the rebels, who, with bloody hands, are again wending their way to the capital to take possession of and destroy this vast Republic. No, sir. What has he done, then? Speak it, in God's name. Has he inaugurated civil war among us and shed the blood of our people to congregate the Republic's widows and orphans once more around graves wet with tears and slippery with human gore? No, sir; nothing of all this. He has been guilty of the folly of interpreting the Constitution of his country for himself under his solemn oath to protect and defend it.

The whole truth is that Andrew Johnson is a law-abiding man, and holds to the Constitution as the only bulwark of liberty and safety, and under its solemn and great teachings he has resisted the oppression of the congressional majority, some of whose leaders proclaim most unblushingly that their acts are not to be limited by such law, but exists by the divine right of their own self-will, incited to madness by the handwriting on the wall, indicating most unmistakably their approaching destruction. In their reconstruction policy their primary object is avowed negro supremacy, to be managed by military despotism at the expense of the General Government and in the interest of their own perpetuation in power. The impeachment outrage is but the "stop thief" cry to divert attention from themselves, the true criminals. They abused Mr. Johnson with fiend-like denunciation for removing some of the military satraps. They have called him every hard name but Democrat, and they even have the audacity to threaten that. They have used the great name and popularity of General Grant with which to assail the President. They have involved the name of Grant into, to say the least of it, a questionable statement of veracity with the President, and they howled with rage and disappointment when the President with calm dignity defended himself and "carried the war into Africa" by backing up his statements by his entire Cabinet to the consternation of General Grant and his corps of manipulators and wire-workers.

In my judgment this whole impeachment movement is a trump card, in the hope that they could provoke the President to some military resistance, that they might cry, "Rebel,"

"And let slip the dogs of war," and cry "Havoc," and all this regardless of its effect upon the life, property, and happiness of the great American people.

In proof of this theory just take a look at the honorable gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FARNSWORTH,] who makes himself facetiously happy, though unhappily facetious, over the oft-repeated and stale alias of rebel and Democrat; and, in blissful memory, doubtless, of his own chivalry in the late war, notifies the country, by inference at least, of his readiness to fight again and of his contempt of his enemy by the very tasteful announcement that he had about fourteen thousand majority in his district (popular General FARNSWORTH!) and that each one could whip two rebels or secession Democrats. "Talking is cheap" these times of political knighthood.

The notorious and distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] now appears for the purpose of political pirouetting, and in his usual rich, deep-toned, sounding style deals around the obloquy of rebels, criminal, usurper, &c., and the very significant idea, covert though it was, yet implied, if not intended, "Lincoln was murdered, and other distinguished patriots may be," and followed by "it is known that men ascend to power over bloody steps, and that they may do it in this country, and yet be tolerated." Mr. Speaker, there are two prominent ideas and insinuations in these extracts with which to beslime the fair name of Andrew Johnson, one at least of which we have heard only hinted at before. One that Johnson had complicity with Mr. Lincoln's murder; the other that he might procure the death of other distinguished patriots. Can political malice or personal malignity go further? Truly have we fallen on evil times when our rulers can thus be arraigned of such crimes as murder unsupported by the least shadow of a shade of foundation.

"Faith, frantic faith, once wedded to a dear falsehood hugs it to the last."

Last though not least comes our gallant and distinguished friend from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] who boils the political caldron to fever heat, and exposes in patriotic fervor, and though not calling the President coward in addition to the oft-alluded-to hard names pronounced by others, yet by in-uendo and manner—

"Learning to lie in silence
Would seem wise,
And without utterance
Save the shrug or sighs;
Deal round to hapless souls
Its speechless obloquy."

The eloquent gentleman, after stating that nobody would follow the lead of Johnson, for he would desert them in a week, very satisfactorily and complacently stands him up with a bold front for the satisfaction, seemingly, of demolishing him. Well they meet in battle array, and I can almost hear the warning words of Scotland's minstrel:

"I'll fare it then with Roderick Dhu,
That on the field his targe he threw,"

and I hope I may be pardoned, Mr. Speaker, for the thought, that in this conflict a wonderful similarity can be traced in the fate of this challenger as in that.

Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as the "so-called" Secretary of War, Mr. Edwin M. Stanton, is the immediate agent used by the impeachers, and as his right to the place is a question of important consideration, I beg to append herewith a copy of the only authority Mr. Stanton ever had, and that is distinctly announced by President Lincoln as "during the pleasure of the President of the United States for the time being." Mr. Lincoln claimed the right while living to remove and retain at will, and died with it unchallenged. Mr. Johnson has done no more, and lo, what a criminal! Impeachment and degradation is to be his punishment. Will the reflecting people of the United States approve of it?

Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States: to all who may see these presents, greeting:

"Know you that reposing special trust and confidence in the patriotism, integrity, and ability of Edwin M. Stanton, I have named, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and appoint him to be Secretary of War for the United States, and do authorize and empower him to execute and fulfill the duties of that office according to law, and to have and to hold the said office and all the powers, privileges, and emoluments to the same of right appertaining unto him, the said Edwin M. Stanton, and during the pleasure of the President of the United States for the time being.

In testimony whereof, I have executed these letters to be made patent and the seal of the United States to be hereunto affixed. Given under my hand at the city of Washington, the 15th day of January, in the year of our Lord 1862, and of the Independence of the United States of America the eighty-sixth.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

WILLIAM H. SEWARD, Secretary of State.

Impeachment.

SPEECH OF HON. R. W. CLARKE, OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 24, 1868,

On the resolutions reported by the Committee on Reconstruction for the impeachment of the President.

Mr. CLARKE, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I rejoice that in the midst of so great excitement, produced by the most insulting usurpations of the President, that law is still supreme, and that order still reigns here and throughout the country. The lawless and defiant spirit of President Johnson, manifested in his recent violations of law and duty, indicate the animus that has for two years past borne him onward in his career of crime to the astonishment of everybody. If Washington had been Paris this morning would have found Andrew Johnson a fugitive, fleeing from an infuriated populace, or hanging upon a lamp-post in front of his mansion. For offenses no greater than his the slow but determined English seized upon their sovereign without law, organized a revolutionary tribunal, put him upon trial, adjudged him guilty, and cut off his head. For much less offense than is charged against President Johnson the French people dragged a Bourbon king from his throne to the guillotine without waiting for the slow process of law, and without taking the time to inquire into the guilt of the unfortunate monarch who had fallen under the ban of popular opinion, which was only appeased with his blood.

But, sir, in this country, happily for our peace and honorable to the force and power of the law-abiding sentiment that ever stands out prominent with our people in the midst of the most trying crisis, the law is still supreme. Two years have we been witnesses of the most flagrant and insulting violations of the Constitution and laws by the President; usurpations of power the most arrogant and defiant, and by a man who attained to the high office he has so long abused and degraded by the assassination of one who, by his many virtues, had become the idol of the people, and of whose blood the public judgment has not wholly acquitted the man who, of all others, was most benefited by its being shed. Still, sir, all is order; though the provocation is great, and the great national heart is deeply moved, yet the forms of justice and the great bulwark of law stand firm and unimpaired, and all the protection that the most favored of the nation could demand is accorded to the accused President; and, if innocent of the crimes alleged against him, his honorable and speedy deliverance is beyond all question; but if found guilty, as by the proof shall be shown upon full and fair public trial, as the Constitution and laws prescribe in such case, then let justice be done, though the heavens fall.

Who is Andrew Johnson, who when solemnly charged in all due form with high crimes and misdemeanors of the greatest magnitude, repeating them daily, and thereby involving the liberty and lives of thousands of the loyal people of the country, yet he shall not be subjected, as any other malefactor, to public accusation in due form and to a fair and impartial trial, and, if proved guilty, to receive the just punishment awarded to his crimes?

No one requires his conviction except upon full proof of guilt, and, if guilty, who so disloyal as to desire his acquittal? But for his guilty connivance with the rebels of the South the ten insurgent States would long since have been restored to the Union upon terms of peace and unity, and much of the misery, oppression, and bloodshed which have fallen upon that distressed land would have been spared. For two years the White House has thrown open its portals to traitors, and of such the President has made his confidants and advisers, and in their interests he has controlled the power and patronage of his great office.

For two years loyalty has been at a discount and treason above par wherever in the Departments at Washington the President could infuse the political virus; to-day I venture the assertion that a majority of those participating in the favors of the Government in this city are out-and-out rebels or rebel sympathizers now and during the war. Honest loyal men have no standing with Andrew Johnson, unless it be when he seeks to seduce them into his schemes for overturning the Government and to deliver it into the hands of its enemies. General Grant refused to lend himself to the wicked machinations; and Sherman and Thomas declined with indignant scorn to accept the proffered brevets which were but sugar-coated bribes to lead them into the toils that were being spread for the betrayal of the country. Could any President in these times be honestly devoted to the best interests of his country and yet thrust out of its service such well-tried public men as Stanton, Sheridan, Pope, Sickles, and Swain, all of whom had distinguished themselves by the great services they rendered the Union cause in the period of its greatest need and greatest peril? Indeed, his best friends do not claim for him any sympathy with the party that saved the country from the rebels; he has long since abandoned them and turned his batteries against them and the Union; and for this warfare, this crime against his country, we demand his expulsion from power, that what has been saved of our Government by war from the grasp of treason shall not be surrendered to it by an unfaithful President in time of peace.

Sir, the rebellion is not ended, and the last organized effort to recover the lost cause will not be effectually subdued until Andrew Johnson is removed from power. He has told us in his message of December last that he will have his way, peaceably if he can, forcibly if he must. Every official act of his since that announcement shows but too clearly he means what he has said. He now claims the right to trample under his feet laws and Constitution whenever they embarrass him in his treasonable purposes; and we are no longer left to doubt his ultimate designs or the duty the hour demands of us. As he is striking at the life of the nation we must regard him as a public enemy and strike back. Past forbearance has only encouraged him in his crimes and increased the boldness with which he declares and executes them; bad men have his ear and his confidence and bad counsels control his action, and unless he is restrained at once no one can calculate the injury he may inflict upon the country. Sir, we are told by the friends of the President on this floor that it is revolutionary to impeach him! Then, indeed, it is revolutionary to bring offenders to justice. Sir, it is for just such purposes laws are made; it is to punish crime, and thereby conserve the public welfare; and if there ever was a time when a great example was needed that time has come, and a greater offender could not be found than Andrew Johnson. Let him be put upon trial, and, if guilty, lead him out of the high place he has so greatly dishonored, to bear through life the scorn and contempt of the people whose confidence he has betrayed, whose laws he has violated, and whose peace he seems resolved to destroy forever.

Impeachment.

SPEECH OF HON. MARTIN WELKER, OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 24, 1868,

On the resolutions reported by the Committee on Reconstruction for the impeachment of the President.

Mr. WELKER. Mr. Speaker, when the report of the Judiciary Committee was before the House I voted, with a majority of Republican members, against impeachment. The charges then made against the President covered a wide field, and involved so many different questions growing out of the results of the war that I feared the delay that would attend a trial in the Senate and its effects upon the great public interests of the country. There were so many subjects of legislation demanding the attention of Congress that I felt then it was best for the country to endure as long as possible the bad conduct of the President rather than resort to this extreme measure. But this forbearance on behalf of those who then voted against the proposition was regarded as a license for further assumptions of power. The charges now make a plain and simple issue, easily proven, and requiring but short time for trial, and involve the violation of the Constitution and the laws, in but a few particular acts committed since the former proceedings were terminated.

In the discussions on the first impeachment it was claimed that a President could only be impeached for indictable offenses. I did not then, and do not now, agree with that view of the law of impeachment. I believe that this remedy is provided in the Constitution for malfeasance in office, not amounting to an indictable offense, as well as for high and indictable crimes and misdemeanors; that the high court of impeachment, the Senate, must determine for itself what constitutes impeachable malfeasance, amounting to "high misdemeanors." But I will not argue this question, as it is not involved in the charges now made.

This resolution charges the President with high crimes and misdemeanors, for which his impeachment is demanded. We are now sitting as a grand inquest of the nation to consider whether he shall be placed upon his trial before the high tribunal designated in the Constitution. The authority for this proceeding is found in the Constitution, as follows:

"ART. 2, SEC. 4. The President, Vice President, and all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors."

Now, what high crimes and misdemeanors has he committed? He has removed from office Edwin M. Stanton, Secretary of War, who had before that time been duly appointed and qualified as such officer. He has appointed Lorenzo Thomas, Adjutant General of the Army, Secretary ad interim, and ordered him to take possession of the office, both of which acts have been done while the Senate was in session. In doing this it is claimed that he has violated the Constitution and laws of the United States. If this be true, then he is liable to impeachment. It is made the duty of the President to preserve and defend the Constitution, and to see that the laws are faithfully executed. All officers, as well as citizens, must obey the laws. The President has no more right to disregard the Constitution, and refuse obedience of the law, than the humblest citizen of the Republic. His high office should, indeed, place him under greater obligations to obey the law than if a mere private citizen. Failing to comply with the law himself, he could scarcely expect to enforce obedience upon others. In this Government of Constitution and laws, it is important to the preservation of our free institutions that he,

as well as all others, shall meet the just punishment provided for violated laws.

In our discussions of this question we should lay aside all partisan feelings. Its great importance demands that we should approach it as sworn jurors to ascertain "the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth," and "without fear or affection," and "without malice or ill-will."

As to the constitutional power of removal, article two, section two, says:

"He shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States, whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law; but the Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of Departments."

It is claimed that under this section he has the power of removal as incident to the power of nomination. This is not tenable. Under it he has only the right and power to nominate and appoint with the advice and consent of the Senate. It does not provide for removal. The utter absence of such authority necessarily implies that the removing power, when the Senate can be consulted, is the same as the appointing power. Without the consent of the Senate he can make no such officer, and the same consent must be invoked to unmake him.

This removal and appointment is in direct violation of the Constitution. The fact that the Constitution provides that "the President shall have power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate," is a clear negation of his power to do so while the Senate is in session. Now, let us examine as to his powers under the law. In 1863 a law was passed which provides that the President may fill vacancies temporarily which occur by death, resignation, absence from the city, or sickness. This repeals all laws inconsistent therewith, and thus limiting his power by law to fill vacancies to only these four cases. Now the President has, while the Senate was in session, made a vacancy by removal, and filled it without any authority of the Constitution or the law.

On the 2d day of March, 1867, the law commonly called the "tenure-of-office act" was passed, the first section of which reads:

"That every person holding any civil office to which he has been appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and every person who shall hereafter be appointed to any office, and shall become duly qualified to act therein, is, and shall be, entitled to hold such office until a successor shall have been in like manner appointed and duly qualified, except as herein otherwise provided: Provided, that the Secretaries of State, of the Treasury, of War, of the Navy, and of the Interior, the Postmaster General, and the Attorney General shall hold their offices respectively for and during the term of the President by whom they have been appointed, and for one month thereafter, subject to removal by and with the advice and consent of the Senate."

The sixth section of this act reads:

"SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That every removal, appointment, or employment, made, had, or exercised contrary to the provisions of this act, and the making, signing, sealing, countersigning, or issuing of any commission or letter of authority for or in respect to any such appointment or employment, shall be deemed, and are hereby declared to be, high misdemeanors, and, upon trial and conviction thereof, every person guilty thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $10,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding five years, or both said punishments, in the discretion of the court: Provided, That the President shall have power to make out and deliver, after the adjournment of the Senate, commissions for all officers whose appointments shall have been advised and consented to by the Senate."

Has the President violated this law? The removal of Secretary Stanton and appointment of General Thomas as ad interim Secretary, is plainly and palpably against the provisions of this act. He first suspended him under and by authority of this law and sent his reasons therefor to the Senate, but when assent thereto was refused by the Senate, an absolute removal was made in defiance of the law. Thus when his purpose could not be accomplished under the law he does it in violation of the plain letter of it.

In this removal the President has usurped the powers of the Senate. He has undertaken to do what the law prohibits, and thereby brings himself within the penalties of the law. He has done this willfully and purposely, and in open defiance of the law-making power.

Who is the President that he shall thus defy the law? He is simply the agent, the high sheriff of the people, to see that the laws are faithfully executed. The laws are made by the people through their Representatives. All laws are the people's statutes, made by them, and for their government. In their enactment the President is invested with a negative power in the form of the veto. But when a law is passed by a two-thirds vote of each branch of Congress, as this one was, it then becomes the law of the land, and he as well as all others bound to obey it. He has no right to refuse its execution or obedience to it because he does not approve it. If he can repudiate this law he can any other, and if one then all, and he then becomes an autocrat and above all law.

The President has done what no other Chief Magistrate of this country has ever done, in thus making a removal of a Secretary while the Senate was in session. It may have been the practice to make such removals in vacation, but no case can be found where it was done as this was, in the very face of the Senate. It is claimed that this power of removal is given in the act of 1795, but that act was repealed by the act of 1863, before cited, and does not protect the President in this assumption.

The President in this removal and appointment, and his acts in reference thereto, has violated and brought himself within the provisions of another law, I mean the act of 31st July, 1861. This act provides that—

"If two or more persons, within any State or Territory of the United States, shall conspire together" * * * "by force to prevent, hinder, or delay the execution of any law of the United States" * * * "or by force or intimidation, or threat to prevent any person from accepting or holding any office of trust or place of confidence under the United States; each and every person so offending shall be guilty of a high crime, and upon conviction thereof" * * * "shall be punished by a fine not less than $500 and not more than $5,000, only imprisonment with or without hard labor, as the court shall determine, for a period of not less than six months, nor greater than six years, or by both such fine and imprisonment."

He has conspired with General Thomas and others, by force and intimidation, to prevent Secretary Stanton from holding the office to which he had a clear right under the law.

For these flagrant violations of the Constitution and the laws; for thus setting at defiance the laws of the land the President deserves impeachment. The safety of the country and the perpetuation of the rights of the people demand it; and we, the Representatives of the people, will fail to discharge our duty if we allow this conduct to pass without bringing him speedily before the constitutional tribunal for trial.

But it is said that these acts were only done for the purpose of appealing to the courts to settle the constitutionality of the tenure-of-office law. It is only necessary, in reply to this, to say that the courts were open for proceedings in quo warranto before these proceedings were had, and they were not necessary in order to reach the courts. It is only a subterfuge, an afterthought. The purpose was to remove and defy the law, and the consequences must be met. It is high time that the President should be taught that he is not above the law. For two years he has been making war upon the law-making power of the country. He has done all he could to bring it into disgrace before the people. In all these acts of his the faithful and incorruptible Stanton, in every way possible, stood in his path. The greatest war minister of any age or country, he has performed such services as entitle him to the gratitude of all lovers of their country. His honesty and watchfulness since the close of the war has closed the nation's Treasury against the plundering avarice of fraudulent claimants, and for this his removal has been demanded by them.

The people of this country will not be confined to our charges and specifications against the President. They will go behind these charges, and in their discussions canvass his whole course of conduct. They will think of his desertion of the great party that elected him; of his treachery in transferring the influence of his high office to those who had been the enemies of the country; of his crime in raising up rebel resistance to acts of Congress made to establish the peace of the country and protect the weak and down-trodden; of the great obstructions he has placed in the way of the restoration of the rebel States, and of the wide spread of corruption under his administration, threatening the whole revenues of the country with destruction. But I have not time to speak of this further.

It is said that this impeachment proceeding is a war of Congress upon the President. It is, in truth, the result of a war of the President upon the rights of the people—a struggle between grasping and domineering power on the one side, and a bold and daring assertion of the great prerogatives of the people's Representatives on the other. In all such contests the people will prevail, and the executive power be confined within the limits of the Constitution and the law. No free Government was ever overthrown by curtailing the powers of the Executive. The danger lies in the other extreme, that of its increase and disregard of the voice of the people in the abridgement of their rights.

Impeachment.

SPEECH OF HON. W. B. ALLISON,

OF IOWA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 29, 1868,

The House being in the Committee of the Whole on the articles of impeachment reported from the committee.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. Chairman, in discussing the question now before the committee I shall endeavor to treat the subject with that seriousness and gravity which its importance demands. The resolution proposes to demand of the Senate, sitting as a high court of impeachment, a trial of the highest executive officer of the nation for high crimes and misdemeanors in office. When this subject was before the House in December last I voted with the majority of Republicans against a similar resolution, rather because I believed it was better to endure, if possible, for a brief time, a bad President, than to undertake his impeachment, especially when I felt the importance of speedy legislation upon matters affecting the material and industrial interests of the country. I see, however, now, no alternative presented to us but the impeachment of the President or an absolute surrender of the legislative power of the nation to a usurping President. I do but state the truth when I say that the President has willfully, deliberately, and criminally violated the Constitution of our country, his oath of office, and the laws of the United States. Firmly believing this, I shall vote for the articles presented to us by the committee.

The facts now presented are so palpable that the friends of the President do not controvert them, but rather seek to excuse him on the ground that he is acting within the Constitution, and that the laws which he has so plainly violated are themselves in contravention of the terms of that instrument. The President has pretended to remove from office by executive order the Secretary of War, and has pretended to appoint by a similar order another officer unknown to the law, designating him as Secretary of War ad interim, during a session of Congress, and while the Senate is in session. If he has under the Constitution and laws this extraordinary power, then the articles should not be adopted and sent to the Senate; if he cannot exercise this power there should be no objection to their adoption. I know of no instance in the history of our Government where such power has been exercised during the sessions of the Senate, and to admit of its exercise now would be sowing the seeds of the royal prerogatives, the end of which would be a subversion of the liberties of the people and place the civil administration of the Government and the Army and the Navy within the despotic will and control of one man unrestrained by law.

The Constitution is silent upon the subject of removals from office, except in case of impeachment; but, inasmuch as the judges of the Supreme Court and the judges of such inferior courts as Congress may from time to time establish by the terms of the Constitution, hold their offices during good behavior, it would seem that the framers of the Constitution intended that other offices would be held by a different tenure. It is true they provided in the Constitution for removals by impeachment, but this obviously slow method cannot always be resorted to, therefore it seems that impliedly the power of removal exists somewhere; it was claimed to-day by the honorable member from Pennsylvania [Mr. WOODWARD] that this power of removal is necessarily incident to the executive power, and is given to the President by the first clause of the first section of the second article of the Constitution, which says:

"The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America."

And he quotes in support of his view the debates of 1789, wherein this power was claimed for the President by Mr. Madison and others in the House of Representatives. I have examined those debates, and I find a nearly equally divided judgment, the power being consented to by the vote of the Presiding Officer of the Senate, and the argument of those who favored this construction insisted upon it rather because they believed the power should be brought into requisition in extraordinary cases, during the vacations of Congress, when the Senate would not be in session. It is difficult to see how the power of removal is necessarily incident to the executive power in a republican government. If we assimilate it to the executive power under our various State constitutions we find that no State executive has ever assumed so extraordinary a prerogative. If this power is absolutely given in the first clause quoted it is not subject to legislative control, and the effect of its exercise would be to nullify the provision of the second section of the same article, which declares—

"That the President shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate shall appoint, ambassadors, other public ministers, consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law."

But if the defenders of the President base his action upon this construction of the Constitution they must adopt the whole argument of those who early claimed this construction, all of whom declare in the debate referred to that a wanton removal of a worthy man from office or the abuse of the power, merely to gratify the caprice of a President, would, in itself, be a high misdemeanor in office and require Congress to invoke the power of impeachment. The better interpretation of the Constitution, it seems to me, is that the power of removal is incident to the power of appointment, and can only be exercised under the Constitution with the concurrence of the Senate.

HO. OF REFS.

Impeachment—Mr. Allison.

40TH CONG.....2D SESS.

This was the construction given to the Constitution while it was pending for ratification by the seventy-seventh number of the Federalist, wherein it is observed: "The consent of the Senate would be necessary to displace, as well as to appoint," &c., and in the debates during the administration of General Jackson was acquiesced in by the leading minds of the Senate, and resolutions were offered by Mr. Clay, March 6, 1834, and ably defended by him, embodying almost the language of the tenure-of-office act. During this debate he protested, as did others, against the interpretation made by the Congress of 1789, by the casting vote of the Presiding Officer of the Senate.

Those who framed the Constitution were not willing to trust this high power of appointment to a single man, but placed it in the hands of the President and the Representatives of all the States assembled as a Senate; and this has been the uniform construction of the Constitution, so far as I know, whenever the Senate has been in session, the power of removal being exercised by the nomination of the President, and the confirmation by the Senate of another person instead of the one sought to be removed. It is true that the practice has long prevailed of removing officers during the recess of the Senate, thus creating vacancies, which have been temporarily filled up by granting commissions under the last clause of the second section of the second article of the Constitution, but in no instance has this power been exercised during the sessions of the Senate.

But the President has not contented himself with removing the Secretary of War during the session of the Senate in a way unknown to the Constitution and contrary to the practice of the Government, but he has also appointed or attempted to appoint by letter of authority a person as Secretary of War ad interim in contravention of the plain letter of the Constitution, which declares that—

"The President shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate appoint."

I know of no pretense of authority for the exercise of this extraordinary power, and no argument has been submitted for it by the defenders of the President. It cannot be claimed under the second section of the act of August 7, 1789, creating the War Department, for that especially provides that in case of a vacancy the chief clerk of the War Department—

"Shall during such vacancy have the charge and custody of all records, books, and papers appertaining to the said Department."

Nor can it be claimed under the act of February 13, 1795, which declares that—

"In cases of vacancy in the office of Secretary of State, Secretary of the Treasury, or Secretary of the Department of War, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, in case he shall think it necessary, to authorize any person or persons, at his discretion, to perform the duties of the said respective offices until a successor be appointed or such vacancy be filled."

This act was absolutely repealed (as well as the second section of act of August 7, 1789) by the act of February 20, 1863, which last act particularly describes the cases in which the President may designate a person to perform the duties of a head of a Department, which cases are confined to the "death, resignation, absence from the seat of Government, or sickness of such head of Department." It cannot be claimed in this case that Secretary Stanton is dead, absent, or sick, nor has he resigned. On the contrary, he is active, watchful, and vigilant in the discharge of the duties of his Department.

If the act of 1795 is not repealed by the act of 1863 the repealing clause in that act is absolutely meaningless, as the acts of 1789 and 1795 were the only acts relating to this subject on the statute-book at the time; the eighth section of the act of 1792 having become obsolete by the passage of the act of 1795; indeed, the act of 1863 but revived the eighth section of 1792, and added a clause repealing all acts inconsistent with its provisions.

There being no other provisions of law upon this subject, it is clear that the appointment of Lorenzo Thomas is in violation of the letter of the Constitution as well as its spirit; and that the President by this unwarranted exercise of power has violated his oath of office, which requires him to "preserve, protect, and defend" that great instrument in an oath especially enjoined upon him by the Constitution and taken by no other officer of the Government. The power of the President to appoint during the sessions of the Senate is impliedly prohibited in the Constitution by the last clause of the second section of the second article, which gives the President—

"Power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session."

Thus it would seem clear that if the tenure-of-office bill had never become a law, under the powers granted to the President by the Constitution, there can be found no warrant for the extraordinary assumption attempted by the removal of the Secretary of War and the appointment of another person in his stead.

These two acts of the President are in clear violation of the first and second sections of the act regulating the tenure of certain civil offices, passed March 2, 1867, which law the defenders of the President insist is in conflict with the Constitution of the United States, because under that instrument the President is alone invested with the power of removal.

It seems to me clear that inasmuch as all civil offices under the Constitution, except those expressly provided for in that instrument, are created by law, their general power of regulating their tenure is within the province of Congress. This power has been frequently invoked by Congress, unchallenged by the Executive.

By act of May 15, 1820, it is provided by the first and second sections:

1. "That from and after the passing of this act all district attorneys, collectors of the customs, naval officers and collectors of the customs, navy agents, receivers of public moneys for lands, registers of the land offices, paymasters in the Army, the apothecary general, the assistant apothecaries general, and the commissary general of purchases, to be appointed under the laws of the United States, shall be appointed for the term of four years, but shall be removable from office at pleasure.

2. "That the commission of each and every of the officers named in the first section of this act now in office, unless vacated by removal from office or otherwise, shall cease and expire in the manner following: all such commissions, bearing date on or before the 30th day of September, 1814, shall cease and expire on the day and month of their respective dates which shall next ensue after the 30th day of September next; all such commissions bearing date after the said 30th day of September, 1814, and before the 1st day of October, 1816, shall cease and expire on the day and month of their respective dates which shall next ensue after the 30th day of September, 1821. And all other such commissions shall cease and expire at the expiration of the term of four years from their respective dates."

Thus early Congress, unchallenged by the Executive, provided for the term of certain officers, and also provided that at a certain time named in the statute commissions issued to certain officers should cease, and this power of regulating the tenure of offices by law has in various forms been exercised by Congress from the foundation of the Government without objection or protest until the present Executive sought to aggrandize all power over offices to himself. In the act of February 25, 1863, an officer was created in the Treasury Department denominated the Comptroller of the Currency. The first section of this act provides that such officer—

"Shall be appointed by the President on the nomination of the Secretary of the Treasury, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and shall hold his office for the term of five years, unless sooner removed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate"

thus fixing absolutely the term of office of such officer unless the consent of the Senate for his removal should be had. This act received the approval of President Lincoln. By the seventeenth section of the act of July 17, 1862, the President was authorized to dismiss and discharge from the military service either in the Army, Navy, Marine corps, or volunteer force in the United States service any officer for any cause which in his judgment rendered such officer unsuitable for or whose dismissal would promote the public service. Prior to the passage of this act the President in a few instances had exercised the power of removal of Army officers during the recess of the Senate, but the authority for such removal was regarded of so doubtful a character that Congress deemed it necessary to make provision for it by law. This law was passed at a time when a great army was in the field for the suppression of rebellion, and the power thus given was regarded as essential in promoting the efficiency of the Army. Afterward, however, when the necessity for this extraordinary power no longer existed, the Congress of the United States, by act approved July 13, 1866, repealed this provision, and provided in express terms that—

"No officer in the military or naval service shall in time of peace be dismissed from service except upon and in pursuance of the sentence of a court-martial to that effect or in commutation thereof."

This latter act received the approval of President Johnson himself, whose defenders now claim for him the right under the Constitution to dismiss or remove any officer of the Government at the will and pleasure of the President without any limitation whatsoever.

Again, the act of March 2, 1867, provides in the second section that the General of the Army—

"Shall not be removed, suspended, or relieved from command or assigned to duty elsewhere than at the headquarters of the Army in Washington, except at his own request, without the previous approval of the Senate."

This act also received the approval of President Johnson.

Mr. NICHOLSON. Will the gentleman yield a moment?

Mr. ALLISON. For a question.

Mr. NICHOLSON. I ask him if the President in returning that bill did not protest against the second section?

Mr. ALLISON. It is true, I believe, in approving the bill, the President sent in some arguments by way of protest against the second section of the act of 1867; but, Mr. Chairman, the President, without any objection or apology, placed his signature to another act having the same force and effect, to which I have just called the attention of the committee.

These two acts approved by President Johnson must have been regarded by him as constitutional; otherwise in their approval he violated his oath, which requires him to preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution. His defenders now claim for him an interpretation of that instrument which would not only remove the Secretary of War, who is obnoxious to him, but it would also give the President authority at his will and pleasure to remove the General of the Army without the advice and consent of the Senate, as required by law just referred to. And have we not good reason to apprehend that, inasmuch as the President has failed to subsidize the General of the Army to assist him in the accomplishment of his own purposes, this officer will be the next victim of presidential hate and malevolence; and every other officer of the Army in turn may be thus removed by the President who refuses to obey his despotic will, until the Army shall be placed under his absolute control. It may be answered that the President cannot fill up these vacancies without the consent of the Senate. But he has so undertaken to fill a pretended vacancy in the War Office, and may he not send to the Senate such persons for confirmation as would not be confirmed by that body, when the officer highest in rank in the Army, with the War Department under his control, would have necessarily the command of the forces of the United States. And here I might ask for the motive influencing the President to send to the Senate the names of high officers for promotion by brevet? This claim of power for the President could be urged with more plausibility than can be urged for the removal of merely civil officers, for by express language of the Constitution the President is made Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States; and if he is to assume powers by implication he could very easily say that such removals were necessary for the efficiency of the Army.

Indeed, this power is claimed for him under the clause making him Commander-and-Chief of the Army and Navy. The clause authorizing Congress to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces is no stronger in its grant of power to Congress than the clauses giving Congress authority to lay and collect taxes, to borrow money, to regulate commerce, &c., because, under the last clause of the eighth section of the first article, Congress may make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the specified powers. It is clear that our assent to the assumptions of the President claimed for him and by him, as authorized by the Constitution, constitutes a virtual abandonment of the most important legislative functions long exercised by Congress and heretofore unchallenged by any Executive. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, it is not simply because the President has assumed to control the War Office absolutely, without asking the advice and consent of the Senate, as required by the Constitution and laws, that we invoke the power of impeachment as authorized by the Constitution, but it is because a failure now to exercise that power would be to surrender to the President the absolute and unlimited control, not only of the army of civil officers of the Government, but its Army and its Navy, without restraint or limitation of law.

It seems to me that the tenure-of-office act does nothing more than reaffirm the terms of the Constitution as declared by its provisions, unless it be to provide by law for the length of the term of office of heads of Departments which before the passage of that act was indefinite. The act provides that heads of Departments shall hold their office respectively for and during the term of the President by whom they may have been appointed, and for one month thereafter, subject to removal by and with the consent of the Senate, and also to correct an abuse which had grown up in the practice of the Government of absolute removals during the recess of the Senate. To claim that Secretary Stanton does not come under the provisions of this act is to assert that he has not been Secretary of War since the passage of that act, which, I believe, is not contended for by any one; but the President is estopped from asserting now in defense that Secretary Stanton is not within its provisions, for in August last he was suspended from office by the President, and the reasons for such suspension were given to the Senate within the time required by the provisions of the act.

The Senate, having carefully considered these reasons, decided almost unanimously that they were not sufficient. After this decision the Secretary resumed his office under the law without objection from the President, and continued to exercise its duties for more than a month; and it will be observed that by the very terms of the order which pretended to remove him from office he notified the Secretary of War that—"You are hereby removed from office as Secretary of the Department of War, and your functions as such will terminate upon the receipt of this communication."

Thus removing him in open defiance of a law which the President had observed from its final passage up to that time, and in defiance of the Senate, whose will and judgment he had himself invoked under the law.

The President by the Constitution is especially enjoined to take care that the laws be faithfully executed, and he is therefore not only bound as is every other citizen of the Republic to observe the laws that may be passed from time to time, but has the higher duty imposed upon him of seeing to it that every citizen obeys the laws; and if he can set at defiance this law he may with equal propriety disregard any law that may be found upon the statute-books, and set up in defense that he regards the law as unconstitutional. The very nature of the executive office requires him to obey the law, as it is involved in the executive authority conferred upon him by the Constitution, and as such executive officer he is bound to execute the laws, whatever may be his individual opinion as a citizen with reference to their constitutionality, and a failure on his part to execute any law not declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court of the United States is to violate his oath of office, which compels him to take care that the laws be faithfully executed.

When laws are duly made and promulgated they only remain to be executed. No discretion is submitted to the executive officer. It is not for him to deliberate and decide upon the wisdom, expediency, or constitutionality of the law; that power he has exhausted when he returns a bill with his objections to the House in which it originated. What has been once declared to be law under all the cautious forms of deliberation prescribed by the Constitution ought to receive a prompt obedience; and a failure to obey in the President should be regarded as a high misdemeanor in office.

The violation of the tenure-of-office act is made a criminal offense by the provisions of the sixth section in specific terms, and declared to be a high misdemeanor, and punishable with fine and imprisonment. So that, when the President took the responsibility of violating this plain provision of law, he must have known that by such violation he would subject himself to the penalty declared in that section as well as to the high penalty of impeachment provided for in the Constitution for officers guilty of high misdemeanors in office.

But it is said in defense of the President that he only intended to test the constitutionality of this law. As well might any criminal plead such defense to an indictment found against him. On the contrary, we must judge of intent from the act itself. The circumstances are such as to preclude the idea of even this poor excuse for a palpable violation of law. He instructed General Thomas to assume the duties of the War Office, and he did actually assume such duties and signed communications and orders as such Secretary, and that, too, after the Senate, by an almost unanimous vote, had informed him that the removal of Mr. Stanton and his own appointment were in violation of the Constitution and laws of the United States.

But, Mr. Chairman, this is but one link in a long chain of usurpations on the part of the President. It is but a chapter (I hope the last) in the history of a great conspiracy, began by the President in December, 1865, and continued in perseveringly to the present moment, to turn over the government of at least ten States, if not of the whole country, to the enemies of the Republic.

It is possible, the first act by which he has brought himself within the provisions of a criminal statute, but only one of many instances in which he has used the powers of his high office to thwart the will and judgment of the people. He has attempted to usurp to himself the absolute control of the rebel States, and has sought by every means possible to thwart the execution of the humane laws passed for their restoration to the Union. Under his guidance life, liberty, and property in those States have been put in jeopardy, and the spirit of rebellion, though dormant, is as strong as during the war, all because this spirit has in him an advocate. Shielded and protected and powerful because he happens to hold the presidential office, he has tried in various ways to secure the Army to sustain him; and foiled in every way, under the forms of law he now seeks to wrest it by force, thereby seeking to place the War Department and the Army under the control of a weak, irresolute old man who will do his bidding. In the meantime every material interest of the country is suffering because this man persists in retaining in office men who are utterly unworthy of place. The country wants peace, and peace it cannot have while this criminal remains in office. If we allow this last act or acts of usurpation to pass without applying the peaceful constitutional remedy we may naturally expect that these usurpations will continue, until republican government itself will be destroyed, and upon its ruins a dictatorship established in the interest of the worst enemies of liberty and law.

Impeachment.

SPEECH OF HON. W. LOUGHRIDGE, OF IOWA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 22, 1868,

On the resolutions reported by the Committee on Reconstruction for the impeachment of the President.

MR. LOUGHRIDGE. Mr. Speaker, I approach this question with a full realization of its importance. I feel myself, and I have no doubt but that every member of this House feels, deeply impressed with the stern and solemn responsibility now thrown upon them. But, sir, I should be unworthy of the high and honorable position which I hold, as the Representative upon this floor of two hundred thousand American citizens, did I for a single moment hesitate to meet the issue thus presented fearlessly and firmly, and with a full determination to follow the path of duty regardless of all consequences to myself personally.

Sir, I shall vote for the resolution now before the House, declaring that Andrew Johnson, the President of the United States, should be impeached for high crimes and misdemeanors; and I do it with full knowledge of the importance of the act and of the responsibility which I take upon myself in so doing. A few weeks since I voted with fifty-six other members of this House for a resolution of impeachment, in the same words as this, reported to the House by the Judiciary Committee. That resolution failed to pass. We were on that occasion by the previous question deprived of the opportunity of giving the reasons impelling us to vote for that resolution, and I am on that account the more gratified to have the opportunity now to state fully my reasons, not only for the vote I propose to give now, but also for my vote upon the former resolution. The failure of that previous resolution of impeachment was occasioned by a desire on the part of those Republicans who opposed it to avoid if possible the necessity of the resort to so violent a remedy, the fear of its effect upon the business of the country, and the fact that the resort to it would necessarily impede for an indefinite length of time the general legislation of the country. And out of a fond hope that the acting President would for the sake of the peace of our common country, so long suffering from the effects of the cruel conspiracy against its existence, cease from his causeless and insane contest with the legislative power of the country, and his wicked efforts to render futile the will and wish of the loyal people of the land as declared and made known time and again, through the ballot-box, by their Representatives in Congress.

But, sir, those hopes have proved to be delusive, and have by the subsequent acts of the President been rudely dashed to the earth.

HO. OF REPS.

Impeachment.—Mr. Loughridge.

40TH CONG....2D SESS.

The forbearance of the people's Representatives upon this floor and their hesitation to resort to the summary remedy of impeachment have been construed by the President as showing fear on the part of the House and a lack of courage to assert the dignity and the prerogatives of Congress; and such forbearance has been met with insult and defiance and by new and more direct assaults upon the rights and the jurisdiction of the legislative department of the Government and new violations of the Constitution and the laws of the country, until it is now demonstrated to the satisfaction of all honest and impartial men that there is no resort left to this House but to exercise the constitutional power of impeachment.

In giving the vote I do in favor of the impeachment of the President I do not confine myself to any one single transaction or violation of law, of which there has been on his part so many. From the time when he issued his first proclamation to organize and set up civil government in North Carolina, without the authority or sanction of Congress, down to the open, direct, and flagrant disregard and violation of the Constitution and of the statutes of the land in the attempted removal of the present Secretary of War and the appointment of another, his whole course has been one of continued usurpations of power and violation of his oath of office.

Refusing to convene Congress at the surrender of the rebel armies, as he could and should have done, he proceeded, without authority of law, in his own way and manner and upon his own responsibility, to organize governments for the conquered States and to appoint officers for the same. He appointed and commissioned governors for such States, prescribed to them their authority and powers, fixed their salaries, and paid them out of the moneys of the United States. He authorized such governors so appointed to establish the "rules and regulations" by which the people of those States were to be bound in convening constitutional conventions and in forming State governments; he prescribed the qualifications of voters in the elections in such States, in organizing State governments, denying the right of voting absolutely to fourteen different classes of white persons who had before been citizens and voters in such States, and denying to nearly one half the entire population of such States any civil rights whatever or any voice in the formation of the State governments, and that portion constituting four fifths of all the people of said States who had remained loyal to the Government, and thousands of whom had fought nobly in the ranks of the Federal Army during the rebellion; he dictated to the conventions assembled, by virtue of his said action, certain provisions which he required them to incorporate into their State constitutions, the acceptance of which he made a condition precedent to their readmission to their forfeited places in the Union, and in all matters connected with such reorganization acted the part of supreme dictator, as much so as if there were no other department in the Government, and under such dictation and control pretended State governments were formed in said States and members of Congress elected therein, all this before the meeting of Congress; and these governments of his own dictation and creation the President pronounced legal and valid; and when Congress for the first time after the termination of the war assembled in December, 1865, he coolly informed it that the rebel States were fully reorganized, and that all that remained for Congress to do was to judge each House for itself of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members.

Now, sir, in all this I deny absolutely the authority or right of the President to exercise any such powers, and I defy any of his apologists to place their finger upon the section of the Constitution granting to the President any such power. It was the clearest usurpation of powers belonging solely and entirely to the people of the United States represented in Congress. If at the close of the war those States had legal State governments existing then the President usurped powers in overthrowing them and instituting those of his own creation. And if, on the other hand, they had no legal governments, his acts were equally unauthorized by the Constitution and a usurpation of powers which belonged to the legislative power of the United States vested in Congress. If these governments so instituted had been intended by the President as temporary, and simply to exist until Congress should meet and then to be submitted to the supervision and will of Congress, there would have been no objection taken to the illegality of his action; and I have no doubt but at that time it was the general understanding that such action was but temporary in its character, and that the President did not intend thereby to deny the final right of Congress in the premises to supervise and set aside or ratify, as it might see fit, all that was done by him.

I find in the testimony of Edwin M. Stanton, then Secretary of War, taken by the Judiciary Committee, the following statement by him upon this point. Referring to the North Carolina proclamation, he says:

"I supposed then, and still suppose, that the final validity of such State organizations would rest with the law-making power of the Government."

And General Grant, in his testimony before the Judiciary Committee, speaking of the North Carolina proclamation, says:

"I looked upon it as a temporary measure, to establish a sort of a government until Congress should meet and settle the whole question."

"I conversed with the President very frequently. I do not suppose that there were any persons engaged in that consultation who thought of what was being done at that time as being lasting—any longer than until Congress could meet and either ratify that or establish some other form of government. I know it never crossed my mind that what was being done was anything more than temporary."

Indeed, the President at the time of organizing those provisional governments did not claim that such governments would be permanent or independent of Congress. On the 24th of July, 1865, he sent to the Governor of Mississippi the following telegram:

WASHINGTON, July 24, 1865.

W. L. SHARKEY, Provisional Governor of Mississippi: Your telegram of the 21st has been received. The President sees no reason to interfere with General Slocum's proceedings. The government of the State will be provisional only, until the civil authorities shall be restored with the approval of Congress. Meanwhile military authority cannot be withdrawn.

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

And Mr. Seward testifies that this was sent with the approval of the President.

It thus seems to have been the understanding of all parties at the time that whatever was done was temporary in its character and would depend for its validity upon the ratification of Congress, and if not ratified by Congress as a sequence would be void. And this statement of the case shows the injustice and falsity of the claim that the President's entire Cabinet and General Grant were in favor of the President's policy. They were in favor of it as it was then understood. They assented to it as a temporary expedient, subject to the controlling and supervising power of Congress, and not otherwise.

This is very different from the President's policy as subsequently defined and insisted upon by him. He says subsequently to Congress: these States are organized and now have valid governments and are fully restored to their places in the Union; all that I have done is valid and permanent, and all that you have to do or say in the matter, gentlemen of the Senate and of the House, is whether those members who are claiming their seats in Congress from those States have been duly elected and are properly qualified; and if they are regularly elected and properly qualified you have no right to exclude them.

This, sir, was the President's subsequent policy; very different, indeed, from what was the understanding at the time he originated it. Then it was temporary, and subject to the revision of Congress to ratify or reject it. Now it is absolute and final, and Congress has no authority to question it. When Congress adjourned in March, 1864, these rebel States were members of the southern confederacy, and their people in arms against the Government of the United States, shooting down our citizens upon the battle-field and starving them to death in prisons. On the first day of the next session ex-members of the rebel Congress and rebel generals and colonels, fresh from the battle-fields of the South, their hands scarcely yet dry of the blood of our slaughtered countrymen, are standing at the doors of this Capitol with commissions in their hands, demanding their seats as Senators and Representatives from southern States reconstructed by Andrew Johnson and fully restored to all their rights, and the President demands their admission as a matter of right. This, sir, was the President's policy as unfolded to the nation and all disguise thrown off.

And here, sir, arose the controversy between Andrew Johnson and Congress. Congress, as the supreme legislative power of the Government, made such by the Constitution of the Republic, claimed the right, and the exclusive right, to say at what point of time the rebel States, which had voluntarily severed their relation to the Union and had been out of it for five years fighting to destroy it, should be restored to their forfeited rights. After four years of bloody war the nation had finally succeeded in conquering their armies and wrenching their arms from their hands; they submitted to superior force; they were disarmed and conquered enemies, and ceased to fight only because they were overpowered. And Congress claimed, as the representative of the people, to determine whether such disarmed rebel enemies were really subdued, and, if so, to prescribe such terms as should be considered necessary for the security of the nation before admitting such conquered rebels to full power in the Government, and, claiming this right, refused admission to the claimants for seats from such States, elected under such governments so organized by the President.

This, sir, constituted the great sin of which Congress has been guilty; this the great usurpation of which the President has complained. Instead of submitting to the expressed will of Congress, thus clearly declared and made known, and endeavoring in good faith faithfully to carry out their wishes and faithfully execute the laws, the President determined to insist upon and enforce upon the country and force upon Congress his own policy and plan, and to maintain the legality of the governments instituted by him in the rebel States. And, carrying out this determination, shortly after the meeting of Congress, he vetoed the civil rights bill, and gave as one of his reasons therefor that the States lately in rebellion were not represented in Congress, and that by the Constitution all the States had the right to representation, thus declaring to Congress that they were an unorganized and fragmentary body, and could do no legal legislation until they admitted the members from the rebel States.

From that time down to the present the President has continued, persistently continued, his contest with Congress, insisting upon the validity of the State governments as organized by his authority, and their right to immediate and unconditional representation in Congress, and denying to the loyal people of the land, through their Representatives in Congress, the right to any voice whatever as to the terms upon which rebels should be readmitted to full rights and powers in the Government they had been four years trying to destroy, and saying to the loyal people, who had sacrificed two hundred and fifty thousand lives of the noblest and best of the land and spent $3,000,000,000 of treasure to subdue and disarm the rebels, "You have no right for one moment to deny admission to those rebels to the Halls of legislation, to your Senate, to your House of Representatives. Open the doors: Admit them to their seats within the sacred precincts of the halls of legislation, there to vote against all pensions to your wounded and invalid soldiers and your widows and orphans of those who have fallen for their country; there to vote in favor of the payment of the rebel debt, and there to unite with their friends of the North in all measures to crush out loyalty and reward and honor treason and traitors."

To this Congress did not deem it proper to assent, and reasserted, time and time again, its prerogatives and its rights.

In February, 1866, Congress passed, by a very large majority, the following resolution:

"Resolved, That in order to close agitation upon a question which seems likely to disturb the action of the Government, as well as to quiet the uncertainty which is agitating the minds of the people of the eleven States which have been declared to be in insurrection, no Senator or Representative shall be admitted into either branch of Congress from any of said States until Congress shall have declared such State entitled to representation."

Abraham Lincoln, the Chief Executive of the United States, elected by the people for this present term, distinctly recognized the right of Congress to decide upon this question. In a speech he made after the fall of Richmond, the last speech of his life, made but four days before his death, he used the following language, and I commend it to those who claim that Andrew Johnson is carrying out the plan of Mr. Lincoln:

"I distinctly protest that the Executive claims no right to say when or whether members should be admitted to seats in Congress from such States."

At that time the President and Congress were in perfect accord as to the power and jurisdiction of Congress over the admission to Congress of the rebel States. Mr. Lincoln freely acknowledged and accorded the power of Congress over the subject. And in the exercise of that power and as preliminary to the admission of such States, Congress, in January, 1866, proposed to the States for adoption certain amendments to the Constitution of the United States, which were in the judgment of Congress considered necessary for the future security and peace of the country and the rights of all the people.

Those amendments thus proposed provided:

First. For the full protection of all citizens, native and naturalized.

Second. For equality of representation among all the States of the Union and doing away with the unjust advantage in that respect that the southern States have always enjoyed.

Third. Prohibiting men who had once taken an oath to support the Constitution of the United States and held office, and afterward went into the rebellion, and thus committed the double crime of perjury and treason, from holding office.

Fourth. For the validity of the public debt and for the security of the payment of pensions to soldiers and their widows and orphans, and prohibiting the payment of the rebel debt.

These amendments were submitted to the States for ratification, and it was the well understood policy of Congress that upon the adoption of these amendments as part of the Constitution the rebel States should be readmitted to full participation in the Government. The President at once set about opposing the adoption of those amendments by the rebel States and used all the power and patronage of his office to prevent their ratification, and through his influence they were rejected by all the rebel States.

In the general election of 1866 for members of Congress this whole question was submitted to the people at the ballot-box, and the people by overwhelming majorities decided in favor of the policy of Congress and against that of the President, and the members of the present House of Representatives were elected.

But, sir, strange, unaccountably strange to say, this decisive verdict of the people, spoken through the ballot-box and thundered in his ears, had no effect to change the course of the President. He has ever since blindly and obstinately continued his course of opposition to Congress.

After the election of 1866 the rebel States, having through the advice of the President rejected the proposed amendments Congress passed, what is known as the reconstruction acts, authorizing and empowering the people of the rebel States to call conventions and frame constitutions republican in form and to then apply for admission to Congress—this act was vetoed by the President, and was passed over the veto and became law.

It then by the Constitution became and was the duty of the President to "take care" that the law so enacted was "faithfully executed;" this was his sworn duty. Has he performed that duty? No, sir; on the contrary, while he executed it in form and under protest by appointing the officers required by its terms for the purpose of its execution, yet he has in every possible manner thrown obstacles in the way of the faithful execution of the law by the officers having its execution in charge.

He removed from the commands to which they had been appointed under the law the brave, gallant, and true soldiers, Sheridan, Sickles, and Pope, for no other reason than that they were endeavoring to carry out the law in good faith according to the spirit and purpose thereof. He continually and persistently denounced the law as unconstitutional, taking advantage of every opportunity for that purpose in his official communications to Congress, in his remarks to committees who from time to time waited upon him, and in his speeches to promiscuous crowds in the streets, and from the balconies of hotels as he journeyed around the country, with the apparent object of arousing in the minds of the people an antipathy against Congress. He has used all the patronage of his office, all his influence, public and private, to prevent the people of the rebel States from accepting the terms proposed by Congress and organizing under the law. And I have no hesitation in asserting that but for his influence against it all of the rebel States would have accepted the terms proposed by Congress, and would to-day have been fully restored and represented in the Senate and House of Representatives.

And now, sir, I come to the last and crowning act of infamy in the inglorious career of this unfaithful public servant. On the 21st of the present month, Edwin M. Stanton was, as he still is, Secretary of War, and in possession of the office and its records and papers. He had filled that position and performed its arduous duties during the greater part of the war against the rebellion; he had endeared himself to the country by the laborious and faithful discharge of the duties of the office during the dark days of the struggle for national existence, and I say, sir, what no candid man will deny, that no man in this country has done more hard labor for the Government, no man in civil life has contributed more to its success, than Edwin M. Stanton as Secretary of War. A true, faithful, and tried patriot and a public officer of distinguished ability, the feeling of the nation was that he was the right man in the right place; and yet on account of his refusal to join with the President in his opposition to the policy and laws of Congress he incurred the displeasure of that officer. And on the 12th of August last he was suspended and General Grant appointed Secretary of War ad interim; and on the meeting of Congress the President sent in to the Senate his reasons for such suspension. The Senate refused to concur in such removal, and General Grant at once surrendered the office to Mr. Stanton. Having thus failed to obtain the consent of the Senate to the removal of Mr. Stanton, the President determined to remove him upon his own responsibility, the Constitution and laws to the contrary notwithstanding. And in pursuance of such determination, on the 21st instant, he sent the Secretary a written communication in the following words:

EXECUTIVE MANSION,

WASHINGTON, February 21, 1868.

SIR: By virtue of the power and authority vested in me as President, by the Constitution and laws of the United States, you are hereby removed from office as Secretary of War, and your functions as such will terminate upon the receipt of this communication.

You will transfer to Brevet Major General Lorenzo Thomas, Adjutant General of the Army, who has this day been authorized and empowered to act as Secretary of War ad interim, all records, books, papers, and other public property now in your custody or charge. Respectfully yours, ANDREW JOHNSON.

Hon. EDWIN M. STANTON.

On the same day the President sent to the Senate, then in session, a communication informing the Senate that he had removed Mr. Stanton and appointed General Thomas Secretary of War ad interim. The Senate immediately adopted the following resolution:

"Resolved by the Senate of the United States, That under the Constitution and laws of the United States, the President has no power to remove the Secretary of War and designate any other officer to perform the duties of that officer."

Copies of this resolution were immediately sent to the President and General Thomas; and yet, after this action of the Senate, and after he had been officially informed thereof, the President directed the said Thomas to enter upon the discharge of the duties of the office and to take possession of the books and papers of the War Department, and by virtue of such direction Thomas formally made demand of the same which was rightfully refused by Mr. Stanton. And there is no doubt but that for two days after said appointment the President meditated taking forcible possession of the War Office by the aid of the military. And it will, in my opinion, be shown hereafter that he attempted to control a portion of the military for that purpose, but failed to find any officers who would lend themselves to his revolutionary purposes.

Now, sir, here is an open, direct, and palpable violation both of the Constitution and of the statutes of the country. What are the provisions of the Constitution in relation to the power of the President to remove officers? All we find in the Constitution is in section five, article two, as follows:

"The President shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate shall appoint, ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law; but Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of Departments. The President shall have power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session."

Then, sir, it is plain that by the Constitution the President has no power to remove an officer when the Senate is in session, the appointment of which officer requires the consent of the Senate. He has no more power to remove the Secretary of War while the Senate is in session than he has the Speaker of this House or the President of the Senate. And yet, right in the face of the Constitution, of which he has prated so much in his demagogic harangues, and of which he claims to be the special defender, he has attempted to remove absolutely the Secretary of War and put another in his place when the Senate was in session and without the knowledge or consent of that body; and after the Senate notified him of the illegality of the act he still insisted upon carrying it out, and ordered his new appointee to take possession of the office. In this transaction he not only violated the Constitution, which is the highest law of the land, but he violated the plain provisions of the statute law. The act of March, 1867, regulating the tenure of civil offices, provides as follows:

"That every person holding any civil office to which he has been appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and every person who shall hereafter be appointed to any such office, and become duly qualified to act therein, is, and shall be, entitled to hold such offices until a successor shall have been in like manner duly appointed and qualified, except as hereinafter provided: Provided, That the Secretaries of War, Treasury, Navy, Interior, and Postmaster General shall hold their offices for and during the term of the President by whom they may have been appointed, and for one month thereafter, subject to removal by and with the advice and consent of the Senate."

By this act the term of office of Secretary Stanton does not terminate until April 4, 1869, and he cannot be removed until that time without the consent of the Senate. The President, then, in this matter, has clearly disregarded the provisions of this law and trampled it under foot.

Sir, I need say no more. Surely the cup of this man's iniquity is full and running over. The people of this country have demanded his removal long since, and they will brook no longer delay. The nation must be freed from the great incumbrance upon its happiness, its peace, its prosperity; and when that is done, and an honest man placed at the helm, and not till then, the nation will breathe free and settle down into tranquillity and peace. Gentlemen upon the other side talk very flippantly of resistance, bloodshed, and civil war. Sir, how can it cause bloodshed and civil war for Congress to exercise, according to the forms of law, a power given it by the laws, a duty devolved upon it by the Constitution? If any parties see fit to resist this constitutional proceeding and its legitimate results upon their heads be the consequences. I apprehend no danger. The conspirators against this Government and the enemies of its peace have had enough of war; they desire no more. If they should, all they will have to do will be to raise their arms once again against the lawful authorities of the Government, and I warn them here that if the sword is unsheathed once more in defense of the law and the Government it will not be returned to its scabbard until its work is fully completed and the disturbers of the public peace swept from the land.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Woodward,] in his speech to-day, claimed that this Congress had no power to impeach the President for the reason that it is an illegal body and is not the Congress of the United States, because the rebel States are excluded from representation. Sir, by what right does that gentleman occupy a seat upon this floor and draw from the Treasury of the United States $5,000 per annum for his services here if his position is correct? If he is right in this, then he is guilty not only of an inconsistency, but of a crime, in occupying a seat in this House, and by his presence and participation in its proceedings giving countenance and aid to a band of usurpers. If his doctrine is correct he is himself a usurper, acting as a member of an illegal body, which is day after day enacting important laws and voting away millions of dollars of the nation's money.

The gentleman is one of those who believe that the rebels forfeited no rights by their rebellion. But, sir, this is not a new doctrine; we have heard it often from that party here and elsewhere.

The only difference between that gentleman and myself is, that he thinks that by the rebellion they forfeited no rights, while I think that by the rebellion and their cruel war against the Government they forfeited all their rights, and when they surrendered were at the mercy of the Government. That gentleman, at the conclusion of his remarks, used the following language:

"If I were the President's counselor, which I am not, I would advise him, if you prefer articles of impeachment, to demur both to your jurisdiction and that of the Senate, and to issue a proclamation giving you and all the world notice that, while he held himself impeachable for misdemeanors in office before the constitutional tribunal, he never would subject the office he holds in trust for the people to the irregular, unconstitutional, fragmentary bodies who propose to strip him of it. Such a proclamation, with the Army and Navy in hand to sustain it, would meet a popular response that would make an end of impeachment and impeachers."

Sir, I am grieved and astounded that such sentiments should fall from the lips of that gentleman. Had the remarks been made by some fiery young orator in the heat of passion and the excitement of debate, without thought or reflection, there might have been in such case some show of palliation, but when made by a gentleman of age and experience, one to whom the people would naturally look for sound and sage advice, made with careful and grave deliberation, it is absolutely without the least shadow of excuse or palliation. Sir, this is but a specimen of the dangerous element with which the Republican party has had to contend in the North while prosecuting the war against the rebels in the South and struggling to save the Republic, the same element which at Chicago in 1864 declared the war against the rebellion a failure and demanded that it should cease; the same element which opposed the war at every step of its progress, and after the rebellion is suppressed and the nation saved they now come here upon this floor and openly advise the renewal of civil war and armed resistance to the constitutional authorities of the Government. Sir, the leaders of the Democratic party should beware that their feelings of sympathy with the traitors of the South do not lead them too far in that direction. They should remember that—

"Vice is a monster of so frightful mien,
As to be hated needs but to be seen,
Yet seen too oft, familiar with her face,
We first endure, then pity, then embrace."

The gentleman says, "with the Army and Navy in hand" "an end would be made of impeachment and impeachers." I suppose, sir, by this he means to be understood that at the head of the Army he would take possession of this Capitol, disperse this illegal Congress, and consign the people's Representatives here who advocate impeachment to the dungeon or the scaffold. This, sir, is the plain construction of his language; and I suppose, sir, that we may prepare for our fate. There is but one hope, and that is, that the Army may not be "in hand," as the gentleman terms it, to carry out this wicked programme thus marked out for Mr. Johnson by his venerable adviser from Pennsylvania.

Sir, the country will take notice of this last manifestation of the spirit of the leaders of the Democratic party, as made honestly, I suppose, but certainly rather imprudently, upon this floor, and made part of the records of the country.

I am glad of the frankness and candor of the gentleman, for to be forewarned is to be forearmed. But I would advise the gentleman from Pennsylvania that before the plot he advises is entered upon by the President, he be very sure that the Army is "in hand," for if that important auxiliary should happen to be out of hand it might prove an unfortunate undertaking for the President; and as to the Navy I imagine that it will not figure very largely in the conflict, for it will be entirely a land affair.

But, sir, this talk of forcible resistance to the lawful authorities of this Government, while it shows the corruption of the men who use it, is really deserving only of silent contempt. Resistance to the constitutional action of Congress! Let them try it. A million of true and tried veterans have but just laid aside their arms; the men who carried the starry flag of freedom in triumph over hundreds of battle-fields—

"Where the cannon mounthung loud,
Heavy in wide wreaths the battle shroud,
And gory sabers rise and fall
Like sheets of flame in midnight pall;"

and under the lead of Grant and Sherman and Thomas and Sheridan routed and destroyed the proud armies of the rebellion. And, sir, these men would quickly—

"With the stern joy that warriors feel," at the call of their loved and honored chiefs, fly once more to the rescue; and if they should be called upon again to suppress a rebellion on the part of rebels and rebel sympathizers, woe be to all who should oppose them. But, sir, I apprehend no danger of this kind, no danger of bloodshed, no danger of civil war. Let this House go on and fearlessly perform the duty imposed upon it by the Constitution, and for high crimes and misdemeanors committed by him impeach Andrew Johnson, and present articles of impeachment before the bar of the Senate of the United States, the high court of impeachment. Let him there be tried, and, if found guilty, from that judgment there is no appeal; he will be removed from the office he has so long disgraced, the majesty of the law will be vindicated; treason and insubordination rebuked, and the people will be satisfied.

Sir, I trust that this is the last struggle in the long continued contest between the loyal people of this land and those who have been endeavoring to subvert and destroy the Government, and that the result of this proceeding will put an end to the efforts so persistently made to open the doors of these legislative Halls to unrepentant rebels, to place the Government in the power of its enemies, and rob the loyal people of the land of the fruits of their toils, their sacrifices, and their victories. For myself, sir, I shall follow the path of duty. I see plainly open before me, and shall give my vote for the removal of this unfaithful public officer. And, speaking for my constituents, in their name I demand the impeachment of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, for his usurpations, his violations of the Constitution and the laws of the country, and his crimes against liberty and the rights of the people. And let it be thus demonstrated and fully understood that, in this mighty Republic, no one, however high his official position, is independent of the people or above their power; that men occupying official positions in this free Government, instead of being rulers of the people, are the people's servants, and that the will of the people is the law of the land.

Impeachment.

SPEECH OF HON. CHARLES HAIGHT,
OF NEW JERSEY,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

February 24, 1868.

The House having under consideration the resolution reported from the Committee on Reconstruction for the impeachment of the President—

Mr. ELDRIDGE yielded to

Mr. HAIGHT, who said:

Mr. SPEAKER: In the brief time allowed me by the courtesy and kindness of the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. ELDRIDGE,] for which I am grateful, I could not, if I would, enter into a very full discussion of the proposed action of this House in the impeachment of the President of the United States. Upon a question of such moment and importance to the people and the interest of the country, every Representative upon this floor should have the opportunity to express his opinions, and should be allowed a sufficient time to examine into and discuss the proposition that has been submitted for consideration; because, sir, the impeachment of the highest officer of the Government is a solemn act, and one that will leave its impress upon the nation long after the scenes and excitement of this hour have passed away. I know, Mr. Speaker, that I would do violence to the feelings and sentiments of the conservative constituency I have the honor to represent, if I did not rise from my seat upon this grave occasion and protest in their name against this revolutionary act.

Mr. Speaker, the report and resolution presented by the Committee on Reconstruction on Saturday afternoon to this House had the effect not only to startle many of the members, but the people throughout the length and breadth of the land have been aroused to the most intense excitement and alarm, by the sudden and precipitate action of the committee in reviving a subject that every one supposed had been forever consigned to the tomb of the Capulets. This is the third attempt at impeachment, and from the evidence around us no one doubts but that this time it will prove successful. Why, sir, if we are permitted to judge from the declarations and acts of gentlemen on the other side of this House, in whom rests the power, it is already a fixed determination. Argument must and will fail to have any effect. The President of the United States will be impeached and as soon as possible arraigned at the bar of the Senate upon charges of high crimes and misdemeanors. Heretofore party passion, party prejudice, and party hatred has been stayed in its mad and revolutionary attempts to strike down the Chief Executive, and through him one of the coordinate branches of the Government. The time necessary to take testimony upon which charges could be predicated, and the reflection of the more moderate in council among those on the other side, and the potent voice of the people, has prevented its consummation. The undue haste that characterizes the present movement is the result of the failure to impeach the President on former occasions; but those who possess the power are determined that it shall not fail this time, for it is through impeachment that the majority hope to perpetuate their power, even if it should imperil the institutions of the country and destroy the liberties of the people. The object now so sure of accomplishment might be defeated by delay and careful deliberation.

Mr. Speaker, I confess never to have been a particular admirer of Andrew Johnson. He is not the President of my choice, or those with whom it is my pleasure to act. Yet I have never doubted his loyalty and patriotism, or his desire to advance the best interest of the country. He is the President of the other side, but we give him credit for the three years that he has stood as a barrier against which the surging tide of fanaticism has beat with impotent malice. It is the presidential office and not the President that we are defending from the attacks of radicalism.

The unlimited and searching investigation into the conduct and administration of the President by the Judiciary Committee, and the subsequent action of this House upon the evidence submitted to it by that committee, is conclusive that previous to the removal of Edwin M. Stanton from the War Department the President had not been guilty of anything upon which an impeachment could be based. It is known to this House and the country that every effort was made, and means of the most doubtful character, to say the least, resorted to, by those who were determined on his removal, to effect the result. It is fortunate for the ends of justice and the truth of history that the proposition now submitted is divested of all extraneous matters, and the question to be decided is simply whether the President, in the removal of Mr. Stanton, has violated the Constitution and committed an offense for which he is liable to be impeached and removed from office by the Congress of the United States.

I am persuaded that the verdict of the people and of history will be pronounced against the impeachers and in favor of the impeached. The attempt to disguise this proceeding will be ineffectual; the President has dared to oppose the unconstitutional acts and usurpations of Congress, and in warning the people of the dangers that threatened them has incurred the hatred and animosity of the gentlemen on the other side, and, in order to remove an obstacle to their aggressive policy they seek to depose the President for the advancement of party purposes. The President in removing Mr. Stanton has only done what has been done by his predecessors from the formation of the Government down to the time of Mr. Lincoln. The right of removal by the President was settled at an early period in the history of the country. As early as 1789, when the question was before Congress, Mr. Madison said:

"That the power of removal was a power that belonged, under the Constitution, exclusively to the President and could not be interfered with, regulated, or controlled by the legislative department."

The decision upon this question by the First Congress has always been acquiesced in.

Judge Story and Chancellor Kent, in their Commentaries on the Constitution, have declared that the power to appoint and remove executive officers holding at pleasure is vested under the Constitution in the President. Chancellor Kent says:

"The President is the great responsible officer for the faithful execution of the law, and the power of removal was incidental to that duty, and might often be requisite to fulfill it."

Judge Story, in referring to this question, says:

"After a most animated discussion the vote finally taken in the House of Representatives was affirmative of the power of removal in the President, without any cooperation of the Senate, by the vote of 34 members against 20."

And further on he says:

"The public have acquiesced in this decision."

The decisions of the courts have been in the same direction. In order to secure the proper execution of the laws the framers of the Constitution made the right of removal an incident of the executive power. "He shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed."

How can the President have the laws faithfully executed unless aided by a Cabinet who entertain general views in accord with his? The President must have power over those who execute the laws; it inheres in him by virtue of his office. There must also be unity of purpose and action between the President and his Cabinet ministers, for the discharge of the responsible duties imposed upon the Executive by the Constitution. The power of the President over the various officers of his appointment has long been conceded. The Republican party, through its Senators, during the administration of Mr. Lincoln in 1864, held it to be the duty of a Cabinet minister to resign whenever he disagreed in political principle and general policy with the President; but not only that, they went further and declared it to be the right and duty of the President to make changes in his Cabinet, when there existed a difference between them in political sentiment. To substantiate this assertion I need only to call the attention of this House to a paper drawn up and signed by Senators, including many who now occupy seats in the other end of the Capitol, as indicating their views and opinions at that time upon the question of removal of a Cabinet officer.

In 1864 Montgomery Blair was a member of Mr. Lincoln's Cabinet, holding the position of Postmaster General. It became known that Mr. Blair differed from the President on political subjects connected with the Administration, whereupon the Radical Senators, nearly all of them being still in the Senate, caused to be drawn up and signed and presented to the President the following paper:

"The theory of our Government, the early and uniform practical construction thereof, is that the President should be aided by a Cabinet council agreeing with him in political principle and general policy, and that all important measures and appointments should be the result of their combined wisdom and deliberation. The most obvious and necessary condition of things, without which no Administration can succeed, we and the public believe does not exist, and therefore such selections and changes in its members should be made as will secure to the country unity of purpose and action in all material and essential respects, more especially in the present crisis of public affairs.

"The Cabinet should be exclusively composed of statesmen who are the cordial, resolute, unwavering supporters of the principles and purposes above mentioned."

Many of the Senators who signed that paper now vote to keep a Cabinet officer in office against the President's will.

But is claimed that under the first section of the act to regulate the tenure of certain civil offices, passed March 2, 1867, the right to remove the Secretary of War was taken from the President. The section reads as follows:

"That every person holding any civil office to which he has been appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and every person who shall hereafter be appointed to any such office and shall become duly qualified to act therein, is, and shall be entitled to hold such office until a successor shall have been in like manner appointed and duly qualified, except as herein otherwise provided: Provided, That the Secretaries of State, of the Treasury, of War, of the Navy, and of the Interior, the Postmaster General, and the Attorney General, shall hold their offices respectively for and during the term of the President by whom they may have been appointed, and for one month thereafter, subject to removal by and with the advice and consent of the Senate."

By this section of the tenure-of-office bill it is provided that the Cabinet officers "shall hold their offices respectively for and during the term of the President by whom they may have been appointed, and for one month thereafter." It is very evident that the foregoing section of the bill does not prevent the President from removing the Secretary of War, because Mr. Stanton was not appointed by President Johnson and never held any commission under him. He was appointed and commissioned by Mr. Lincoln during his first administration on the 15th of January, 1862. The only commission Mr. Stanton ever held as Secretary of War is the following, and it is important in view of the proposed action of this House and the course Mr. Stanton has pursued:

ABRAHAM LINCOLN, President of the United States.
To all who may see these presents, greeting:

Know you, that reposing special trust and confidence in the patriotism, integrity, and ability of Edwin M. Stanton, I have named, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and appoint him to be Secretary of War for the United States, and do authorize and empower him to execute and fulfill the duties of that office according to law, and to have and to hold the said office, and all the powers, privileges, and emoluments to the same of right appertaining unto him, he said Edwin M. Stanton, and during the pleasure of the President of the United States for the time being.

In testimony whereof I have executed these letters to be made patent and the seal of the United States to be hereunto affixed. Given under my hand at the city of Washington, the 15th day of January, in the year of our Lord, 1862, and of the Independence of the United States of America, the eighty-sixth.

By the President:

WM. H. SEWARD, Secretary of State.

It is only necessary for me to direct attention to the language of this commission. Edwin M. Stanton is appointed Secretary of War to hold "during the pleasure of the President of the United States for the time being."

The construction placed upon the tenure-of-office bill by the President is in accordance with the declarations of distinguished Senators who helped to frame the law, made in the Senate when it was under consideration. It was expressly stated that in the passage of the bill it was not the intention or purpose, and the law itself did not prevent the present President from removing the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Secretary of State. I know of no better rule to be relied upon in the construction of a law than the expressed intention of the legislators in making it. And we are not left in doubt upon the right of the President to remove the Secretary of War under this tenure-of-office bill, if we go to the record. When the bill was pending before the Senate, Mr. DOOLITTLE said:

"I suppose it is aimed at the present head of the executive department, to bind him to keep certain members of his Cabinet, for it was openly avowed in the discussion of this bill when it was up before, that it would be intolerable to allow the present Executive Magistrate to have the power of removal over certain members of the Cabinet mentioned by name. Now, this project does not reach those members at all. The terms of this provision are:

"That the Secretaries of State, of the Treasury, of War, of the Navy, and of the Interior, the Postmaster General, and the Attorney General, shall hold their offices respectively for and during the term of the President by whom they may have been appointed; and for one month longer."

Now, let us look at the facts. The Secretary of War was appointed by Mr. Lincoln during his first term; he never has been appointed since; he has never received any appointment since. Mr. Lincoln gave him no appointment during his second term, but he held over. Mr. Johnson has given him no appointment, but he has held over. So of the Secretary of the Navy, and so of the Secretary of State. The Secretary of the Interior, to be sure, and the Postmaster General and the Attorney General have been appointed by Mr. Johnson since the presidential office devolved on him; and by the terms of this law the Secretary of the Interior, the Postmaster General, and the Attorney General must remain during Mr. Johnson's term; but the Secretary of State, the Secretary of War, and the Secretary of the Navy, according to the terms of this provision, may be removed by him to-morrow."

Again:

"I referred not to the committee of conference, but I referred to the debate on the original bill when it was pending, in which debate it was openly stated by some friends of this restriction on the President's power over the Secretaries that it was not to be tolerated that the present Chief Magistrate should have the power to remove the Secretary of War by name."

Mr. SHERMAN. Some Senator may have had that purpose.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I heard it in debate; I speak not of what may have been the views of individual Senators not expressed on the floor of the Senate. I allude to what was openly stated in debate.

Mr. SHERMAN. That the Senate had no such purpose is shown by its vote twice to make this exception. That this provision does not apply to the present case is shown by the fact that its language is so framed as not to apply to the present President. The Senator shows that himself, and argues truly that it would not prevent the present President from removing the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Secretary of State. And if I supposed that either of these gentlemen was so wanting in manhood, in honor, as to hold his place after the politest intimation by the President of the United States that his services were no longer needed, I certainly, as a Senator, would consent to his removal at any time, and so would we all."

But, Mr. Speaker, suppose the President did commit an error in the construction of the tenure act, which I deny, is that sufficient cause of impeachment for high crimes and misdemeanors? I think I cannot be mistaken as to what will be the verdict of the people upon this question. It is the merest pretext, seized upon to accomplish what is rendered necessary in the opinion of the majority of this House by party exigencies. Mr. Stanton is in charge of the War Department, the President requests him to resign, and, in the language of Senator Sherman, he is so wanting in manhood and honor, as to hold his place contrary to the wishes of the President. The President then attempts to remove him, as he had a right to under the Constitution and the laws. Mr. Stanton declines to surrender the War Department, and that brings the constitutional right of the President to remove Mr. Stanton before the courts—which is not desired by the gentlemen on the other side—for it is admitted that they often act outside of the Constitution, and in this we have the cause of the President's offending, and for which he is to be impeached for high crimes and misdemeanors.

Mr. Speaker, the tenure-of-office bill was a direct attempt on the part of the legislative branch of the Government to encroach upon a coordinate branch and absorb its powers. In the wise distribution of political power into three distinct and independent branches—the legislative, judiciary, and executive—each one possessing its proper and legitimate functions, consists the strength of the Government; and the attempt of the legislative department to appropriate to itself the powers that belong to the other departments is inconsistent with the principles that underlie our system, and if persisted in will result in its destruction. For two years Congress has been acting independent of the Executive, and has lately made war on the Supreme Court. The object of these innovations is to consolidate the powers of the coordinate branches of the Government wholly in the legislative. The Government that the gentlemen on the other side are preparing for the people of this country, is one in which the power to pass laws, decide their validity, and provide for their execution, shall be lodged in one department.

Mr. Speaker, I have been surprised, and the people of the country will be surprised, when the record of the last two days' proceedings in the American Congress are spread before them. When they are informed that at this moment the War Department is an intrenched camp, ready at any time to be used as the basis of civil war, they will realize the perils of the hour. When the bitter denunciations of partisans, sitting in the capacity of a grand inquest of the nation under the solemn obligations imposed upon them by the Constitution, are read, as they will be, by the people, these proceedings will appear in their true light, and be understood; but not, Mr. Speaker, as some gentlemen have said, for an officer, but for officers, and to perpetuate the power of a party. The President of the United States is to be impeached by a partisan House, and removed from office by a partisan Senate, who have already by their course prejudged the case. The President of the Senate, Mr. WADE, is to be placed in the executive chair, and the whole power and patronage of the Government thereby secured to the radical party. The policy thus determined upon is to be followed by the passage of an act by Congress conferring the right of suffrage upon the negroes in all the States against the expressed will of the people and in utter disregard of their rights. This is the programme adopted to secure a continuance of Radical power. Having unbounded confidence in the intelligence of the people we can well afford to abide their decision; from it we seek no appeal.

Impeachment.

SPEECH OF HON. J. A. NICHOLSON, OF DELAWARE,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 24, 1868,

On the resolution that Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, be impeached of high crimes and misdemeanors.

Mr. NICHOLSON. Mr. Speaker, the evident determination of the majority of the House to adopt this resolution fills me with dread and deep concern for the future of my country; and I am so overwhelmed with a sense of my inability to say aught that can for a moment arrest the headlong fury of this onslaught against the Chief Executive of the nation, that I am almost deprived of the power of opposition. But, sir, that the voice of my constituents may be heard at this solemn moment, and that I may not go down to history as silent when such a foul wrong as this is attempted, I must briefly protest against what I can consider neither more nor less than the climax of those revolutionary acts which have marked the existence of the Republican party ever since they came into power.

Having plunged the country into civil war of a magnitude unparalleled in modern history; created in four years a public debt exceeding in its enormous proportions the debt of Great Britain, which had been accumulating for a century, and which will burden with oppressive taxes this whole people down to the latest posterity; having desolated the fairest and most productive half of our common country, refused to restore it to such a position as would enable it to contribute its full share to lighten the burden of taxation, but rather hastened by unjust legislation to complete so much of the work of destruction as the war had left unfinished; having upturned society and reversed the former natural relation which existed between the races by causing the worth, virtue, intelligence and genius of the South to pass under the yoke, and grace the triumph of their former slaves, they now propose in the very wantonness of power, and as if to exhibit to the utmost their powers of destruction, to convulse the whole land throughout its length and breadth, and perhaps bring upon us again all the horrors of civil strife by impeaching the President of the United States.

I will briefly consider the cause and consequences of this strange, unexampled proceeding. The assumed violation of the tenure-of-office act seems to be the cause of this sudden outburst of fury. Those on the other side who take to themselves credit for having heretofore voted against impeachment acknowledge as much. The long list of high crimes and misdemeanors enumerated in the report of the Judiciary Committee furnished no just ground of accusation against the President to their conservative minds. But let him no sooner exert the executive power vested in him by the Constitution in the attempt to relieve himself of the hated presence of an obnoxious Secretary who no longer possesses his confidence, and from whom he can no longer receive advice, than at once the scales fall from the eyes of these conservative gentlemen and they behold a dreadful crime and misdemeanor. The images of Cæsar, Napoleon, Charles I., James II, and other horrid tyrants start up before their affrighted vision. With what virtuous indignation do they declare that "forbearance has ceased to be a virtue." And their sudden yearning for peace is such that to obtain it they are also ready to join in the cry "off with his head!"

The unanimity of opinion thus far expressed is most astonishing. There seems to be no doubt, no hesitation whatever. The offense of the President appears to be regarded as so plain and palpable a violation of the Constitution and laws that gentlemen declared that, however reluctant they may be, they are irresistibly brought to the conclusion that the safety of the country demands his instant impeachment and removal from office.

Now, sir, assuming that gentlemen are only desirous that the Constitution and laws should be vindicated, I am unable to perceive any just correspondence between the cause as stated and the effect. And I feel very confident that upon calm reflection and "sober, second thought" they will discover that they have in hot haste placed themselves in a position which they cannot maintain, and taken a step which they cannot justify before the world. My only solution of the problem presented is that in a moment of irritation consequent upon the act of the President in removing Mr. Stanton they have allowed themselves to be adroitly managed by their more Radical brethren, or else that they are animated by a purpose that lies deeper than the surface, and that the necessity of party success drives them to the adoption of measures which their better judgment abhors.

Is the removal of Mr. Stanton such a plain

40TH CONG....2D SESS.

Impeachment—Mr. Nicholson.

HO. OF REPS.

and palpable violation of the Constitution and laws made in pursuance thereof as to justify the impeachment of the President? Clearly not, if it shall appear that in this matter he has acted with a just conception of the executive power vested in him by the Constitution; or if the law, which was passed for the purpose of limiting and restraining that power, shall appear to be unconstitutional; or waiving that question, if a fair construction of the law would show that Mr. Stanton is not included within the provisions of the first section. Article two, section one, of the Constitution, reads:

"The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America."

"And he shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate shall appoint, ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, Judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law; but the Congress may, by law, vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of Departments."

The President's oath of office is—

"I do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will faithfully execute the office of President of the United States, and will, to the best of my ability, preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States."

Article six:

"This Constitution and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, &c., shall be the supreme law of the land."

Now, under the sanction of his oath, the President is undoubtedly authorized to exercise some discretion in the administration of the laws; and may rightly refuse to execute them if they shall not be made in pursuance of the Constitution, or if they shall plainly violate its provisions. Suppose you were to enact a law abolishing the mission to Spain and declare that no minister should be sent to that kingdom, it could have no influence upon the action of the Executive; for the Constitution authorizes him to nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate to appoint, ambassadors, other public ministers, &c. Suppose that in the exercise of this power he were to nominate such an officer to the Senate in the very teeth of the law prohibiting it, could you impeach him? Perhaps you might try it for what you would call an insult to your assumed superiority.

The extent of the executive power in making removals has been as well settled as any other power from 1789 down to the present time; and on this point I must necessarily, to some extent, repeat what has already been cited by others, as our authorities are the same:

"In the debate in the First Congress in 1789 upon the bill organizing the Department of State this very question was discussed; and the final vote seems to have expressed the sense of the Legislature, that the power of removal by the Executive could not be abridged by the Legislature, at least not in cases where the power to appoint was not subject to legislative delegation."—Story on Constitution, note to section 1537.

"After a most animated discussion the vote finally taken in the House of Representatives was affirmative of the power of removal in the President, without any coöperation of the Senate, by the vote of thirty-four members against twenty. In the Senate the clause in the bill affirming the power was carried by the casting vote of the Vice President."—Story on Constitution, section 1542.

During that debate Mr. Madison spoke as follows:

"The Constitution affirms that the executive power is vested in the President. Are there exceptions to this proposition? Yes, there are. The Constitution says that, in appointing to office, the Senate shall be associated with the President, unless in the case of inferior officers, when the law shall otherwise direct. Have we (that is, Congress) a right to extend this exception? I believe not. If the Constitution has invested all executive power in the President I venture to assert that the legislature has no right to diminish or modify his executive authority. The question now resolves itself into this: is the power of displacing an executive power? I conceive that if any power whatsoever is in the Executive it is the power of appointing, overseeing, and controlling those who execute the laws. If the Constitution had not qualified the power of the President in appointing to office by associating the Senate with him in that business, would it not be clear that he would have the right, by virtue of his executive power, to make such appointments? Should we be authorized, in defiance of that clause in the Constitution—"The executive power shall be vested in the President"—to unite the Senate with the President in the appointment to office? I conceive not. If it is admitted that we should not be authorized to do this, I think it may be disputed whether we have a right to associate them in removing persons from office, the one power being as much of an executive nature as the other; and the first one is authorized by being excepted out of the general rule established by the Constitution in these words: "The executive power shall be vested in the President."

Upon the same point Chancellor Kent remarks, (Kent's Com., sec. 14, pp. 310, 311:)

"On the first organization of the Government it was made a question whether the power of removal in case of officers appointed to hold at pleasure resided nowhere but in the body which appointed, and, of course, whether the consent of the Senate was not requisite to remove. This was the construction given to the Constitution while it was pending for ratification before the State conventions by the author of the Federalist. But the construction which was given to the Constitution by Congress, after great consideration and discussion, was different. The words of the act (establishing the Treasury Department) are: 'And whenever the same shall be removed from office by the President of the United States, or in any other case of vacancy in the office, the assistant shall act.' This amounted to a legislative construction of the Constitution, and it has ever since been acquiesced in and acted upon as a decisive authority in the case. It applies equally to every other officer of the Government appointed by the President whose term of duration is not specially declared. It is supported by the weighty reason that the subordinate officers in the executive department ought to hold at the pleasure of the head of the Department, because he is invested generally with the executive authority, and the participation in that authority by the Senate was an exception to a general principle, and ought to be taken strictly. The President is the great responsible officer for the faithful execution of the law, and the power of removal was incidental to that duty, and might often be requisite to fulfill it."

And he further observes, "it may now be considered as firmly and definitely settled, and there is good sense and practical utility in the construction."

I need to add nothing more by way of argument to these high authorities to show that the "act regulating the tenure of certain civil offices" is not warranted in the Constitution. But I am not required, for my present purpose, to prove this law unconstitutional; for I contend that the President can only be impeached for a knowing and willful violation of the Constitution or a law made in pursuance thereof with the intent to usurp a power not conferred upon him by the Constitution or to pervert his power to the injury and not the welfare of the people. The President, with all this weight of authority on his side, the common consent given to this construction through all this lapse of time, had a right to exercise the power of removal, hitherto unquestioned, without being charged with the commission of a "high crime and misdemeanor;" and, being in the possession of a prima facie, if not an absolute, right, the burden of proof must rest upon those who question his authority, and they should be willing to invoke a decision of the Supreme Court to settle the controversy. But, so far from doing this, they have, in every possible way, manifested their dread of that august tribunal. They have attempted to close the mouth of the court and prevent them from passing upon the constitutionality of a law of Congress, and have resorted to every device that they may defeat the purpose and desire of the President to obtain from the court a decision upon this newly-vexed question.

But, if any additional authority were needed to sustain my position as to the constitutionality of this law, I have only to add what is notorious and uncontradicted, and what should have great weight with gentlemen on the other side, and that is, that when the act was sent to the President for his approval his entire Cabinet were of the opinion that it was unconstitutional, foremost among whom was Mr. Stanton, who was so positive and expressed himself so lucidly upon the subject that he was requested by the President to write the veto. This he declined, on the plea of physical inability, but offered to and in fact did furnish the principal points and authorities.

But ignoring all this, and unwilling to have a judicial decision upon the subject, gentlemen are rushing on with furious haste to impeach the President, in the hope of accomplishing his removal for the violation of a law which the Supreme Court must, as soon as the case can be presented to them, pronounce unconstitutional. Nothing but the fiercest malignity could prompt to the commission of so gross an act of injustice, which would be still more shocking from the fact that a wrong would be accomplished for which there would be no remedy.

But, Mr. Speaker, for the sake of the argument, let us waive the question of the constitutionality of this law, and address ourselves to the next inquiry, whether Edwin M. Stanton, the late Secretary of War, though still usurping the functions of the War Office, is included in and subject to the terms and provisions of the first section, which reads as follows:

"An act regulating the tenure of certain civil offices."

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That every person holding any civil office to which he has been appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and every person who shall hereafter be appointed to any such office, and shall become duly qualified to act therein, is and shall be entitled to hold such office until a successor shall have been in like manner appointed and duly qualified, except as herein otherwise provided: Provided, That the Secretaries of State, of War, of the Navy, and of the Interior, the Postmaster General, and the Attorney General shall hold their offices respectively for and during the term of the President by whom they may have been appointed, and for one month thereafter, subject to removal by and with the advice and consent of the Senate."

The exception here is in favor of the President, that he may have counselors and advisers of his own choice, and not have the Cabinet of another President thrust upon him against his will.

They are to hold their offices respectively during the term of the President by whom they were appointed, and one month thereafter.

Now, by whom was Mr. Stanton appointed? The commission, by which alone he "sticks," like another Tite Barnacle, to the War Department, will speak for itself. Here is a copy of it:

ABRAHAM LINCOLN, President of the United States, To all who may see these presents, greeting:

Know you, that, reposing special trust and confidence in the patriotism, integrity, and ability of Edwin M. Stanton, I have named by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and appointed him to be Secretary of War for the United States, and do authorize and empower him to execute and fulfill the duties of that office according to law, and to have and to hold the said office, and all the powers, privileges, and emoluments to the same of right appertaining unto him, the said Edwin M. Stanton, and during the pleasure of the President of the United States for the time being.

In testimony whereof I have executed these letters to be hereunto affixed. Given under my hand, at the city of Washington, the 15th day of January, in the year of our Lord 1862, and of the independence of the United States of America the eighty-sixth.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.
By the President:
WM. H. SEWARD, Secretary of State.

When he was appointed there was no law limiting the President's power of removal. The very title by which he attempts to hold his place gives him notice that he holds it "during the pleasure of the President of the United States for the time being." And here it occurs to me, Mr. Speaker, that there are grave doubts whether the tenure by which any person holds an office to which he had been appointed before the passage of this act could rightfully be altered, or must not its provisions apply to those officers appointed subsequent to its passage. But I will not press that point.

Mr. Stanton having been appointed by Mr. Lincoln, the question is, when did Mr. Lincoln's term expire? For the purposes of my argument it matters not whether it expired on the 4th of March, 1865, or at his death. Mr. Stanton's term expired either one month after the 4th of March, 1865, or one month after the death of Abraham Lincoln. Certainly, according to the provisions of this act, one month after Andrew Johnson became President, Edwin M. Stanton became, by reason of the expiration of his term, a mere tenant at sufferance, which gentlemen know is the most precarious of all titles, and subject to instant removal by the President at any time. The words "subject to removal by and with the advice and consent of the Senate," at the close of the first section of the law, qualify the otherwise absolute duration of the term for which he may have been appointed, but have no application whatever after the expiration of the term. That this was the view entertained at the time of the passage of the act by all concerned there can be no doubt. As proof, however, of the fact, I will read a portion of the remarks of Mr. SHERMAN, February 18, 1867, as reported in the Congressional Globe. He was one of the managers on the part of the Senate of the committee of conference, and was explaining the report of that committee:

"I agreed to the report of the conference committee with a good deal of reluctance. The Senate had by two deliberate votes declared its purpose not to make the duration of the Cabinet officers fixed by any time, but that they should hold their offices at the pleasure of the President; and that was the original design in the creation of their offices; but the general purpose of this bill is so very important, it establishes so salutary a reform, that I thought it ought not to be endangered by a dispute on a collateral question."

"The proposition now submitted by the conference committee is that a Cabinet minister shall hold his office during the life or the term of the President who appointed him. If the President dies the Cabinet goes out; if the President is removed for cause by impeachment the Cabinet goes out; at the expiration of the term of the President's office the Cabinet goes out; so that the Government shall not be embarrassed by an attempt by a Cabinet officer to hold on to his office despite the wish of the President or a change in the Presidency. The great danger that might have arisen from the bill as it stood amended by the House is relieved by this amendment, and I think it is much better for us to agree to this modification rather than endanger the passage of the bill. I therefore signed the report of the conference committee, though with some reluctance. I think, under the circumstances, the Senate had better agree to it. If it shall be found to work badly at any time it will be very easy, by a law or joint resolution, to change it."

Now, Mr. Speaker, as I stated in the commencement of remarks, I cannot for my life see any relation between the act removing Mr. Stanton, of which gentlemen complain, and the hue and cry about impeachment. And I would here remind gentlemen who have heretofore voted against impeachment, and who will, in all probability, decide this question, that they are restrained to this act. All that has been complained of by others amounts to nothing in their estimation. They complain of this as the most enormous of his offenses.

As I cannot regard it as an offense at all, but as a perfectly legal and proper act, and one which, if it had been done long since, would have conferred incalculable benefit upon the country, I am driven irresistibly to the conclusion that the reasons for this action on the part of the House are other than those assigned. I feel that I have a right to look into the history and condition of the Republican party to discover the true reasons which are now controlling their conduct.

Why do they attach so much importance to Stanton's remaining in the War Department? Because he is the willing tool of Congress in their nefarious scheme of what they call reconstruction; but which is and never has been anything else than a scheme for the election of the next President. To their shame be it said that they have prostituted all the powers of this mighty Government to the base purposes of party. For the first time in the history of the country has the Congress of the United States stooped from its high position to legislate directly for the interests of their party. With the powers of Congress they combine the spirit and ethics of a party convention. Their course to this end has been systematic since the surrender of Lee gave us hope of peace and union again. It was this instinct which first prompted them to refuse to restore the South to her place in the Union, knowing, as they did, that the vote of those States would be given against the Radical candidate for President, and they had not the hardihood, at that time, to hint even at the disfranchisement of whites and the enfranchisement of negroes to accomplish their purpose. Now their purpose is changed. Despairing of carrying more than half a dozen of the northern States at the next election, they have turned to the South, and by the most arbitrary, cruel, and barbarous legislation that ever disgraced a civilized Government, they have made of her a moral monster fit for their embrace. Everything that endangers the success of their scheme excites them to frenzy. They have now, Cortez-like, burned their ships, and their struggle is becoming desperate.

If the policy, which is called the President's policy, but which is also the policy which common sense, justice, honor, self-interest would have dictated, had been carried out in 1865, every scar made by the war would now have been healed, trade and commerce would now have been flourishing, the South would have been pouring her millions into the national Treasury, taxation would have been so diffused as scarcely to be felt; but the blessing of a radical President could not be conferred upon us in that condition of things.

From the moment when President Johnson was first recognized as an obstacle in the way of radical destructions with the most subtle ingenuity his enemies have toiled and conspired to strip him of his power and bind him hand and foot. They had an ally in the Secretary of War. They courted the General of the Army until they were satisfied of his disposition, when they slipped into an appropriation bill the following section, signed under protest by the President, March 2, 1867:

"SEC. 2. That the headquarters of the General of the Army of the United States shall be at the city of Washington; and all orders and instructions relating to military operations, issued by the President or Secretary of War, shall be issued through the General of the Army, and, in case of his inability, through the next in rank. The General of the Army shall not be removed, suspended, or relieved from command, or assigned to duty elsewhere than at said headquarters, except at his own request, without the previous approval of the Senate; and any orders or instructions relating to military operations issued contrary to the requirements of this section shall be null and void; and any officer who shall issue orders or instructions contrary to the provisions of this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor in office; and any officer of the Army who shall transmit, convey, or obey any orders or instructions so issued, contrary to the provisions of this section, knowing that such orders were so issued, shall be liable to imprisonment for not less than two nor more than twenty years, upon conviction thereof in any court of competent jurisdiction."

"SEC. 6. That all militia forces now organized or in service in either of the States of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Louisiana, Mississippi, and Texas, be forthwith disbanded, and that the further reorganization, arming, or calling into service of the said militia forces, or any part thereof, is hereby prohibited under any circumstances whatever, until the same shall be authorized by Congress."

The tenure-of-office law was intended to fill the offices of the country with their own creatures, and that they supposed that they had rendered the President helpless and powerless to interfere with their schemes explains, to my mind, the failure heretofore of the attempts to impeach him. What did they care for the President, stripped of executive power, while they had Stanton and Grant? They felt that the action of the Senate in reinstating Stanton had secured him firmly in that position. That explains the failure of the second attempt at impeachment, after the Johnson-Grant correspondence.

Now they have discovered that the President's regard for his oath "to preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States," his duty to the people to maintain the dignity of his high office, will not allow him tamely to surrender the executive power conferred upon him by the Constitution. Their control through Mr. Stanton and the General of the military arm of the Government seems uncertain. They are startled with a sense of insecurity. They have so often told the people that none but loyal men must rule, and they are the loyal, and that the salvation of the country depends upon their success, that they act as if they believed it themselves, and do not hesitate to imperil the very existence of the Government, and shake it to its very center, for what the people and the whole world must know is the success of a political party. The effect of the simple attempt to do this is bad enough, and must have an unhappy influence upon our future; but should you succeed in passing articles of impeachment, and finally convict and remove the President, while every one must know that it is only for the sake of party success, then, indeed, will I despair of the Republic. Those high hopes that I have always entertained of the continuance of her greatness and glory will be dashed to the ground. Then will be an end of our experiment of self-government, and we can read our fate in the history of our neighbor republic. Violence will take the place of law and order. Every President will be at the mercy of the congressional party. In your attempt to niggerize the Republic you will Mexicanize it, and our star, which rose so bright and gave such promise to the world, will set in darkness and blood.

Tennessee Election.

SPEECH OF HON. JEHU BAKER,

OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 5, 1868,

On the joint resolution (H. R. No. 214) relative to R. R. Butler, Representative-elect from the State of Tennessee.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. Speaker, being now definitely advised that the case of Mr. Butler is within the third section of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, I am of opinion that the course which is now proposed by my colleague [Mr. Cook] is the proper one to meet not only this case but all such cases. The Thirty-Ninth Congress had this subject under consideration, and, if I may so speak, has set the die of a permanent national policy in regard to the incapacity of holding office by persons who, having once taken an oath of fidelity to the Government of the United States, afterward participated in rebellion against the Government. It was thought, however, and wisely thought, that a proper element in that provision should be an arrangement by which, in fit cases, the disability might be removed, and a proviso was accordingly inserted that such disability might be removed by a two-thirds vote of both branches of Congress. Mr. Butler having, as I am advised, taken, perhaps, several oaths at different times before the rebellion of fidelity to the Constitution of the United States, and having in form, not in spirit, or with really treasonable intent, as I am persuaded, yet having in form taken the oath which he did as a member of the Tennessee Legislature in 1861, he is, so to speak, upon the record and by the force of that oath, brought within the disabilities of the fourteenth article of amendment.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am as firmly in favor as probably any gentleman on this floor of adhering to the true intent and meaning of that provision of the fourteenth article of amendment. I am clear that the general principle is a sound one which declares that the crime of rebellion against this liberal Government is so great that a man who has once taken an oath of fidelity to it and has afterward engaged in conscious, willful, treasonable hostility against it should not be intrusted with office under it.

Mr. HARDING. I would like to ask my colleague if he thinks we could safely trust the interests of the cause of liberty in these hours of peril to the words and declarations of men that they will be faithful to those interests? Can we afford thus to throw down all the defenses which the people and Congress have erected against their enemies?

Mr. BAKER. Undoubtedly I would not think it safe thus to throw down these defenses; but nothing can be plainer, it seems to me, to any one who will only open his eyes and exercise a little dispassionate understanding than that the course proposed in this case will produce no such consequence. The record of the gentleman who seeks a seat here shows that he is, to say the least, substantially a tried and sound Union man. What I maintain here, and what I hope will be sustained by a vote of two-thirds of this House and two-thirds of the Senate, is, that a man occupying the position which Mr. Butler occupies, as shown by the record in his case, is just the man, if there be any at all, who ought to be released from the disabilities of the third section of the fourteenth article of amendment to the Constitution.

Why, sir, it was wisely foreseen that a provision of this kind would be needed. It was foreseen that some cases, at least, would arise where, as in this case, there might be rather the form than the purposed, intentional reality of offending. Where a man is shown to possess real Union principle, and where he has rendered valuable service to the country, it would be inhumane, it would be short-sighted, it would be narrow, it would be unjust in a high degree, to make no discrimination in his favor.

To my mind two things are to be looked at in order to embrace the whole meaning of the subject. First, the object of the disability imposed by the fourteenth article of amendment was to provide against that bad, that iniquitous, that monstrous result—that men whose hands may be red with the blood of the defenders of the Union, who had plotted and schemed to overthrow and destroy this Government, who had helped to fill the graveyards of the North and the battle trenches of the South with the half million martyrs who died to defend and uphold our system of Government; that such men should come in here and make laws for the people of the United States! That, sir, I am intensely against, and that, I can see, is the grand object of the amendment. There are, however, some men who might technically be embraced within the phraseology of the amendment, but who are substantially sound, true men; men who, though temporarily betrayed into error, retraced their steps and did works meet for repentance. In these cases the disability should be removed. These two elements and applications, taken together, constitute the whole reason of the amendment. Let the rule be enforced rigorously and persistently in bad cases; in good ones let it be relaxed in conformity with the spirit and the letter of the rule itself. Being convinced that the case of Mr. Butler comes within the latter category, I am of opinion that he should be admitted, in the manner now proposed, as a member of this House.

Impeachment.

SPEECH OF HON. W. MUNGEN,

OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 22, 1868,

On the resolution to impeach the President of high crimes and misdemeanors.

Mr. MUNGEN. Mr. Speaker, "whom the gods would destroy they first make mad." History furnishes no parallel to the proceedings of the majority in this House. Madness rules the hour. Party prejudice overrides all barriers. An unbecoming display of partisan bitterness and rancor pervades the doings of the dominant party. Our institutions—the foundations of our Government—are being sapped and undermined by what to my mind is clearly unconstitutional legislation. Congress, under the specious pretext of "restoring the Union," has passed act after act of "reconstruction," each so inherently rotten and worthless that it breaks to pieces from its own weight. As soon as one of them fails amendment after amendment of, if possible, worse legislation is attached. All these various legislative acts and all the concordant and discordant elements of the present mischief-making, corrupt, presumptuous, and revolutionary party are held together by the adhesive force of public plunder and intense desire for party power.

Gentlemen on the other side of the House, who claim to be very loyal, and several of them extremely brave, sneer at my democratic friends who respectfully, by able arguments, suggest and show that the peace of our country will be endangered by the passage of this impeachment measure. But they do not and cannot answer those arguments. Some of them, who "sauff the battle from afar," belch forth torrents of fiery rhetoric and invective, not only at the Chief Executive, but at all who venture to suggest that civil war may, and perhaps will, be the direct result of the present course of legislation. They seem disposed to take the executive department by storm and by the same agency resorted to by Joshua at Jericho. It is difficult to imagine how the ram's horns used upon that august occasion could exceed the "sound and fury" launched at the President. My radical friends have twice marched around the circumvallations of the executive department, sounding their impeachment trumpets, and are now starting on their third expedition. Joshua went around the walls seven times before they fell. If the executive department fall before the seventh attack it will only go to prove that the radicals blew louder and stronger than did the Israelites with their horns.

It is not for the occupant of the presidential chair, as an individual, that the American people are so solicitous; for no one man can be of vital importance among thirty or forty million people; but this attack is directed, not only against the high office which he holds, and which, as a coördinate branch of our Government, can only be sacrificed at the cost of our liberties or the peace of the American people; this attack is directed against the walls of our Government, which were reared by the patriot fathers, and whose foundations were laid deep down in the Constitution of our country—the fear is they will not be able to resist the fury of this tornado of fanaticism. How long can our Government exist when congressional legislation is in direct conflict with the Constitution? To show that such has been the character of republican legislation it is but necessary to refer to the acts of Congress passed since the suppression of the rebellion. Who can point to authority in the Constitution for any of the reconstruction acts? Who can show authority for the five military satrapies of the South? Who, under the Constitution, can justify martial law and military despotism in time of peace? Who can demonstrate the rule by which the ignorant, degraded, and naturally inferior negro is to be placed over the white man in the South, and made equal, if not superior, to the white man in the North? Who will deny that well-settled principle, the vindication of which inaugurated the American Revolution, that taxation without representation is a fraud and a wrong? And who dare deny that this fraud and wrong has been and is now being practiced daily by radical power, in violation of the fundamental principles of our Government? Who but the radical Republican party is responsible?

Where does Congress get power from the Constitution to fix the status of voters in any State or portion of this Union? All powers not clearly delegated to Congress by that instrument are reserved to the States and to the people. By what authority does Congress assume to disfranchise white men and enfranchise negroes? If this can be done in one State or portion of the country it can be done in any other State. If this power rests with Congress why did they permit us to vote on the question in Ohio last fall? If negro equality is a matter to be controlled by Congress why submit the question to the voters of Ohio? But what act has Congress passed for the benefit of the people? Let their acts reply. Instead of any measures to relieve the laboring classes, to resuscitate our commerce, to improve the finances of the country, to aid in developing the resources of the land, and thus lighten the burden of an overtaxed people, they have found time for nothing but partisan measures and the advancement of party ends. Party success and public spoils, these and these alone, are the objects and ambition of this party of boasted loyalty and patriotism. No one measure has been adopted or recommended by either branch of the present Congress looking to the welfare of the country and not calculated and intended to advance party. I challenge gentlemen on the other side to mention one measure introduced into this House or discussed in caucus not intended for party use and for party success. For this the country has been robbed of the fruits of her costly victories in the field; for this the Union has been pronounced dissevered; for this the ballot, which should be the reflection of education and intelligence, has been forced into the dirty palm of ignorance; for this has the power of the Supreme Court been usurped, and for this the attempt to decapitate the President is now made in the interest of a reckless and unscrupulous party.

It is evident from the course pursued in this impeachment that gentlemen fear a judicial determination upon their unconstitutional acts until the deposition of the President and the substitution of one of their own number in his office is an accomplished fact.

Having to some extent discussed the animus governing the party desiring to impeach the President, I come now to the question of his guilt or innocence. Of what crime is the President guilty? It is claimed on the other side that the President has violated the provisions of the first section of an act entitled "An act regulating the tenure of certain civil offices," passed March 2, 1867, which is as follows:

"That every person holding any civil office to which he has been appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and every person who shall hereafter be appointed to any such office, and shall become duly qualified to act therein, is, and shall be, entitled to hold such office until a successor shall have been in like manner appointed and duly qualified, except as herein otherwise provided: Provided, That the Secretaries of State, of the Treasury, of War, of the Navy, and of the Interior, the Postmaster General, and the Attorney General shall hold their offices respectively for and during the term of the President by whom they may have been appointed, and for one month thereafter, subject to removal by and with the advice and consent of the Senate."

In the first place, it will be remembered when this law was passed—on the eve of a presidential election; in the second place, the American people know very well why it was passed—to influence that election. It is an exception in legislation, not to call it a clear usurpation of the rights of the Executive. As well might the President presume to appoint the Clerk, Sergeant-at-Arms, Doorkeepers, messengers, and pages of this House as for the House to undertake to appoint, retain in office, or force upon the President his Cabinet, his clerks, or his servants. There is as much justice, sense, and right in one proposition as the other.

The main point upon which the impeachers hang their hopes is that during the session of Congress the President undertook to remove Mr. Stanton. That we may not make any mistakes, allow me to state the facts of the case. During Mr. Lincoln's first term, and in January, 1862, Mr. Stanton was appointed by him in place of Hon. SIMON CAMERON, and the appointment was approved and confirmed by the Senate. Mr. Lincoln was reelected and Mr. Stanton received no new appointment from Mr. Lincoln either with or without the consent of the Senate, although some of the Cabinet were reappointed and confirmed. Soon after Mr. Lincoln entered upon his second term as President and Mr. Johnson as Vice President the office of President became vacant by the death of Mr. Lincoln. The duties and responsibilities of President of the United States at once devolved upon Mr. Johnson. The Cabinet met for consultation as usual. No change was made or proposed by him, and Mr. Stanton remained in the War Office. Since that time President Johnson never appointed Mr. Stanton either with or without the consent of the Senate. He did request him to resign, which he refused to do, and the President suspended him. As soon as the Senate met they forced him back into the War Office despite the well-known wishes of the President and the residue of the Cabinet. Mr. Stanton is, therefore, in the War Office not by "appointment by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate," but by appointment by the Senate alone, who, in this instance, has apparently assumed the entire responsibility.

HO. OF REPS.

Impeachment—Mr. Mungen.

40TH CONG....2D SESS.

Mr. Stanton never was appointed Secretary of War by President Johnson, either with or without the consent of the Senate, as before remarked; therefore it is clear that he has not violated the first section of the act already quoted. The proviso is very plain in its terms:

"Provided, That the Secretaries of State, of the Treasury, of War, of the Navy, and of the Interior, the Postmaster General, and the Attorney General shall hold their offices respectively for and during the term of the President by whom they were appointed, and for one month thereafter, subject to removal, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate."

By the very terms of this proviso Mr. Stanton's term of office would have expired one month after the expiration of President Lincoln's first term of office, which would have been April 4, 1865. The furthest that could be claimed is that it expired one month after his decease.

The mode of appointing the Secretary of War is pointed out in the Constitution. In the second clause of the second section of the second article are these words:

"He (the President) shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur. And he shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate shall appoint, ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law."

It is charged that the President has violated the Constitution in attempting to get rid of Mr. Stanton, who was merely an incumbent of the War Office by sufferance. It would be more easy to convince me that the Senate had violated the provisions of the Constitution in placing Mr. Stanton back in that office. The President is not bound to consult the Senate as to whom he shall appoint. If he appoint a person to an office and the Senate see proper to confirm the nomination, it does so, and this is "the advice and consent" spoken of in the Constitution. It has the same right to reject the nomination; but in no case can the Senate nominate. Mr. Stanton never having been nominated by President Johnson is he not now in the War Office by the nomination or procurement of the Senate, contrary to and beyond their powers and in violation of the Constitution?

Great stress is laid upon the letter of the President touching the removal of Mr. Stanton during the time when the Senate is in session. Congress, by the tenure-of-office bill, attempts to prevent the President from removing any officer whom he himself appointed. Gentlemen say there is no authority granted in the Constitution for the removal by the President of any one. Neither is there for Congress to prevent the removal; and, by the terms of that instrument, all powers not clearly granted to Congress are reserved to the States and to the people.

This point of removal from office is no new one. It was ably and fully discussed in the Congress of 1789, the first which ever assembled under the existing Constitution of the United States. That legislative decision is almost a supplement to the organic law itself. (See Marshall's Life of Washington, chap. 3, p. 199; 1 Lloyd's Debates, p. 599; 2 vol. Lloyd's Debates, p. 12; Senate Journal, July 18, 1789, p. 42.)

Justice Story, in his Commentaries on the Constitution, volume two, page 403, section fifteen hundred and forty-two, says, in speaking of this:

"After a most animated discussion the vote finally taken in the House of Representatives was affirmative of the power of removal in the President, without any cooperation of the Senate, by the vote of thirty-four to twenty. In the Senate the clause of the bill affirming the power was carried by the casting vote of the Vice President."

Here is the expression of this body when it was composed in great degree of the fathers and framers of the Constitution on this very point; and it establishes, as settled law, that neither Congress nor the Senate alone have any constitutional right to interpose in removal of officers appointed by the President. All that the Senate can do is to assent or object to the nominees of the President, and thereby determine whether he may commission them or not. In this view of the case the tenure-of-office bill is clearly unconstitutional.

Justice Story says:

"The public acquiesced in this decision;" * * * "nor is this general acquiescence without a satisfactory explanation. During the administration of President Washington few removals were made; few were made in that of the first Adams; in that of President Jefferson the circle was greatly enlarged."

Madison, Monroe, and John Q. Adams all exercised the power. During President Jackson's term of office Justice Story says:

"A system of removals and new appointments to office was pursued so extensively that it reached a very large proportion of all the offices of honor and profit in the civil departments of the country."

Chancellor Kent says:

"Between the 4th of March, 1820, when President Jackson came into office, and the 4th of March, 1830," * * * "there were removed eight persons in the diplomatic corps, thirty-six in the Executive Departments, and in the other civil departments, including consuls, marshals, district attorneys, collectors, and other officers of the customs, one hundred and ninety persons. These officers include a very large proportion of all the most lucrative offices under the national Government. Beside these there were removals in the Post Office Department during the same period, four hundred and ninety persons."

In proof of this he cites Postmaster General Barry's report of March 24, 1830; also the National Intelligencer of September 27, 1832.

General Harrison swept the offices entirely of their old occupants, and filled them with his friends in 1841. Polk did the same. President Taylor did the same; so did Pierce; and so, again, did Lincoln. Not a Democrat was left, as far as I know, when he came into power, in any civil office. It was all right then; he was the Government. It is all wrong now; Congress is the Government.

In Sergeant on the Constitution, chapter 29, (chapter 31,) this language is used:

"Another question occurred, upon carrying into effect the act of Congress of 1821 for reducing the military establishment. President Monroe, on that occasion contended that he had a right, in filling the original vacancies in the artillery and in the newly created office of Adjutant General, to place in them any officer belonging to the whole military establishment, whether of the staff or of the line."

In filling original vacancies, said he—

"That is, offices newly created, it is my opinion that Congress has no right under the Constitution to impose any restraint by law on the power granted to the President, so as to prevent his making a free election for these offices from the whole body of his fellow-citizens. If the law imposed such a restraint it would be void."

Compare these views of President Monroe, so far as applicable, and also Justice Story's remarks, with the tenure-of-office bill, and it is easily seen to my mind that the bill is wrong, and the action of Congress a usurpation in so far as it interferes with the well-settled prerogatives of the Executive.

The most illustrious of American jurists, in a great case, regarded by the partisans of the time as pressing the executive powers into the smallest possible space, yet expounded the present principle thus:

"The President is invested with certain important political powers, in the exercise of which he is to use his own discretion, and is accountable only to his country in his political character, and to his own conscience. To aid him in the performance of these duties he is authorized to appoint certain officers, who act by his authority and in conformity to his orders. In such cases their acts are his acts; and whatever opinion may be entertained of the manner in which executive discretion may be used, still there exists and can exist no power to control that discretion. The subjects are political. They respect the nation, not individual rights, and, being intrusted to the Executive, the decision of the Executive is conclusive."—Chief Justice Marshall in Marbury vs. Madison, 1 Cranch, 137.

In 1789, when the Constitution was under consideration, and before the vote was taken to which I have alluded, Mr. Madison made a powerful speech in favor of that clause leaving to the President the removal of officers at his pleasure who had been appointed by him. But the very commission from President Lincoln by which Stanton held the office of Secretary of War provides by its own terms and language that he only holds it during the pleasure of the President. Such has been the tenor of every Cabinet officer's commission since 1789. The words are these:

"To have and to hold said office during the pleasure of the President of the United States for the time being."

Plain Anglo-Saxon words. No double meaning about them. "During the pleasure of the President." Mr. Stanton and other gentlemen who claim that he is the legal Secretary of War must reason thus: President Lincoln commissioned Mr. Stanton and made him Secretary of War. He never told Mr. Stanton, while he was alive, to resign; therefore, Mr. Stanton held "during the pleasure" of the President; since the President's decease he is doubtless enjoying the pleasures of heaven; therefore, Mr. Stanton must be Secretary of War through all eternity, or as long as the late President's pleasure lasts.

But seriously. Whatever may be the power of Congress in the premises, it will not be pretended that any statute could give Mr. Stanton any other or any more of an office than that which was already expressed in his commission. If a law would be constitutional which should give any one hereafter to be appointed a life tenure, certainly Mr. Stanton could not get the benefit of it without being appointed to a life tenure office under the law. Even if Congress could repeal his commission certainly they cannot issue a new one to him. The Constitution provides "the President shall commission all officers of the United States." But Mr. Stanton's commission expressly makes his tenure "during the pleasure of the President," &c. If the President, then, even on the theory contended for in favor of the law, has withdrawn his pleasure, what becomes of the commission of Mr. Stanton, notwithstanding the office-tenure law, even if it is valid? If he is in office he is an officer without a commission of office. If he is a commissioned officer his commission has become void by the happening of the contingency expressed in itself upon which it was to cease to be a commission, namely, absence of "the pleasure of the President of the United States for the time being." From this result there can be no escape without denying that Mr. Johnson is "President of the United States for the time being."

40TH CONG... 2D SESS.

Impeachment—Mr. Lynch.

HO. OF REPS.

It will be recollected that on a certain occasion the Senate wished to interfere with President Lincoln's business, and many of them desired him to remove Mr. Seward. Mr. Lincoln gave them to understand that he had the power to do so, but refused to exercise it. The very request of those Senators acknowledged clearly and fully that Mr. Lincoln, as President, had the power to remove a Cabinet officer. More than this; the reason given by Senators was that the Secretary of State was not in harmony with the President and the balance of the Cabinet; and they argued that no man ought to remain in the Cabinet who was not agreeable to the entire body. It is for this very reason President Johnson wishes Mr. Stanton dismissed—because he has been a spy upon the President, and is so utterly repugnant to the members of the Cabinet that they will not meet with him, and he does not go to Cabinet council at all.

Is it remarkable that with a purer patriotism and with intellects freer of fanaticism the statesmen of better days actually foresaw the very usurpation in question? Fisher Ames, in the great debate of 1789 referred to, thus depicts what is now before our eyes:

"If the Senate are to possess the power of removal they will be enabled to hold the person in office, let the circumstances be what they may."

"It creates a permanent connection; it will nurse faction; it will promote intrigue to obtain protectors and to shelter tools. Sir, it is infusing poison into the Constitution; it is an impure and unchaste connection; there is ruin in it; it is tempting the Senate with forbidden fruit; it ought not to be possible for a branch of the Legislature even to hope for a share of the executive power; for they may be tempted to increase it by a hope to share in the exercise of it. People are seldom jealous of their own power; and if the Senate become a part of the executive they will be very improper persons to watch that department; so far from being champions of liberty, they will become conspirators against it."

"The executive department should ever be independent and sufficiently energetic to defeat the attempts of either branch of the Legislature to usurp prerogatives." * * * "Gentlemen are undertaking to amuse the people with a sound of liberty. If their ideas should succeed a principle of mortality will be infused into a Government which the lovers of mankind have wished might last to the end of the world. With a mixture of the executive and legislative powers in one body no Government can long remain uncorrupt. With a corrupt Executive liberty may long retain a trembling existence. With a corrupt Legislature it is impossible; the vitals of the Constitution would be mortified and death must follow on every step. A Government thus formed would be the most formidable curse that could befall the country. Perhaps an enlightened people might timely foresee and correct the error. But if a season were allowed for such a compound to grow and produce its natural fruit it would either banish liberty or the people would be driven to exercise their inalienable right, the right of uncivilized nature, and destroy the monster whose voracious and insatiable jaws would crush and swallow up themselves and their posterity."

Allison, the historian, says:

"It is the nature of fanaticism, whether religious or political, to cause the most atrocious actions to flow from the purest and most benevolent expressions."

In the name of religion and guided by fanaticism the most horrid deeds have been committed. In the name of liberty the most detestable and cruel despotisms have been established. The great speech of Robespierre, in 1794, on the immortality of the soul and of the existence of the Supreme Being, stands in strange contrast with his bloody and tyrannical actions.

When Augustus became consul, pater Senatus, imperator, and finally Cæsar, it was all accomplished in derogation of the fundamental Roman law. He caused the right of suffrage to be extended first to the allies; then to all the tribes and nations subject to Roman government. There was no authority anywhere in the Roman form of government for the assumption of those titles; yet he assumed them, and the Roman people submitted. But after that Rome soon began to show signs of decay, and ere long was numbered with the nations of the past. Let us beware. The American people are looking on anxiously, fearful that this or some new step of the party in power will plunge the country into another civil war, which, if it shall commence, will be far worse than the late rebellion in its consequences, if that be possible. I will not attempt to portray the result, but will respectfully refer the most violent of the impeachers, if the word be parliamentary, as well as others, to the fifteenth chapter of Allison's History of Europe, where the horrors of Jacobinism and of the reign of terror are portrayed.

Allow me to say, very respectfully, that I am exceedingly anxious to have any of my Radical friends who may not be perfectly familiar with the chapter to peruse it carefully. If I were to undertake to draw parallels between the legislation of this Congress and the proceedings of the Jacobin clubs headed by Robespierre it might not be parliamentary. But I hope it is not out of order for me to request my Republican friends to look for parallels. Robespierre in 1794 was at the zenith of his popularity with his faction. Has he a parallel in the Radical faction? He was called the Great Man of the Republic—who is now the great man of the Republicans? His virtue, genius, and eloquence were in every mouth—whose words are listened to, genius extolled, and virtues dwelt upon here? Corneille represents his heroes justifying all their excesses on the ground of State necessity—have we any among us who justify their course or the course of others on similar grounds? When the son of the immortal Buffon was brought before the revolutionary tribunal in France, under a charge of being implicated in the conspiracy among the Luxembourg prisoners, he said: "I was confined in the St. Lazare and could not have conspired in the Luxembourg." "No matter," said Fouquier Tinville "you have conspired somewhere"—and he was executed. Have we a revolutionary tribunal in our midst; and have we a man that it is necessary, from any cause, to say those words to: "No matter; you conspired somewhere?"

Allison was an Englishman and a monarchist, and in his history of Europe has said many bitter things against democracy and a democratic form of government which I cannot at all indorse. He charges many of the atrocities of the Reign of Terror to a democratic form of government; and he called the Jacobins the type of democracy. This was wrong, as every fair-minded man will admit. But let the people answer here whether we have any bodies, political or civil, which resemble the Jacobins. In the declaration of the "Rights of Man" by the Jacobins in the French Assembly they claim "the original equality of mankind"—are there any persons who are contending for that here? They said that "the elective franchise should be extended to all"—what party in this House and the country says so now? They said "that law is the expression of the general will." I appeal to the speeches of honorable gentlemen in favor of impeachment whether they do not declare substantially the same thing, and even go further, and make it criminal to say anything against any law they pass. And especially is this so in regard to reconstruction acts and the tenure-of-office bill. Have not my impeaching friends attempted to a considerable extent to prevent the Supreme Court from expressing its views on these acts in the usual way? Have they not passed a bill through this House requiring more than the usual majority of the supreme judicial tribunal of the country for deciding the question of the constitutionality of those reconstruction acts? Their course indicates to my mind their own views and fears of the correctness and justice of those laws.

Robespierre, Danton, Marat, Conthon, and Barrère were loud in their vociferations of loyalty to republican ideas; yet who can regard them as republicans or as anything but the enemies of the human race; fiends incarnate, monsters in human form, who, in the name of liberty, sought power at whatever cost, even of liberty itself? They made use of the passions of the mob to elevate themselves first and their friends next. Those who wish to seek a parallel in this country are at liberty to look for it. They will not have far to look. If they find it we can but affirm the truth of the axiom that history repeats itself. There are men in this country who, to use a couplet from Milton, would be willing to say:

"Here we may reign secure, and in my choice
To reign is worth ambition, though in hell."

It would be discourteous to impugn any gentleman's motives here, but one of Shakespeare's ambitious characters is made to say:

"I would remove these tedious stumbling blocks,
And smooth my way upon their headless necks."

Do the executive and judicial departments of this Government stand as stumbling blocks in the way of a party which has revelled in plunder and wallowed in corruption and played the tyrant for years past? It seems to me they do. If not, why the anxiety to dispose of them?

At the beginning of the Fortieth Congress immediate steps were taken to strip the Executive of every possible source of power. He was bound hand and foot—"bucked and gagged"—the President no longer the Government—Congress the Government. Now he is to be decapitated. How long will it require? It took nearly seven years to end the trial of Warren Hastings. It required some three weeks to perform a kind of semi-judicial murder upon the person of Mrs. Surratt. It will, doubtless, take more than three weeks to strangle the President. Where now is the fury which used to find vent against Jefferson Davis? The president of the southern confederacy running at large—the President of the Republic, who performed soldier's duty in the war for the country, about to be impeached for an honest difference of opinion as to the constitutionality of a law. Truly, republics are ungrateful.

In these days and hours of frantic party madness, hate, and lust of power how glorious it would be if we could look back to the happy days of the Republic and feel that we were a united people! May heaven grant reason to our people, and especially to our legislators! Would that we could now say with Macaulay, when speaking of the prosperous days of Rome and the gullant Horatius:

"Then spake the bold Horatius, the captain of the gato.
'To every man upon this earth death cometh soon or late;
Then how can man die better than facing fearful odds
For the ashes of his fathers and the temples of his gods?"

"Then none were for a party and all were for the State.
The proud man helped the poor, and the poor man loved the great;
Then honors were fair portioned and lands were fairly sold;
And the Romans were like brothers in the brave days of old."

Impeachment.

SPEECH OF HON. JOHN LYNCH,
OF MAINE,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 24, 1868.

On the resolutions reported by the Committee on Reconstruction for the impeachment of the President.

Mr. LYNCH. Mr. Chairman, the question under consideration is one of great magnitude and importance. The power to impeach the President of the United States is one of the highest prerogatives of this House. The reasons for conferring this authority upon this body lie at the foundation of our form of government. The fundamental principle of this Government is, that all power is derived from the people. "That all just governments derive their authority from the consent of the governed." Acting upon this principle in the formation of our Government, its founders provided for three grand departments through which its powers should be exercised, the legislative, the executive, and the judicial. The legislative branch of the Government represents the people. It is the medium through which the will of the people finds expression in the form of law. The executive and judicial departments execute and administer its will. It possesses the comprehensive power "to provide for the common defense and the general welfare of the United States." In providing for an executive officer, to be called President, whose term of office was fixed at four years, the people prudently reserved to themselves the right to remove that officer by impeachment, when, in their judgment, he became guilty of high crimes or misdemeanors. They did not define in the Constitution the official misdemeanors for which the exercise of this power should be evoked, but wisely reserved the right to judge for themselves in each case that might arise. To this House is delegated the sole power to impeach and to the Senate the sole power to try impeachments; and from this high tribunal there lies no appeal. Impeachment is not the infliction of a punishment, as its effects extend only to removal from office. Its object is to secure the faithful administration of office, and thereby to preserve the Constitution and the liberties of the people. ~~As~~ holding office is not a right, but a privilege conferred by the people, the lawful deposition from office by the people through their Representatives is not the deprivation or violation of any personal right whatsoever. It is simply the assertion of the right to unmake by the power that made; the demanding by the master of the unfaithful steward the talents he has misused. As the people cannot act directly upon great public questions but only through their chosen Representatives, and as they cannot reach any executive or judicial officer during his official term except through this representative agency it becomes us to be vigilant and watchful of the great interests committed to our charge, and to see to it that no officer, however high, chosen to execute the people's will, as expressed through their Representatives, shall, in the fancied security of his official tenure, betray the high trusts committed to his charge. Congress, as the agent of the people, has all the right of its principal, with all the duties of an agent.

It is the exercise of this high prerogative and the discharge of this sacred duty that Congress, as the agent of the people of the United States, is now called upon to assume and fulfill. Entertaining these views as to the power and duty of Congress, and believing that Andrew Johnson has, during the past two years, disgraced the high office whose duties he has been called to discharge; that he has used his position for his own ambitious purposes and to the detriment of the best interests of the country, I have, during that time, entertained no shadow of doubt, either as to the constitutional right of Congress to impeach him, or as to the expediency of its exercising that right. And, sir, when in December last I gave my vote in this House for his impeachment I did so only regretting that an earlier opportunity had not been afforded me, and that the requisite majority was wanting to make that vote effective. It is not strange that in 1860 and 1861 Congress should have sat here discussing legal quibbles until waked from their lethargy by an actual conflict of arms. The threats of a great party, just then defeated in a political contest, to resist the authority of an Administration which they declared to be sectional and unconstitutional, were very naturally regarded as idle vapors, unworthy of serious consideration.

But, sir, after the terrible experience through which we have passed since that time, and knowing as we now do the desperate character of the adversary with which we have to contend, and knowing as we do that Andrew Johnson is as much the agent of the rebellion as was Jefferson Davis, it is strange that we have so nearly repeated the folly of those days. Sir, what has Andrew Johnson done? What acts has he committed? What constitutional duties has he neglected, which render him liable to and deserving of impeachment independent of this last act of open violation of law for which he is now arraigned? He has usurped the prerogatives of Congress in assuming to set up governments in the rebel States; persisting in his usurpations after the assembling of Congress, and insolently informing us in his first annual message that he had completed the work of reorganization, and that we had nothing to do but to accept it and to judge of the election and qualification of such members as his States might send to us.

Sir, whatever excuse might have been offered for the Executive's taking the preliminary steps in this work of reorganization, his subsequent course in using all the power and patronage of the Government to sustain his usurpations and to force his reconstruction policy upon the country in opposition to Congress, which alone had jurisdiction of the matter, admits of no palliation or defense. This action of the President has been denounced as a high-handed usurpation by all the leading republicans in Congress and in the country, and has been condemned by overwhelming majorities in nearly every loyal State in the elections by which the Representatives of this Congress were chosen. And yet the great usurper has been allowed to go on, using every means in his power to sustain his usurpations and defeat the action of Congress and the will of the people as therein expressed. In attempting to carry out his policy he has stirred up the worst passions of the people and kept the country in an excited and unsettled condition, to the injury of all its great material interests. Two years ago, on the 22d day of February—a day hallowed in our calendar—he harangued a mob within sight of this Capitol, and endeavored, by the most violent and incendiary appeals to its worst passions, to incite it to violence against Congress, then in session. He has repeatedly denounced Congress as an illegal and unconstitutional body, whose acts were of no binding force, thus using the influence of his high position to bring the law-making power of the country and the laws which it passes and which he is sworn to execute into contempt.

He has disgraced his high office and humiliated the nation before the world by traveling through the country making low and indecent political harangues. He has thwarted every measure passed by Congress for reorganizing the southern States, encouraging the people in those States to continue their hostility to the Government, and thus prevented a restoration of the Union. By misconstruing laws and evading their execution according to their true intent and meaning he has compelled Congress to prolong its sittings and to hold extra sessions at great inconvenience and expense, in order to prevent or repair mischief caused by his obstinate lawlessness. The difficulties in the way of reconstruction from the assembling of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, in December, 1865, to the present time, have not arisen from any defects in the laws passed for that purpose, but from the fact that those laws have been perverted and their execution obstructed by a faithless Executive. The various amendments which we have from time to time been called upon to make to the reconstruction acts have been necessitated by the hostility of the President to those laws. When I say that Andrew Johnson has for the last two years used his official influence and official patronage to prevent the execution of the laws passed by Congress for the reorganization of the southern States, I only state that which is a matter of public notoriety, and what the President himself has in substance publicly proclaimed a hundred times.

Notwithstanding all these high official misdemeanors, any one of which should have sufficed for the impeachment of this man, so reluctant has Congress been to use this extreme constitutional power for the removal of an unfaithful and dangerous Executive that I doubt not, had the President violated this tenure-of-office act in a less defiant manner, (as he has often heretofore violated other laws,) we should have taken no notice of his offense, but have allowed him to continue in his course until he had bound us hand and foot. Fortunately for the country this last violation of law by the President has been so open and so defiant as to challenge congressional action. His recklessness rather than our courage has saved the nation. Fortunately, too, this last act of lawless usurpation has united as one man the great party which carried the country triumphantly through the war and thus far saved it from destruction in a determination to hurl from power this officer who brings disgrace upon our Government, disturbs the public peace, and imperils the institutions of the country. Equally fortunate is it that the Democratic party, which inaugurated the rebellion, sustained and encouraged it during its progress, and now strives to fan into a flame its smoldering embers, has arrayed itself with unbroken ranks in support of the President in this last attempt to subvert the Government.

It is fit, proper, and consistent that the party which attempted, under the leadership of Jefferson Davis, to regain its lost political power by means of a civil war, should now seek the same end under the leadership of Andrew Johnson, by the more peaceful but more dangerous method of usurpation. The Democracy having taken this "old Man of the Sea" on its shoulders the power of both for mischief will now be lessened. But, sir, we are warned by gentlemen on the other side of the House that the Democratic party will resist any attempt to impeach the President. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] declares that the Democracy will never, never, so help him God, never submit to the exercise of a power by Congress expressly conferred upon it by the Constitution. And why? Why not? Why, because it is unconstitutional. Of course it is unconstitutional. According to this same Democratic authority the Republican party is a sectional, and therefore an unconstitutional party, and its very existence justified the rebellion. The war was an unconstitutional war, and not conducted on constitutional principles. Congress is an unconstitutional body, because rebels are not represented in it. I presume if the northern Democracy had a majority here it would answer every purpose, and would, in that case, be a perfectly constitutional body. Abraham Lincoln was, according to this same authority, an unconstitutional President, while Andrew Johnson, made his successor by an assassin, is not only a constitutional President but is above the Constitution and the laws.

Before the abolition of slavery that was constitutional. The Democratic party and the rebellion were also constitutional, because they were necessary to sustain slavery. Since slavery has become defunct there is nothing now constitutional but the relics of the rebellion, Andrew Johnson, and the Democratic party. All else is unconstitutional, and must be put down; and the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] calls upon the bone and muscle of the Democratic party to resist this unconstitutional attempt of an unconstitutional Congress to impeach the President. Well, sir, like appeals to resist the Government were made by the Democratic leaders during the war. The constituency of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] responded, and for days the city which he in part represents was the scene of violence and bloodshed. I never heard that any of the gentlemen who incited their poor deluded followers into the insurrection led them in the fight; and this perhaps accounts for the fact that this northern wing of the confederate army was subjugated by the metropolitan police, and afterward held in quiet submission to the laws by the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] whose military prowess these valiant gentlemen now affect to despise.

Now, sir, I give the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BROOKS,] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WOODWARD,] this friendly warning, to beware how they undertake to inaugurate a second rebellion, for they may fall into the hands of an Executive that will be disposed not only to make treason odious but dangerous. I am aware that the gentleman from Pennsylvania proposes to avert this unpleasant consequence of treason by making the Executive not only a party to, but also the leader in such treason. He says:

"Mr. Speaker, so sure I am that the American people will respect this objection [the unconstitutionality of Congress] that I will say, if I were the President's counselor, which I am not, I would advise him, if you prefer articles of impeachment, to demur both to your jurisdiction and that of the Senate, and to issue a proclamation giving you and all the world notice that while he held himself impeachable for misdemeanors in office before the constitutional tribunal he never would subject the office he holds in trust for the people to the irregular, unconstitutional, fragmentary bodies who proposed to strip him of it. Such a proclamation, with the Army and Navy in hand to sustain it, would meet a popular response that would make an end of impeachment and impeachers."

Only three parties are necessary to make advice like this safe to the counselor who gives and the President who follows it. They are those named by the gentleman himself: the people and the people's Army and Navy. But not one of these three has shown any willingness to support such counsel. They each and all execrate it, and alike stand ready by ballot or in battle, by land or sea, to conquer and to crush it. If the gentleman desires to know how his treasonable appeals will be responded to by the people he has only to look around among his associates on this floor and count up the constituencies that will tolerate in their Representatives the utterance of such sentiments as I have quoted. Without any expectation of silencing the everlasting ding-dong about the Constitution, the Constitution, the Constitution, which is so continually kept up by these constitutional shriekers, I propose to examine some of the constitutional arguments which have been made, some of the constitutional objections which have been raised to the proposed impeachment and in justification of the President by those defending him. They contend, first, that the removal of the Secretary of War by the President was authorized by the Constitution, and that the tenure-of-office act being in derogation of this constitutional power is unconstitutional and void. Second, that the removal from office of the present Secretary of War is not prohibited by the tenure-of-office act; and finally, that the present Congress is not a constitutional body, and therefore cannot lawfully impeach the President, though he be guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors. These specifications of defense are certainly very comprehensive, and if sustained would render conviction impossible, not only in this particular case, but in any case that could be imagined.

As the question of jurisdiction goes to the root of the whole matter, it may be as well to examine that first in order; for if we have no constitutional right to try and convict it is hardly worth our while to discuss the matter of guilt at all. This is not the first time the legality of this body has been called in question. It has been done repeatedly by the President himself, by the whole democratic press of the country, and, strange to say, by members upon this floor who sit here as the accredited Representatives of legitimate constitutional constituencies, take part in every form of legislative action, vote to collect revenue from the people, make appropriations of public moneys, and regularly draw their salaries and mileage. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BROOKS] denies the constitutionality of Congress, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WOODWARD,] reiterating the denial, says:

"Mr. Speaker, I shall not feel that my whole duty to the House and the country is done unless I allude to another objection to this impeachment movement, which my friend from New York [Mr. BROOKS] glanced at, and for which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] and the two gentlemen from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH and Mr. LOGAN] poured out upon his head a flood of vituperative eloquence. At the risk of similar denunciations I take it upon me to deny your right to impeach anybody and the present Senate's right to try any impeachment."

"Says the Constitution: 'The House of Representatives shall have the sole power of impeachment, and the House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States.' This House of Representatives is not so composed; but, on the contrary, the Representatives chosen from ten of the several States have been and are excluded from these Halls. I do not say if they were absent voluntarily they could prevent your exercise of the impeaching power; for then they would form, though personally absent, a part of the composition of the House; but so long as you prevent their entering into its composition you are not the House of Representatives to whom the Constitution commits 'the sole power of impeachment.'"

The gentleman thinks while the Representatives from the rebel States were voluntarily absent they formed a part of the composition of this House. According to the gentleman's logic, as they formed a part of the composition of this House during their voluntary absence and lost none of their rights, these Representatives were at liberty to return here during the war and unite with their northern allies in voting against appropriations for our armies and thus insure their defeat. But the gentleman is not correct in his facts. The Representatives and Senators of ten of the States of the Union have not been excluded. They voluntarily withdrew, and have never returned. No Representative or Senator from any of the States which went into the rebellion has ever appeared here chosen under authority of any State organization which was ever represented in the Congress of the United States. The Representatives from some of the rebel States presented themselves for admission to the Thirty-Ninth Congress, but they came from constituencies manufactured by Andrew Johnson, constituencies which had no legal or constitutional right to representation.

And to this present Congress no one of the rebel States has sent Representatives and Senators who have presented themselves for admission. With the exception of Alabama we have no evidence that any one of them has held an election for Representatives to this body. But, admitting the gentleman to be correct in his facts, they would not warrant his conclusions that this Congress is an illegal body; not even if the exclusion of the States were illegal. The most that could in that case be claimed would be that the State excluded would not be bound by our legislation, while all the States represented would be bound. Will the gentleman contend that Pennsylvania, with her representatives in both branches of Congress, may question the legality of the body in which they sit because some other State is, from any cause, unrepresented? Will he contend that all the States that adhered to and maintained the Government during the rebellion should be disfranchised, even if those States which withdrew their representatives and made war upon the Government should be denied representation in Congress? If South Carolina should be denied representation does it follow that the right of every other State in the Union to representation thereby becomes invalidated? Such is the gentleman's logic.

The gentleman entirely ignores the fact that Congress has a constitutional quorum of legally elected Representatives and Senators, even counting in the States which Andrew Johnson declared had been deprived of all civil governments. If the gentleman will follow out his own proposition to its legitimate conclusions he will find that Congress is a legal body, but that Andrew Johnson has no legal title to his office. It is claimed (which I do not admit) that the President is the representative of the people of the United States. Now, it is a fact that eleven States were denied the right of participating in the election of President and Vice President. Some of the States were prevented by military force, others, among which was the State of Tennessee, were prohibited by law from representation in the Electoral College. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WOODWARD] and his associates contend that these electors were deprived of their rights, which, if true, invalidates the election. It follows, then, according to the logic of these gentlemen, that Congress, being composed of members legally elected and from States entitled to representation, and having a constitutional quorum, is a legal body; but that the States wrongfully, as they allege, deprived of representation are not bound by the acts of Congress. And it also follows that the President is an illegal President, a large part of the electors making his constituency having been illegally deprived of their rights to participate in his election, just as depriving unlawfully any portion of the electors in a representative district of their rights to participate in the election of a representative would invalidate the election of a representative, while it would in no way affect the rights of others or the character of the body to which they claimed an election.

But, sir, if the gentleman from New York [Mr. BROOKS] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WOODWARD] believe their own doctrines on this subject; if they really believe that the exclusion of the southern States disfranchises all the loyal States, what business have they here, drawing their salaries, and voting to tax the people? Their official acts contradict their professions and stamp them with insincerity. It has been contended by the defenders of the President's usurpation that the Constitution gives him the power of removal, not in express terms, but by implication, as a necessary incident to the executive power. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WOODWARD] contends that the whole executive power of the Government is vested in the President, and that this executive power necessarily includes the power to appoint and remove from office; that the President, being the chief executive officer of the Government, and being responsible for the faithful execution of the laws, should have the control, direction, and power of removal of all subordinate executive officers. That I may state the gentleman's position fairly I quote from his speech, as follows:

"The Constitution distributes the powers delegated to the Federal Government among three great and coordinate departments—the legislative, the executive, and the judicial. To the legislative department are given 'all the legislative powers herein granted.' Article two, section one, reads:

"The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America."

"And, says article three:

"The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish."

"The power is vested—all the power delegated to the Federal Government. What powers these are must be seen in the Constitution or learned from political science as applicable to a confederacy of States in union under a Federal Constitution."

"But whatever executive power the Federal Government possesses is vested in the President. He is made the sole trustee of the people in this regard. In the matter of appointments to office and the treaty-making function a check is imposed upon the President by the provisions which require the consent and concurrence of the Senate; but even in these instances the power exercised is the President's. The concurrence of the Senate is only a regulatory discretion—not an executive power. The Senate possesses not an iota of executive power. Its functions are all legislative, except when it sits upon impeachments, when they are judicial. The separateness and completeness of this executive power in the hands of the President are a doctrine that is very

Ho. OF REPS.

Impeachment—Mr. Lynch.

40TH CONG....2D SESS.

essential to the harmony of our system and to the responsibility of the President to the people. He is a trustee for them, and that he may be held to a strict account of his stewardship, the individuality and exclusiveness of the power with which he is clothed are not to be questioned. And if Congress meddle with it they become trespassers—their act is an impertinent nullity, and the President is not to be impeached for disregarding it.

"Now, sir, see what the Constitution says about his appointing power. Article two, section two, says:

"He shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate shall appoint, ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law; but the Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of Departments."

Could there be a more complete refutation of the gentleman's proposition, that the executive power vested in the President by the Constitution necessarily carried with it the power of appointment and removal from office? Could there be a more conclusive answer to his whole argument on this head than is furnished by the last clause of the gentleman's quotation from article two, section two, of the Constitution? "But the Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of Departments." Here we see that this appointing power, which according to the gentleman belongs so exclusively to the President by virtue of his office, that if Congress meddle with it they become trespassers, and their acts are to be treated as impertinent nullities, is, by the Constitution itself, in express terms placed so far under the control and jurisdiction of Congress that they may divest the President of it, (so far as all inferior officers are concerned,) and vest it exclusively in the Supreme Court. Or they may (as they have done) by law vest the power to appoint certain inferior officers in heads of Departments, transferring it from time to time, at their discretion, to the President. The appointment of other inferior officers they have vested in the Supreme Court; and they have, I believe, the power to vest the appointment of the heads of Departments in the Supreme Court.

The President being the chief executive officer, it follows that all below him must be inferior; and as the Constitution, in giving to Congress this authority to transfer the appointing power, makes no discrimination and fixes no limitation within the range of inferior officers of grade to which the power should apply, I think it clearly includes all executive officers below the President, except those whose appointment is, by the Constitution, specifically vested in the President. But the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Woodward,] in speaking of the officers to which this clause applies, says:

"They could not be heads of Departments, for the power to appoint inferior officers might be vested in heads of Departments, and the Constitution was not guilty of the solecism of making heads of Departments appointable by themselves."

If Congress could only vest this power of appointment in heads of Departments this point would be well taken; but they can by law vest the power to appoint heads of Departments in the President alone or in the courts of law, allowing the heads of Departments to appoint officers inferior to themselves. The gentleman says this whole question was settled, as a matter of constitutional construction, by the First Congress. The First Congress had the same constitutional power and authority to construe the Constitution as has the present Congress—no more, no less; and they never assumed any such authority as is here claimed for them. No Congress is bound (except in the fulfillment of the obligations of contracts) by the action of its predecessor. Each must judge for itself of the constitutionality of the acts it is called upon to consider and pass. I have carefully read the debates in the First Congress establishing the Executive Departments of the Government, referred to by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Woodward,] and have them now before me.

May 19, 1789, the act to establish the Department of Foreign Affairs being under consideration, Mr. Smith, of South Carolina, moved to strike out the words "who shall be appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate." He conceived the words to be unnecessary; besides it looked as if they were conferring power, which was not the case, for the Constitution had expressly given the power of appointment in the words there used. He also objected to the subsequent part of the paragraph, because it declared the President alone to have the power of removal. The words "who shall be appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate" were stricken out. The debate upon striking out the words "to be removable by the President" was continued at great length, some members affirming and others denying that the Constitution conferred the power of removal upon the President. The arguments in favor of retaining the words in the bill were based principally upon its expediency. It was contended that the power should have been, rather than that it was, conferred by the Constitution. The inference is that the majority did not believe the power of removal vested by the Constitution in the President, hence the necessity of conferring it by legislative action. The minority did not believe the Constitution vested the power in the President, and were opposed to conferring it upon him. In closing the debate, Mr. Sherman said:

"I wish, Mr. Chairman, that the words may be left out of the bill, without giving up the question either way as to the propriety of the measure. Many of the honorable gentlemen who advocate this clause have labored to show that the President has, constitutionally, the power of removal. If this be a well-founded opinion, they ought not to let the words remain in the bill, because they are of such a nature as to imply that he had not the power before it was granted him by the law.

"If gentlemen would consent to make a general law, declaring the proper mode of removal, I think we should acquire a greater degree of unanimity, which, on this occasion, must be better than carrying the question against a large majority.

"The call for the question being now very general, it was put, shall the words 'to be removable by the President' be struck out?"

"It was determined in the negative—there being yeas 20, nays 34."

The question of striking out in the Senate was decided in the negative by the casting vote of the Vice President.

The fact that this power of removal was conferred upon President Washington at a time when the Federal party (whose policy it was to strengthen the executive department) was in power by the casting vote of the Vice President, shows how jealously our fathers guarded the rights of the people. And the fact that the Democratic party of to-day are claiming for Andrew Johnson autocratic powers, shows how far that party has fallen from its early pretensions as guardians of republican liberty against the encroachments of executive power.

As I have shown, the First Congress, in the exercise of its legislative power, conferred upon George Washington the authority to remove certain civil officers. In March last the Thirty-Ninth Congress, in the exercise of the same constitutional prerogative, limited the power of Andrew Johnson over removals by the passage of the bill known as the civil-tenure bill. The first section reads:

"That every person holding any civil office to which he has been appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and every person who shall hereafter be appointed to any office, and shall become duly qualified to act therein, is, and shall be, entitled to hold such office until a successor shall have been in like manner appointed and duly qualified, except as herein otherwise provided: Provided, That the Secretaries of State, of the Treasury, of War, of the Navy, and of the Interior, the Postmaster General, and the Attorney General shall hold their offices respectively for and during the term of the President by whom they have been appointed, and for one month thereafter, subject to removal by and with the advice and consent of the Senate."

And the sixth section provides—

"That every removal, appointment, or employment made, had, or exercised contrary to the provisions of this act, and the making, signing, sealing, countersigning, or issuing of any commission or letter of authority for or in respect to any such appointment or employment, shall be deemed, and are hereby declared to be, high misdemeanors, and upon trial and conviction thereof every person guilty thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $10,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding five years, or both said punishments, in the discretion of the court."

It is contended by gentlemen on the other side of the House that the removal of Secretary Stanton is not prohibited by section six, as he was appointed by Mr. Lincoln and not by Mr. Johnson, and consequently that his term of office expired one month after the death of Mr. Lincoln. They maintain that the term of Mr. Lincoln terminated with his death. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Woodward] says:

"The term became Mr. Johnson's term for its unfinished period, as much so as the right to possession of the White House, the right to the salary, or to any of the perquisites and functions of the office. It would be as unreasonable to call Mr. Johnson's possession of these Mr. Lincoln's possession, or Mr. Johnson's administration Mr. Lincoln's administration, as to call Mr. Johnson's term of office Mr. Lincoln's term. Neither in popular language nor in constitutional phrase can such a misnomer be found. It would be as absurd as to confound their names or the identity of their persons."

The Constitution, article two, section one, speaking of the President, says:

"He shall hold his office during the term of four years."

And the same section further declares:

"In case of the removal of the President from office, or his death, resignation, or inability to discharge the powers and duties of said office, the same shall devolve on the Vice President."

The term for which Mr. Lincoln was elected commenced March 4, 1865, and will end March 4, 1869. The death of Mr. Lincoln did not affect the term for which he was elected. That is fixed by the Constitution. Upon his death "the powers and duties of said office devolved upon the Vice President" (Mr. Johnson) for the unexpired term of Mr. Lincoln. If, as the gentleman contends, this is Mr. Johnson's term, it does not expire on the 4th day of March, 1869, for the Constitution in express terms provides that the presidential term shall be four years, and this construction is in strict accordance with "popular language and constitutional phrase." The term of a Senator is fixed at six years and that of a Representative at two years. The powers and duties of their offices do not devolve on any officer inferior to them in case of death or resignation; but a successor is chosen—for how long? For a term? No; but to fill the unexpired term of his predecessor. The language of the proviso is "the Secretary of State, &c., &c., shall hold their respective offices." Does this language imply that the act is retroactive in its operation?

At the expiration of one month after President Lincoln's second inauguration or death Mr. Stanton was lawfully holding, and continued lawfully to hold, the office of Secretary of War. The fixing of a limited term of this office, by the tenure-of-office act, in no way affected such holding. It could not and did not attempt to do so. It only aimed to act upon the future. By the proviso the power of the President to remove a Cabinet officer without the advice and consent of the Senate was absolutely taken away during the term.

If, as the gentlemen contend, the present Secretary of War is not included in the proviso, then he is a person holding a civil office, as mentioned in the body of the section, and removable only as therein provided. The section in terms includes every one holding civil office by appointment, with the advice and consent of the Senate, at the time of the passage of the act, March 2, 1867. Mr. Stanton so held the civil office of Secretary of War on that day. The section makes no exceptions, save by inclusion in its proviso. If the case of Mr. Stanton is not included in the proviso it is contained and provided for by the body of the section, and he is not removable save by the advice and consent of the Senate.

Let us see how Mr. Johnson himself construed the act. In returning it to the Senate with his objections, March 2, 1867, he says:

"In effect the bill provides that the President shall not remove from their places any of the civil officers whose terms of service are not limited by law without the advice and consent of the Senate."

Section two of the act provides that if an officer during the recess of the Senate be guilty of crime or misconduct in office, or from any cause becomes disqualified from performing its duties, in such case, and no other, the President may suspend such officer, and designate some suitable person to perform temporarily the duties of such office until the next meeting of the Senate, and until the case shall be acted upon by the Senate; that it shall be the duty of the President within twenty days after the first day of such next meeting of the Senate to report to the Senate such suspension, with the evidence and reasons for his action in the case, and the name of the person so designated to perform the duties of said office.

During the recess of the Senate Mr. Johnson suspended Mr. Stanton and designated General Grant to perform the duties of the office ad interim. Within twenty days after the meeting of the Senate he sent in his reasons for the suspension, all in exact accordance with the requirements of this law and under the authority of no other law, as there is no other law authorizing such temporary appointment of a civil officer. The Senate disapproved of the removal of Mr. Stanton and reinstated him, when Mr. Johnson attempts to remove him again, in defiance of law. Under these circumstances how can it be claimed that Mr. Johnson understood the law differently from Congress?

But, sir, it is urged that something more than an unconstitutional act of the President must be shown in order to justify his impeachment. All men are liable to err in opinion, and an unauthorized official act may be the result simply of an honest error of judgment, and as such furnishes no good ground for dismissal from office. To justify removal by impeachment there must be shown an evil purpose, a willful disposition to disregard the laws, a cherished intent to violate the Constitution, to usurp unlawful power, to disturb the public peace, and prevent the public prosperity. That on the part of Andrew Johnson there have been in the performance of the act which is the chief basis of the proposed articles of impeachment such purpose, disposition, and intent is easy to prove.

That his violation of the laws of Congress was deliberate and premeditated, and that his purpose was to sustain his usurpation of authority by force, had he not been thwarted by the General of the Army and the Secretary of War, is clearly indicated by the following extract from his annual message, submitted to the present Congress on its assembling in December last:

"How far the duty of the President 'to preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution' requires him to go in opposing an unconstitutional act of Congress is a very serious and important question, on which I have deliberated much and felt extremely anxious to reach a proper conclusion. Where an act has been passed according to the forms of the Constitution by the supreme legislative authority and is regularly enrolled among the public statutes of the country executive resistance to it, especially in times of high party excitement, would be likely to produce violent collision between the respective adherents of the two branches of the Government. This would be simply civil war; and civil war must be resorted to only as the last remedy for the worst of evils. Whatever might tend to provoke it should be most carefully avoided. A faithful and conscientious Magistrate will concede very much to honest error, and sometimes even to perverse malice, before he will endanger the public peace; he will not adopt forcible measures or such as might lead to force so long as those which are peaceable remain open to him or his constituents. It is true that cases may occur in which the Executive would be compelled to stand on its rights and maintain them regardless of all consequences."

Here is a President of the United States deliberating upon what? How far is he required to go in opposing an act of Congress which he may deem unconstitutional? He is contemplating executive resistance to an enactment passed in constitutional form by the supreme legislative authority, and regularly enrolled among the public statutes. Such resistance as would lead to violent collision and produce civil war. He is studying the limit of concession beyond which he may proceed to endanger the public peace. He is considering cases where he must resort to forcible measures, or measures which lead to force, regardless of all consequences. These are his forms of expression, his very phrases. And they indicate, not that he is meditating a resort to the adjudication of the courts, an appeal to the judicial tribunals, or any lawful arbitrament under the Constitution; but that his thoughts dwell on revolutionary measures of violent collision and civil war. Has any previous President of the United States furnished any precedent for the use of such language in his message to Congress? Not one. This extraordinary and revolutionary language, addressed by an executive officer to the people's Representatives, has no parallel in the annals of our country. Its counterpart is only to be found in the proclamations of usurpers of the liberties of the people. In the light of these and other previous declarations of the dark workings of the President's mind it is easy to see that his attempted removal of Secretary Stanton from the War Department was a first step in opposition to an act of Congress. His efforts to induce the General of the Army to retain or surrender the office of Secretary of War ad interim "in the interest of the President," against the authority of the Senate, was a piece of executive resistance likely to produce violent collision and civil war. His appointment of Adjutant General Thomas to the office of Secretary of War ad interim, the same not then being vacant, but lawfully filled, was a forcible measure, or one leading to force. And his conversations with General Emory and Lieutenant Colonel Wallace were inquiries for means which would enable the Executive "to stand on his rights and maintain them regardless of all consequences." Acts like these, following, as they did, previous declarations, showing such revolutionary and usurping intent, cannot be attributed to the motive of a mere honest opinion. They are not consistent with the character of a loyal and law-abiding officer. They do not spring from the patriotic zeal of an Executive intent merely upon preserving, protecting, and defending the Constitution. On the other hand, they partake of the character of the lawless aggressions of an Executive willing to subvert the Constitution for the success of his own schemes and the perpetuation of his own power.

SPEECH OF HON. ALBERT G. BURR,

OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 24, 1868,

In Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

MR. BURR. Mr. Speaker, in this moment of intense excitement it is my privilege to occupy for an hour the attention of the House; and not desiring to add in any degree to the wildness of the hour by an irregular discussion of recent events or action contemplated, either by the President or the Congress, I will devote my brief hour to the consideration of matters that will be of great and continuing interest to the people long after the excitement of to-day shall have subsided and the action of to-day passed into history.

Before, however, entering into a discussion of the financial affairs of the Government, on which I have decided to speak, I must notice briefly the speech to which we have just listened from the eloquent Representative from Ohio, [MR. LAWRENCE.] Assuming, as he does, to be one of the leaders of the majority on this floor, he has chosen on this occasion to arraign the present Administration for its deeds and misdeeds, and, in tones of most impudent coolness, tells this House that the present is a Democratic Administration. Yes, sir; he asserts truthfully that great corruption exists to-day in the administration of public affairs; that extravagance marks our expenditures; and adds that, so far as congressional action is responsible, it has all been in answer to the demands of "this Democratic Administration!"

Now, sir, it is nows to me, and the country will be astonished to learn that any act of this Congress has been in answer to the existing Administration. On the contrary, every act, every rule, every resolution, every bill, has been intended to be, and in fact has been, in defiance of the Administration. Public expenditures have been diminished in such directions as Congress could diminish them unjustly and to the detriment of the President and most of his Cabinet officers; but then not for the purpose of economy, but from the motives of malice and resentment. And, sir, in dismissing a few executive clerks heretofore aiding the President, Congress claims great credit for economy, expending, in the meantime, untold millions in furtherance of unconstitutional plans and projects, not only without executive demand, but against executive remonstrance and protest.

But, sir, I am curious to know when this became, in the language of the gentleman from Ohio, [MR. LAWRENCE,] a "Democratic Administration." Was the present occupant of the White House elected by Democrats? Be he right in policy or wrong in principle; be his intentions good or his purpose bad: I did not vote for him; did my friend from Ohio? And looking beyond the Chief Magistrate to his Cabinet, what one of them owes his position to his Democracy? What one went into his Cabinet because of past services to the party—or even because of present acceptability to it? None. When the great State of New York sent her illustrious Senator (Mr. Seward) into the Cabinet of Mr. Lincoln was he sent as a Democrat? When Mr. Lincoln called to his councils, as the successor of his former Secretary of the Treasury (Mr. Chase) a prominent citizen of Indiana, of spotless reputation and known integrity, did he call him as a Democrat? When New England sent here as her contribution to the Navy Department her "old Man of the Sea," with flowing beard and lofty bearing, did she send him as a Democrat? When he who had, by Republican votes, held the office of Governor of Wisconsin, left all other fields of labor and honor to accept the position of Postmaster General, did he enter the Cabinet as a Democrat? When the death of Senator Douglas was announced to the country in 1861, and it became necessary for a Republican Governor to appoint, during the vacation of the Legislature of the State, a man to fill the place of Douglas, that Republican Governor [YATES] commissioned as the successor of Douglas a man whose whole history was one of life antagonism to Democracy, and the Republicans of Illinois gladly indorsed his action in sending Orville H. Browning to the Senate. When called by Mr. Johnson from the Senate to the Department of the Interior was the transfer made because Mr. Browning was a Democrat? Further, when President Lincoln made Edwin M. Stanton Secretary of War was it the appointment of a Democrat? And when Mr. Johnson appointed Mr. Stanberry Attorney General, did he appoint him as a Democrat?

HO. OF REPS.

Let gentlemen, when they call this a "Democratic Administration" reflect on the ridiculous position they assume before the people. We confidently expect, sir, to have a Democratic Administration after the next presidential election; until then we decline both the honor and the responsibility.

Why, Mr. Speaker, it would be very convenient for these Radical legislators, after bringing the country to the verge of bankruptcy and disrupting the Union by the expulsion of ten States from the great family represented by the flashing constellation of stars on our national banner, to answer public indignation and avoid public condemnation by pointing their unholy and polluted fingers at the President and his Cabinet and say, "They are responsible; we only did it in answer to a Democratic Administration."

If this Administration be as odious as they assume, how can they expect the people to trust them in selecting another? What assurance do they give that they will not repeat the sad mistake they made in selecting the present officers? If they have made, as they claim, an almost fatal mistake in selecting those whose lives and principles were known and read of all men, do they think the people will acquiesce in their selection of one whose principles are unknown? Do they know the true full sentiments of him they now purpose to trust? If so how? Should some Radical tell us how he knows the political sentiments of General Grant his answer would be poetic—

"I know by the smoke that so gracefully curls,
Tis a statesman I see firm and true—
For the circle of smoke which so rapidly whirls
From his lips has the color of blue."

But, sir, to the subjects embraced in the speech of my friend from Ohio, [Mr. LAWRENCE,] I will ask the brief attention of the House, and will try to show that under Radical rule there is no hope of financial relief to the people, while under the control of the Democracy our burdens can be lessened, our debts honestly paid, and our country saved from financial and political ruin.

I ask attention first, sir, to some thoughts bearing upon the subject of our national debt. On the 1st day of this month the amount of that "national blessing" was over and above cash on hand $2,527,815,873 19. But why array figures or refer to numerals when from their very magnitude they are incomprehensible? That debt amounts to about eighty dollars for every man, woman, and child in the United States. Of this aggregate sum, $2,000,000,000 in round numbers, is drawing interest payable in gold; $300,000,000, in round numbers, is drawing interest in currency, and exclusive of the matured debt not presented for payment, about four hundred and eighteen millions drawing no interest whatever. Of the debt bearing gold interest much the larger portion is made up of the six per cent. five-twenty bonds, which mature in five years from date of issue or run the period of twenty years, at the option of the Government. Many of these bonds have already been out more than five years, others are by that measure of time rapidly maturing, and within a very brief period all will have been five years in circulation and liable to be taken up by the Government as a right reserved in the law under which they were issued. Outstanding as they now are, and drawing interest payable semi-annually in gold, the cost to the people to furnish gold to meet that interest is immense and grievously burdensome. Six per cent. interest on $2,000,000,000, the amount of indebtedness bearing gold interest, is $120,000,000. An immense sum, sir, truly, for our people to pay every year. Why, sir, this yearly interest alone is more in twelve months than was required to pay all the expenses of Government during three years of war with Great Britain. Yes, sir, fifty per cent. more; for the whole expense of our Government during that period of war, lasting three years, and including cost of Army and Navy, was only seventy-six million and some odd dollars, against $120,000,000 of this yearly interest.

But, sir, this is not all. Growing out of this system of bonded indebtedness is an aristocracy taking root in our soil, nourished by the shoddies of capital and protected by national legislation. It is not an aristocracy of rank and title truly, but may be the stepping-stone to both. Nor is it an aristocracy of intellect nor yet of labor; for both intellect and labor are subservient to it and taxed for its support. It is an odious aristocracy of wealth, of privilege; and this aristocracy has, as I said, the sanction of law—yes, is directly established and maintained by law. Whatever legislation imposes burdens on one class and bestows corresponding advantages upon another is creating and protecting an aristocracy. Now, sir, while the masses of our people are paying this enormous semi-annual interest, they are required to pay it, not in that common circulating medium called "money," which pays all ordinary debts; which pays the farmer for his produce, the mechanic for his labor, the merchant for his wares, and the wounded soldier for his sacrifices and his services; but the masses are required to pay this tribute in gold. But as gold is no longer circulating as money, but is only a commodity of trade, classing with jewelry and precious stones, the difference between the value of the circulating medium and gold must be added to ascertain the amount which this yearly interest really costs the people.

That difference I assume to average thirty-three per cent., which, added to the gold sum of interest, makes $40,000,000 more, or a total of $160,000,000 yearly for interest on only a part of our public debt. And, sir, these bonds, thus burdening our people by the continual drain upon our Treasury to meet gold interest, are increasing in amounts daily. The seven-thirty Treasury notes are being continually converted into this class of indebtedness. By the middle of July next the small sum of $200,000,000 will be added to this gold interest-bearing debt from the conversion of these seven-thirty Treasury notes alone, thus increasing the burdens to the people in paying gold interest on that much more bonds. But, still further, they are being increased by another process shown by comparing any of the monthly statements of the public debt. Our Treasury notes, which are a legal tender, and which bear no interest at all, are decreasing in quantity, and the interest-bearing bonds are increasing in proportion. These notes and bonds are both debts against the Government, or rather they are evidence of indebtedness to that extent, the one drawing interest in gold, the other bearing no interest whatever.

Now, sir, why not reverse this policy and increase the quantity of paper bearing no interest, at the same time and to the same extent reducing the amount of paper that does bear interest? Suppose a man of ordinary business capacity to owe a note of $1,000 bearing interest and another of like sum bearing no interest; suppose, further, he can make a payment of $500 on one of these notes, will he hesitate as to which should receive the payment? Certainly we would not expect him to execute still another note bearing interest in order to procure means with which to pay off his note bearing no interest at all. Yet this is just what we are doing day by day. Every time that some "loyal citizen comes to the rescue of his Government" and buys its bonds the Government, in the exchange, increases the debt that bears interest and receives in payment for that debt an equal amount of indebtedness bearing no interest.

By this process greenbacks are going out of circulation and into the Treasury, while bonds are going out of the Treasury into the pockets of an aristocracy who are to-day controlling the financial affairs of the Government. And, as if to make the enormity of this proceeding more palpable, these bonds are issued in denominations so large as to prohibit any but rich men from handling them; and then, by the most shameful and barefaced partiality for this privileged few who hold these privileged bonds, they are by law made free from assessment by any State, county, district, or city, and thereby a very large proportion of the wealth of the country is exempted from taxation; and that, as I have said, is in the hands of rich men. But while this wealth is free from taxation and semi-annually drawing its gold interest the expenses of the Government are still going on and must be paid. And by whom paid? Not by the rich man, for he has transferred all his taxable property into bonds and laughs at the collector of taxes. His millions, which in better days bore a share of taxation, are now exempt without decreasing the amount to be raised by taxation; ay, rather it increases the amount to be raised, by the partiality which gives him gold for his interest, while the producer gets paper for his commodity. This greatly increased amount, then, is paid by the laboring classes, who now pay the taxes which should be paid by the bondholder in addition to the share which justly falls upon themselves.

But, sir, even this is not all. Under our ruinous financial system these same bondholders have the privilege of depositing their bonds in the Treasury, receiving from the Government an almost equal amount of national currency, in sums intended to be adapted to general circulation; and with this machinery national banks are established all over the country, loaning out this currency at heavy rates of interest, secured generally by real estate, to the same classes of men who are paying the gold interest on the bonds which furnish the foundation for this currency, thus paying interest both on bonds and the representatives of the bonds; while the bondholder receives interest on both bonds and currency, mean time paying nothing for protection, education, nor even the costly and delicate luxury of reconstruction.

What, then, is in the future? Under this system nothing but increase of taxes, a multiplication of burdens for the farmer, mechanic, trader, and laborer; with still greater exemptions and favors to the capitalists. Nothing but the harm of the many for the benefit of the few. Nothing but making the rich richer and the poor poorer. In this connection let it be also remembered that the leading idea of those who are managing, or rather mismanaging, our financial affairs is to convert all our public indebtedness into these bonds with many years to run, and with interest payable in gold semi-annually. This is said to be for the purpose of keeping up our national credit. What, sir; increase our debt to keep up our credit? Tell the trader who is badly involved in debt, with ruin staring him in the face, to go still further in debt in order to keep up his credit? Let him try the experiment, and soon his assets will not be sufficient to justify a court of bankruptcy in closing out his estate. Suppose all our debt bore interest to-day at the same rate as the bonds in question, and all the holders of that debt exempted from all taxation. Our people crushed, disheartened, impoverished; our manufacturing interests ruined, or else protected at the cost of the poorer classes; our commodities taxed out of existence, and our produce barred from the markets of the world by the greatly increased price of production—how long would the patience of people so oppressed forbear?

But another demand upon our people is now made, and with the pertinacity that always characterizes an aristocracy is insisted upon by the capitalists. And those capitalists are

40TH CONG....2D SESS.

Finances—Mr. Burr.

HO. OF REPS.

controlling the dominant party in urging this demand. Not only gold for interest; not only exemption from taxation; not only banking privileges with extraordinary facilities of transferring wealth from tax-paying laborers to untaxed aristocrats; not only sixteen hundred national banks running at the cost of the many for the benefit of the few, but a demand absolute and imperative, that the enormous amount constituting the principal of these same bonds shall also be paid in gold. When the poet wrote

"Gold many hunted—toiled and sweat for gold," he expressed the idea that possession of the glittering treasure was at the cost of labor and sweat; but, sir, we are showing how the toil and sweat of one man only increase the golden treasure of another who is exempt from the judgment passed by the Almighty when He said: "In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread." Wealth is his without labor; his bread without sweat; grasping his yellow dust in eager hands, and heedless of the general ruin mocking his countrymen he realizes from his selfish stand-point that "this is the best Government the sun ever shone upon." He is intensely loyal, for loyalty pays a large dividend and pays it in gold. He is patriotic, for patriotism of his standard means large balances in bank stock and heavy mortgages on the homestead of the poor laborer. He is in favor of "keeping up the credit of the Government," for by that he means helping himself to the public treasure. In his judgment patriotism calls on the people to pay heavy taxes without murmuring, for well he knows that the collector will only seek out the laboring classes while the paymaster will call on him.

Sir, this burden once assumed will never be laid down. Let the capital of the country saddle a burden on labor, and in its greed of gain it will never consent to a release. All the industry of the country must be devoted to the payment of this semi-annual interest; and when, finally, passing years shall have matured the whole debt and thousands of millions are presented at one time, can then the tax-payer meet that demand? No, sir, it is beggary in the present and irretrievable ruin in the future—both to the tax-payer and the Government.

But, sir, what is the remedy? Retrace our steps—reverse the policy of the past few years. Let all men stand on equal footing. Inasmuch as greenbacks paid the Government for bonds, let greenbacks also pay the bondholder for the same bonds. Let him take that which he gives. By public declaration announce a readiness to pay off bonds with greenbacks, which constitute the money of the Government. This public notice, being equivalent to a tender of payment on so much of the bonds as have been outstanding for five years, will stop the interest on such bonds, and to that extent relieve the people of taxes, whether such bonds be actually presented for payment or not.

In this last event such bonds not presented would continue to be a debt against the Government, but it would be a debt bearing no interest and finally payable according to the terms of such public notice, except where otherwise specifically provided in the act under which they were issued. Let us briefly trace out the operation of this plan. The first result, as I have said, would be to stop the interest on all matured bonds, thereby saving over a hundred millions yearly. As a further result, those bonds which are now on deposit in our Treasury, in exchange for national bank bills, and drawing now gold interest, would cease to be profitable as idle capital, and as a consequence would be converted into shape adapted to commercial and business purposes. This withdrawal of the bonds could only be effected by a return of the currency issued on them; and by the same process all the national currency, or as it is sometimes called, "black-backs," would go out of circulation, and its place supplied by greenbacks which pay off the bonds. So by quiet and expeditious means, alike just and necessary, we would get rid of every national bank and save to the people all the profits that these banks make on both bonds and currency; and in lieu of both, furnish a circulation uniform and equal to all classes of citizens. Why, sir, the question of bank or no bank once shook this Government to its center, and all parties to-day laud the independence with which Jackson once crushed it out. Yet we have to-day a national banking system exercising almost paramount control in political affairs, and under the present policy permanent in existence. And, sir, when did the people consent to the establishment of this giant financial monopoly? When did they stipulate that their material interests should be controlled and their finances regulated by bankers and bondholders? They have never agreed, and I predict never will agree, to bow submissively and wear the chain of servitude to financial task-masters, even though that chain be forged of gold.

But, sir, let us still further trace the result of this plan. What will be its effect on the business of the country? To answer that question properly let us understand what is the present condition of business in the Union. Trade is paralyzed, industry crippled, labor inadequately rewarded, and manufactures, except such as are protected by enormous tariffs, crushed out of existence. And one of the main reasons for this condition of affairs is, in my judgment, the scarcity of money. Commerce demands capital—not idle, dead capital in bank vaults, but live, stirring, moving, available capital—money. Business requires a ready circulating medium, proportioned to the producing and purchasing power of the country, and that quantity is not in reach of the people to-day. During the past year it was with great difficulty that western produce could be moved to market for want of means to command transportation and pay freights. In the West the great cause of business stagnation is lack of money. Men owning large tracts of valuable real estate and possessed of much substantial wealth are troubled to raise even enough money to pay their enormous taxes. Shippers and traders in produce and stock—men who never before permitted a contract to overrun a day—are begging for time on shipments or paying heavy rates of interest to national banks for "black-backs" to pay contracts, and mortgaging their real estate to secure payments of such compulsory loans.

Before the war our money in circulation was estimated at, I think, about four hundred millions, which sum was required to meet the demands of business. Of this a very considerable proportion was coin. The expenses of the General Government in all its outlays were inconsiderable, compared with the estimates of the present day. The whole expense of Government during the year 1860, under Buchanan, for civil service, War Department, and Navy, was less than thirty-five millions. The estimates for the present year for the same service is $182,000,000. So far, then, as governmental affairs are concerned, it reasonably requires five times as great a volume of the circulating medium as it did before the war; in other words, it takes five times as much money for the Government to do business on as in 1860.

Take every department of business, and prices of freights, materials, and everything else which enters into the estimates of expenses in conducting business are largely increased. The cost of living is more than doubled. Why, sir, a seat in Congress was once considered a fair thing at $3,000 per year, which was itself a great advance on early salaries. Now $5,000, with mileage and stealage included, is considered a very small compensation! But, to be serious, it costs at least thirty-three per cent. more money to conduct the same business than it did before the war. Make now some allowance for a great increase of population through our producing regions, and admit the influence of greater facilities for travel, and you are not far wrong in saying that fifty per cent. more of money is now needed over and above the amount which answered the purposes of trade, commerce, and general business in 1860. And still another point requires consideration in estimating the capital needed by the country to-day. In 1860 money used in trade was worth par, judged by the gold standard, or so nearly par as to pass without challenge, whereas now, judged by the same standard, a dollar of money "so-called" is worth a measure varying from sixty to seventy-five cents, and of course a greater quantity is now required to accomplish the same results. In considering these facts, and measuring present and future necessity by these facts, I am led to the conclusion that an increase of say two hundred millions of active capital would stimulate all branches of industry and prove a blessing alike to producer and consumer.

But, sir, as I maintain, no prostration of business would follow this increase of money, for in the very measures resulting in the increase you add gradually but surely $2,000,000,000 to the taxable values of the country and produce a corresponding increase of business, lightening at the same time the burdens borne by labor. As part of this same reform necessity requires economy in the administration of public affairs—not, sir, this party cry of economy, this hypocritical profession in public speeches and farcical demand in verbose resolutions, intended only to deceive the people, but actual, practical, rigid economy, that pays no more for needed supplies than such supplies are worth, and dispenses absolutely with all expenditures, large or small, that could be avoided. Withdraw military rule in southern States, saving thereby directly and indirectly $100,000,000 yearly; abolish the Freedmen's Bureau and save thereby $15,000,000 more of direct outlay; reduce the Army to a real peace basis and save thereby many millions more; provide remedies for existing evils in the revenue system and thereby save another $100,000,000, as well as perjury, fraud, deceit, and outrageous stealing which are brought into existence and perpetrated by our revenue laws. Do this, sir, saving in the grand aggregate $500,000,000 yearly of the people's money. Out of this great saving set apart an annual sum to constitute a sinking fund, out of which to pay by degrees the public debt when reduced or converted into greenbacks, and in a comparatively short time our debt will be paid, our taxes be discontinued, our national credit fully sustained, our laboring classes liberally rewarded, our people prosperous and happy.

But, sir, this cannot be the result of continued Radical rule. Radicals protest against the payment of the public debt in greenbacks, but prefer to withdraw the greenbacks and increase the bonds. The result of this is to make money for poor people scarce, but for rich men plenty. Until lately our Secretary of the Treasury, under direction of a Radical Congress, was withdrawing $4,000,000 per month of greenbacks from circulation; and even now that process is only for the time being suspended. By Radical rule the burdens of the present hour were fastened on the people, and will not be removed but by a change in political control of the Government. Not a branch of industry escapes taxation. Assessors, collectors, inspectors, agents, seek out every avenue through which toil produces wealth, and lay their unyielding fingers in eager clutch on the hard earnings of honest poverty. Not the living only are sought out and laid under tribute, but accounts are kept with the dead; and by operation of the "succession tax" the meager pittance which a father's frugality saved up for his helpless child is counted over and a portion taken therefrom, under plea of "public necessity," before the child receives the orphan's portion.

And what proportion of this money thus wrung from producers finds its way into the Treasury to be used in payment of either bonds or greenbacks under Radical rule? Not one half—not one half! No, sir; there is no hope of improvements but by peaceful, political revolution. That only will save us from bankruptcy as a nation and demoralization as a people. If wrought out that revolution will save us from both; and the people who are now laboring under loads unbearable are understanding the evils and will apply the proper remedy.

But, sir, we will be told this fall that "these questions are not in issue." That has been the answer to all protestations the people have heretofore made against negro suffrage—"it is not in issue." But it is in issue. The great mass of the people, honest, patriotic, willing to bear necessary burdens, but unwilling to be trampled down by legislative tyranny and surrender all their hard-earned means to the demands of the wealthy, petted bondholders, have decreed that this issue shall be met. Another answer will be in the mouths of politicians, and given to the people by those who are themselves powerless and faithless to perform what they promise. Radical candidates, when unable to satisfy their people by evasive replies, will exclaim in the boldness of practiced falsehood, "We, too, are in favor of paying our debt in greenbacks."

Already, sir, have several members on this floor made speeches looking in that direction. But what is done whilst they are talking? Nothing—absolutely nothing for public relief. But much in another direction is being accomplished. Our debt is increasing and our interest growing larger day by day. This individual vaporing of our Radical friends is only to appease the people, to quiet apprehension, to begot hopes not to be realized, and secure a return to office and power. If they are in earnest in wishing to pay the national debt in greenbacks, as the people demand, let them first admit that the question is in issue; and then, taking the people's side in a practical way, let them help us elect George H. Pendleton, or some one equally favorable to the people's interest, as next President, and a financial reform will commence. Taxes will be reduced one half, expenses largely curtailed, our debt honestly paid in a very few years, and our country restored to unity, peace, and prosperity.

But, sir, let us not be deceived in seeking a remedy for existing evils, or in applying a corrective to errors glaring and enormous. Relief from the financial burdens of the hour is a practical question. That relief cannot be secured by mere general declaration, nor will it come in answer to professions of superior patriotism and wisdom. It will not even be commanded into being by the talismanic influence of a great name. National prosperity and individual thrift are inseparable. Individual prosperity cannot be true and permanent while irregularities mark all public transactions, and profligacy characterizes all public expenditures. There is, between the various communities of the United States, a relation of necessary dependence; and one portion of our people separated from another portion by mere geographical lines cannot enjoy permanent prosperity while another portion is borne down and oppressed with burdens. And here I may remark that no true, general, permanent prosperity can be secured to our people until all communities of our citizens are secured in such enjoyment of peace and industry as will enable them by their trade, produce, and labor to bear their just proportions of the public burdens, and, at the same time, receive and enjoy their share of the public benefits and advantages resulting from free government, properly administered. Let the southern States be restored to their constitutional relations to the other States in the Union, and, as a result, the people of those States, realizing the blessings of "liberty regulated by law," will add their offerings to the substantial wealth of the nation, and contribute their proportion of taxation for the public good. They would cease to be idle consumers, without resources and void of energy, and become producers of wealth for the general good, at the same time furnishing, as of old, the best market for the surplus produce of the West. The natural dependence of the South and West upon each other can never be changed by legislation, nor even permanently suspended by revolution. The great staples of western agriculture can never be profitably created in the South; nor can the Northwestern farmer, by any degree of industry or skill, secure from our colder soil the valuable products growing in profusion in the warmer soil of the gulf States. Therefore, we of the West earnestly protest that no permanent relief and general prosperity can be ours until again our relations of commerce, trade, and friendship is restored with our customers in the South. That restoration can only result from wise statesmanship and such patriotic measures as will secure equal and general good. Denunciation should be withheld, crimination cease, and recrimination be forgotten. Sentiments of friendship should be cultivated, more of the spirit of conciliation should be manifested, and, above all, the voice of the people should be heard and heeded by those controlling the Government.

In conclusion of these rambling and desultory remarks let me sum up what I deem to be the measures on which the people depend for relief, immediate and permanent.

Stop the payment of interest by placing the bondholder on the same footing with others, and pay his demand, as you pay others, in "greenbacks." Let him receive what the crippled soldier receives for pension. Adopt and act upon the motto that what is money for one is money for all.

Add to the taxable property of the Union by such legislation as will force idle capital from bank vaults into active circulation, and convert non-taxable bonds into taxable currency or substantial wealth. Abolish the "so called" national banks, and protect laborers more and bankers and bondholders less. Reduce the Army and Navy to a peace basis and reduce expenses in proportion. Encourage trade and promote industry by releasing both from unnecessary and tyrannical burdens imposed for party purposes in derogation of the public good. Restore civil government in place of military rule in the southern States, thereby saving to our people the cost of the last and securing to all the benefits of the first.

The people demand these measures; and inasmuch as these measures are repudiated by the party in power, the people, who are the source of all political power, are repudiating them; and will, in the next election, secure relief by electing to office such men as are willing for relief to be granted. And when individual members of the dominant party come before the people and beg for return to office, saying, "I favored these measures although my party would not act—in your name I made long speeches for economy—in your name I offered resolutions for reform," the people will indignantly respond, "Inasmuch as you adhere to a party opposed to reform, and are controlled by men in the interest of banks and bonds, you are not true to us—no man can serve two masters." And in the majesty of that sovereignty which abides with and resides in the "American people," a peaceful and constitutional revolution will be decreed that will secure uniformity of taxes, currency, burdens, and blessings, to rich and poor—high and low alike—and extend to all citizens the equal protection of the Constitution and laws of a restored and prosperous Union of all the States.

Impeachment.

SPEECH OF HON. A. H. BAILEY,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 24, 1868,

On the resolution reported by the Committee on Reconstruction for the impeachment of the President.

MR. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, in December last I voted against impeachment. I did so for prudential reasons. There were many questions of vital importance demanding the attention of Congress, and it was desirable that nothing should prevent their immediate consideration. It was manifest that the trial of the President upon the charges then made would require the examination of a large number of witnesses, and consequently would engross the time of the Senate, and perhaps that of the House also, for months. But, sir, I did not so vote because I thought the President innocent of those charges or that he deserved forbearance at our hands. Neither had I any doubt of the right of the House to impeach the President for gross official misconduct, although that misconduct might not amount to a common law crime or misdemeanor or a statutory offense. To say nothing of the many able arguments upon this side, the speech of the learned gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WOODWARD] on the 13th of December, 1867, was entirely conclusive upon that point. I cite his opinion because he is distinguished as a lawyer and has served many years upon the bench, and because, also, he is a violent opposer of our present action, as we have just heard from his own lips. I take the liberty of making a few extracts from the speech to which I refer, as I find it printed in the Globe of December 13, 1867:

"Now let us try to get at the meaning of this word 'misdemeanor,' because, after all, the discussion must come down to that. I submit that the constitution of Pennsylvania, formed in 1790, soon after the adoption of the Constitution of the United States, defined that word 'misdemeanor,' as employed in the provision for impeachment. The constitution of Pennsylvania defines it to mean a 'misdemeanor in office.' It says:

"The Governor and all civil officers under this Commonwealth shall be liable to impeachment for any misdemeanor in office."

I submit, sir, that this is an interpretation of the word 'misdemeanor' as used in the Federal Constitution, and that we should understand by that word a misdemeanor in office, a violation of any of the tacit or express conditions upon which the office is held, whether or not that violation be indictable under the criminal law of England or the criminal law of the United States. It may be such an offense, or it may be something which is not indictable under either of those codes."

He then quotes from Curtis's History of the Constitution, among other things, as follows:

"Although an impeachment may involve an inquiry whether a crime against any positive law has been committed, yet it is not necessarily a trial for crime; nor is there any necessity in the case of crimes committed by public officers for the institution of any special proceeding for the infliction of the punishment prescribed by the laws, since they, like all other persons, are amenable to the ordinary jurisdiction of the courts of justice in respect of offenses against positive law. The purposes of an impeachment lie wholly beyond the penalties of a statute or the customary law. The object of the proceeding is to ascertain whether cause exists for removing a public officer from office. Such a cause may be found in the fact that either in the discharge of his office or aside from its functions he has violated a law or committed what is technically denominated a crime. But a cause for a removal from office may exist where no offense against positive law has been committed, as where an individual has from immorality or imbecility or maladministration become unfit to exercise the office."

And adds:

"Now, I suppose that to be a fair construction of the Constitution and law in regard to impeachment; and I cannot help thinking that if the lawyers of this House would apply their minds to a true analysis of this subject they would come to this conclusion."

Near the close of his speech he reiterates as follows:

"I say it is incredible that the people of this country in adopting their Constitution meant merely to guard themselves against such delinquencies of pub-lie officers as should be indictable under the narrow criminal code of the United States. I say that such a construction restricts this constitutional provision far too much. And this is the view of Mr. Curtis. If a man in office has committed an indictable crime let him be indicted; and that will remove him from office; that will send him to the penitentiary or the gallows. You do not need the impeaching power for the criminal offender. But what if an officer has not committed an indictable offense, and yet has done that which by common consent violates the purposes for which his office was instituted? If I understand my friend from Ohio [Mr. VAN TRUMP] and other gentlemen to whom I am extremely sorry to find myself opposed, and for whom I entertain great respect, such an official must go unwhipped of justice, because, forsooth, the wrong which he has committed has not been defined in the criminal statutes of the United States! In other words, the people have no power of protecting themselves against a delinquent or unfaithful public officer, except, indeed, by defining as an indictable offense every possible delinquency, every possible act of maladministration, and thus imbedding it in their criminal law.

"I have no idea that the people of this country entertained any such view in adopting the Constitution."

I have heard no answer to this lucid exposition, nor can I conceive any that can be made. Such, then, being the jurisdiction of Congress over this matter of impeachment, it is quite plain that we might have preferred charges to the Senate for trial long ago; for all Union men, in and out of the House, have all along substantially agreed that the President has heretofore been guilty of deliberate and gross official misconduct in repeated instances which has disgraced the country and endangered its peace and safety. But, notwithstanding this, I and those with whom I have acted have heretofore believed that the country could better endure this disgrace and peril for a few months longer than suffer the further postponement of the questions to which I have alluded and the strife and bitterness which must inevitably attend an impeachment. I think, sir, I fully realize the nature, the importance, and the solemnity of such a proceeding. I do not forget that the impeachment of a President of the United States is without precedent. I concede that it should not be done except in cases of extreme necessity. But I know also that the framers of the Constitution, seeing that just such a necessity might come, placed the power to impeach distinctly in that instrument. Nor can I doubt either that the authority so conferred impliedly imposes upon us a positive obligation to exercise it whenever such a necessity arises. We cannot in that case avoid the responsibility if we would. To do so would be both weak and criminal.

Does such a necessity now exist for the impeachment of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States? I would gladly say no, but I cannot. With every disposition to avoid this conclusion, as my past acts have shown, the recent conduct of the Executive compels me to vote for his impeachment. I must now see that this country cannot have peace or even quiet so long as Andrew Johnson occupies his present position; that the making of laws is a solemn farce while he remains the Executive; that the restoration of the southern States to their practical relations to the Union is impossible while he, as President, can hinder and delay it; that a great portion of the time of Congress must be engrossed in protecting the country against his misconduct and usurpations, to the exclusion of all other legislation, so long as he remains in power.

He has at last broken through all restraints and deliberately and wantonly violated the laws of the land. If I understand him, he does not deny that he has violated the tenure-of-office act. His only excuse is that in his judgment that act is unconstitutional, and consequently no law at all. And yet it was passed in the manner prescribed by the Constitution and duly placed upon your statute-book. The Constitution declares it to be a law. As such it is binding upon every citizen of the Republic, from the President to the beggar. The latter has precisely the same right as the former to treat it as invalid. I shall not argue so plain a proposition, neither shall I argue the constitutionality of the act itself. That is not the question which Andrew Johnson must answer or with which we have now to do. The real question is whether Andrew Johnson, exercising presidential functions, shall be permitted to trample under his feet any and all acts of Congress passed into laws in accordance with the Constitution which he chooses to pronounce invalid? This, I repeat, is the sole question. Let us not be diverted from it, nor permit him or his defenders to make side issues. And, confining him to this bold issue, which he himself has here so defiantly made, how can he be defended?

But, sir, bad as is this act of his, if it stood alone and nothing further was to be apprehended, I would be strongly inclined to meet it, annul it, and let it pass. But the history of the last three years, teaching us by example after example of a settled determination on his part to accomplish his own usurpations, and to override every other department of the Government for that purpose, satisfies us that this is but one part of the drama he would perform. Allow him impunity here and the Fortieth Congress might as well adjourn sine die. If he did not kick you out of the Capitol, as he told the people of St. Louis he would do in 1866, he would treat you as "traitors hanging on the verge of the Government," of no account to gods or men. Your proposed constitutional amendments, your numerous statutes for the reconstruction of the southern States and the safety of the country would be regarded by him as so much rubbish to be destroyed, while that system known as "my policy" would be administered as the law of the land. I do not think I exaggerate the audacity and foolhardiness of this man or mistake his arrogant pretensions. I do not believe there is another living American of whom, under like circumstances, such things could be said, but we must willfully shut our eyes to the past conduct of Andrew Johnson not to know that he will do anything to accomplish his own purposes. And if he be now allowed to escape the consequences of this deliberate violation of the tenure-of-office law, enacted among other things for the very purpose of preventing his doing just what he has done, who will pretend to say what he will not do hereafter, or where his defiance of law will stop?

"I conclude, therefore, that there is a great public necessity for the impeachment of Andrew Johnson. Since we cannot avoid the constitutional responsibility imposed upon us let us act in this matter calmly, but promptly and decisively. The excitement, and perhaps uneasiness also, it may cause, we cannot prevent. But I think I understand the temper of the people of this country well enough to say that they will insist that no unnecessary delay attend these proceedings. They will recognize the propriety of all needful time for the defense of the accused, but they will not tolerate delays unnecessary for the purposes of framing articles of impeachment, and of a fair and impartial trial.

I assume from the general tenor of this debate that we shall confine our articles of impeachment to these last acts of the President in violation of the tenure-of-office law. I earnestly hope that this purpose will not be changed. It presents a simple, plain case, requiring no proofs, I suppose, except the record. It will be impossible for the ingenuity of counsel to protract a trial upon such a charge before a body like the Senate. And surely there can neither be a necessity nor a propriety in delaying our action here. The legal and constitutional questions relating to impeachment generally were exhaustively discussed on this floor last month. The present case presents but a single point, which needs only to be stated to be understood.

Of course the other side will clamor for time to discuss this matter. With well-affected indignation they will protest against passing this resolution "in hot haste, without debate, and in violation of their rights." All this we must expect, for denunciation of the tyranny of the majority, recitals of their own political griefs, and blocking all action of this kind, constitute the heaviest portion of their congressional labors. If they had a week for debate all to themselves they would say the same things when we at last demanded a vote. Of course, also, the other side will continue as they have already done, to denounce this resolution as ridiculous, tyrannical, infamous, Jacobinical, suicidal, revolutionary, and above all and most detestable of all, Radical! But we have heard all this over and over again. These epithets, and a long list in addition, are in turn applied by these gentlemen to each measure devised by Congress for the safety of the country. Their repetition has become "stale, flat, and unprofitable." Billingsgate is evidently exhausted. The other side have not been able to find one new term of vituperation for this occasion.

But there is a style of speech indulged in here and elsewhere, in reference to our proposed action, which demands more than a passing allusion. I refer to the grandiloquent threats thundered in our ears, that the deposition of President Johnson will not be submitted to by the patriotic, high-toned Democratic party. Like all the rest of their talk this threat is old and worn out. It is only a burlesque upon, or a feeble imitation of, the memorable scenes in this Capitol in the winter of 1860-61, when the arch-traitors stood here in their places and declared that the people of the South, constituting the Democratic party of the South, would not submit to the ascendancy of Abraham Lincoln and the Republican party, so help them God. If this language means now what it meant then—indeed, if it means anything, it is that the Democratic party, in a certain contingency, will take up arms to overthrow Congress.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WOODWARD,] who has just spoken, used language which I trust will be known to every man in this country. After arguing that this is a rump Congress, because the South is not represented therein, and consequently that the House cannot constitutionally impeach the President nor the Senate try him, he closed his speech as follows:

"Mr. Speaker, so sure am I that the American people will respect this objection that I will say, if I were the President's counselor, which I am not, I would advise him, if you prefer articles of impeachment, to demur both to your jurisdiction and that of the Senate, and to issue a proclamation giving you and all the world notice that while he held himself impeachable for misdemeanors in office before the constitutional tribunal, he never would subject the office he holds in trust for the people to the irregular, unconstitutional, fragmentary bodies who proposed to strip him of it. Such a proclamation, with the Army and Navy in hand to sustain it, would meet a popular response that would make an end of impeachment and impeachers."

The honest Democratic masses throughout the country should mark these declarations. They should know the line of conduct to which their leaders are committing the party; they should see that these leaders are unchanged at heart by the events of the war; that they sympathize with the rebels to-day as they did in 1861 and throughout the war, and if they mean what they say, that they are ready to incite a fresh insurrection against the constituted authorities of the United States. A large portion of these honest Democratic masses repudiated these false leaders and their principles during the war and stood shoulder to shoulder with us in defending the life of the nation. I feel entirely confident that such men, Democrats though they be, will never follow such leadership as this, nor support the principles here avowed. They love their country; they know that the land can have neither peace nor safety without submission to law on the part of every citizen, be he President or Congressman, high or low, rich or poor. They will also take care that political power be not committed to men capable (according to their own declarations) of enforcing their opinions by bullets when ballots fail them.

No, sir; I will not believe that those who make these threats speak the sentiments or declare the purposes of the respectable members of the Democratic party. And yet I must concede that the declarations here and elsewhere made, that the Democratic party will not submit to certain specified congressional action, is true to a limited extent. I concede that the whole party at the South, and hundreds of thousands of its members at the North, are now ready and willing to take up arms, not only to oppose our present action but to overthrow and disperse Congress. The southern portion of this party did actually try for four years to accomplish this, and they had the sympathy of their northern allies in the attempt. There is no doubt whatever that these same men, North and South, would renew the struggle to-day if they dared. It is unquestionably true that every living rebel and every rebel sympathizer in the land is now a roaring Democrat, and a defender of the usurpations of Andrew Johnson. It is true, also, that all the rum-holes, brothels, gambling-hells, and other sinks of iniquity which curse our cities are ready, now as ever, to fight for the lost cause.

It is, moreover, true that all the scoundrels from the Atlantic to the Pacific, from the lakes to the gulf, who, during our momentous struggle, rejoiced at rebel victories; who threatened blood and carnage in our own streets; who actually destroyed orphan asylums and attempted to sack and burn our cities, now constitute no small part of the strength of the Democratic party; and they are ready to-day, as they always have been, to steal, burn, rob, and murder in aid of any movement having for its object the overthrow of Republican ascendancy and the restoration to power of the worst traitors that ever encumbered the earth. Yes, sir; it is, indeed, true that we must beware of these wretches. We know them, and society has guarded itself against them as far as possible. Hence our penal statutes, criminal courts, sheriffs, marshals, constables, prisons, and police arrangements generally. If these be not sufficient to restrain them from crime; if they venture to undertake the work threatened upon this floor; in short, if they dare to raise armed hands against any of the constituted authorities of this nation, or in defense of official usurpation, I, in turn, warn them that swift destruction will overwhelm them. We have had quite enough of these threats of armed resistance to Congress. I want these gentlemen upon the other side to cease this talk and begin their action. If the defense of the Constitution and laws; if the complete triumph of right and order requires further bloodshed, let that fact be determined now. If these men really mean rebellion, let them inaugurate it at once. Let them marshal their forces, let them summon the disbanded rebel armies, telegraph to the militia of Maryland, said to be ready and willing, call for volunteers from the slums of our cities and other localities furnishing the necessary breed of Democrats, appoint confederate generals over the gathered clans, (for no Federal officer would accept such a position,) and when all is ready let them seize the Departments and oust the Secretary of War, clean out this Capitol at the point of the bayonet, garrison the White House, and proclaim Andrew Johnson dictator, and thus give the country a specimen of their patriotism and statesmanship.

Again, I say, let this empty gasconade cease, or let them make their words good by corresponding deeds. And these are the men who are constantly boasting here that the people are about to sweep the Republicans from power and give the control of this Government to the Democratic party! If such a result was ever possible the time has passed away. They themselves have destroyed the only chances they ever had. Deceived by the apathy of the people last fall, intoxicated by political victories in certain quarters involving local and comparatively unimportant issues, they at once jumped to the conclusion that a change had come over the people; they thought them ready to abandon the principles for which they had so long struggled and to accept those against which they had so long contended. In this state of mind they have been for some three months throwing off the prudential disguises which concealed their actual intentions and boldly avowing their real principles and policy. They have themselves demonstrated, by speech and pen, that they, like the Bourbons, have forgotten nothing and learned nothing.

They themselves have shown that the elevation of the Democratic party to power would be the triumph of the rebellion and the loss of every principle for which we fought. And this is all that has been wanting to call forth once more those irresistible energies which recently crushed the rebellion with one hand and repressed the Democratic party with the other. Not many weeks will elapse before the whole country will be ablaze with patriotic ardor. The millions who stood by the national flag during the war will not now desert the cause it then typified. They will not go over to the black flag of the enemy, nor permit that emblem of a lost and infamous cause to be planted upon this Capitol.

No, sir; these gentlemen utterly mistake, as they always have, the character of the American people. They cannot understand or appreciate that the masses of our countrymen, of all parties, are intensely loyal; that they have party predilections certainly, but that party interests are secondary to the prosperity, the honor, and the safety of the country; that they will follow no leaders and no party that will sacrifice or surrender these essentials; that they are well informed and understand these questions as well, and sometimes better, than their self-constituted leaders; that they hate secession, rebellion, and all its works and sophistries; that they dislike strife, but when it is forced upon them they will contend at the polls and peril their lives in the field, if need be, in defense of their nationality. Since our opponents have kindly warned us of what they deemed our dangers, simple courtesy requires that we should, in turn, warn them of the certain disaster which awaits them. When the results of the fall elections shall have been announced they will be the most mortified men in America. They will find their policy buried fathoms deep beneath the majestic wave of popular indignation now rising, and which is about to sweep irresistibly over the whole Union.

Impeachment.

SPEECH OF HON. HIRAM PRICE, OF IOWA,IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
March 2, 1868,

The House as in Committee of the Whole having under consideration the articles of impeachment reported from the committee.

MR. PRICE. Mr. Chairman, from the birth of this nation to the present hour its bravest and noblest minds and its truest sons have been laboring for the elevation of right and the overthrow of wrong. And now, after having avoided perils and conquered difficulties which have caused the downfall of other nations and the overthrow of other republics, and when we had just begun to congratulate ourselves that we had passed all points of danger, we find ourselves suddenly face to face with a new difficulty and at the threshold of an untried danger.

For the first time in the history of this Government the life of the Republic is threatened by him who occupies the chief seat of power, and whose sworn duty it is to support and defend it. When in the past danger has come upon us from without we were prepared for defense and have successfully beaten back the armed oppressors; and when more recently the rebellion of more than one third of our own people took the form of a bloody civil war we met and subdued it as none but a brave people, influenced by high moral principles, could have done.

For all of the past the history of other nations furnished us at least with partial precedents, but for the case now before us history is silent. It is true, sir, that other nations have sometimes removed their rulers, but in a majority of cases such removals have not been peaceably made, in accordance with the rules of well established laws.

When the dial of the clock to-day marks the hour of four I will be required to cast my vote for or against the articles of impeachment reported to this House by the committee appointed for that purpose. As was my duty, I have examined those articles carefully, and am much gratified to find that they present the plain, unvarnished facts, free from all ambiguity—so plain, straightforward, and in such common sense terms that every man, woman, and child in the land who can read will fully comprehend why their Representatives felt it to be an imperative duty to make an effort to stop in his mad career the man who, by the act of an assassin, has, for the time being, had placed in his hands the reins of power.

In this country sir, the people are the sovereigns; they not only make the laws, but they also make the officers to execute those laws, and when they become dissatisfied either with the laws or those who execute them it is their province, their prerogative, to change either or both. Hence, in a matter of so much importance as that in which we are now engaged, it is all-important that every step be clearly marked, and the issue so sharply cut and well defined that none need misapprehend the threatened danger or the pressing necessity for prompt action to avoid it. The committee that reported these articles are entitled to the thanks of the House and of the country for the plainness and transparency which characterize them.

A continuation of abuses and usurpations marks the actions of Andrew Johnson for more than two years, all having for their object and design the restoration to power of traitors and red-handed rebels. For these abuses and usurpations thousands and tens of thousands of the loyal people of the country have long since demanded his impeachment. But the history of these two years has only added another proof to those already existing that we are disposed to bear the evils of oppression and usurpation so long as they do not destroy the very life of the Republic rather than resort to violent remedies for redress. The committee have, therefore, wisely, as I believe, passed all these by and confined their specifications to the last wicked and foolish act of this bold, bad man. They have done this, I suppose, on the ground that a conviction of an individual for one willful murder being sufficient to hang him, a conviction for one hundred murders could add nothing to his punishment in this world.

Mr. Chairman, it would seem that the forbearance of the people under Andrew Johnson's usurpations has only made him more bold, and that their remonstrances and expostulations have only made him more determined in his reckless and mad career, until an outraged and insulted people, who have long since passed the point where forbearance ceases to be a virtue, are now about to arise in their might, and by a vindication of the majesty of law exhibit to the world a verification of the declaration made long since that "He who, being often reproved, stiffeneth his neck, shall suddenly be cut off, and that without remedy." If Andrew Johnson had been content; without any flagrant interference on his part, to allow the laws enacted by the legally constituted law-making power of the land to be executed, he might have used his immense power and patronage to oppress the loyal and encourage the disloyal men of the nation until the 4th of March, 1869, because the American people are a patient people, (much too patient in this case, in my judgment,) and in this instance seemed disposed to let patience have more than her perfect work. But this would not satisfy him. Urged on by his rebel supporters of the South, and determined to please them at all risks and hazards, he could not refuse them when they demanded of him the official head of the War Minister in a charger. But, sir, the guards sent to consummate the deed returned to their master without the much desired head, the owner thereof not being disposed to part with it until he could see the work which he had charge of intrusted to safe and reliable hands. And, sir, that refusal of the noble Secretary of War to obey Andrew Johnson by violating law sent a thrill of delight to the hearts of the loyal millions from the Atlantic to the Pacific; but from no class of our citizens was the response of approval so warm, deep, and earnest as from the soldiers of the Republic, who in the dark hours of trial had presented a "breathing wall of free-born breasts" as a shield to protect an imperiled nation.

If Andrew Johnson could remove Edwin M. Stanton, Secretary of War, without authority of law and contrary to the express provisions of law, what is there that he cannot do? But, say the defenders of Andrew Johnson, this civil tenure-of-office law is unconstitutional, and therefore not binding. By what authority do these men declare this law to be unconstitutional? Is it by the same authority that they declared the war unconstitutional? Or is it because all the States were not represented in Congress when it was passed? I notice, sir, that some professed Democratic Senators are claiming now that the President cannot be impeached unless all the States have their Representatives in Congress. If these objections are valid, then no law passed since the southern members of Congress angrily left these Halls at the commencement of the rebellion is of any force or effect. Then slavery is not abolished. The rebel debt must be paid. Then all the slaves set free by the war must be paid for, and the loyal men of the nation taxed to raise the money. And, by the same rule of reasoning, Andrew Johnson never was legally elected Vice President; and, consequently, is not now President. This proves a little more, I presume, than these gentlemen wish.

But if the civil tenure-of-office law had never been passed the Constitution of the United States, in very plain and explicit terms, settles this question. By that instrument the President is authorized, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make appointments. When the Constitution specifies thus particularly how he may make appointment it follows, as a consequence, that he cannot make them in any other way. The Constitution says the advice and consent of the Senate is necessary to the making of an appointment by the President. Therefore he cannot make an appointment without such advice and consent. In this case the Senate not only did not advise and consent, but declared in express terms that a certain thing should not be done, and that very thing the President, in the face of the senatorial prohibition, did do or attempt to do, in plain violation of the Constitution as well as of the statute in that case made and provided.

The Constitution also provides that if a vacancy happen during the recess of the Senate the President shall have power to make an appointment to fill it, which appointment shall continue until the end of the next session. If this means anything it means that he shall not fill a vacancy occurring while the Senate is in session without the "advice and consent of the Senate;" and it certainly does not mean that the President may create a vacancy and then fill it without the consent of the Senate, because if he can do this he can continue creating vacancies and filling them, thus rendering that part of the Constitution utterly null and void.

These things are so plain as to render argument a work of supererogation. Everybody is satisfied on these points, and no man knew that better than Andrew Johnson; but he, blinded by passion and prejudice, and drunk with power, determined at all hazards to remove an officer who was an obstruction to the accomplishment of his unrighteous purposes. Andrew Johnson viewed Edwin M. Stanton in the War Office as in time past Haman did Mordecai sitting at the king's gate; and he soliloquized thus: "I have been alderman of my native village, and have held all the intermediate offices up to Senator of the United States and even Vice President thereof. Yea, verily, more than this; for do I not now, by the assistance of J. Wilkes Booth, occupy the highest seat of power in the greatest nation on earth. But all these things avail me nothing so long as I see Edwin M. Stanton sitting in the War Office. He bows not down to me, nor does me reverence." I am resolved, therefore, that in spite of the plain provisions of the Constitution, in spite of the Representatives of the people of this nation in Congress assembled, in spite of laws, ordinances, or decrees, I will remove him, and will place in his stead one who, for the sake of the office, will

"Crook the pregnant hinges of the knee,
That thrift may follow fawning."

Andrew Johnson had some reasons for supposing that he could commit this act with impunity. He had been successful up to this time in thwarting the will of the loyal people and accomplishing his purposes. Sometimes by threats he awed into silence those who refused obedience to his mandates. Sometimes he punished the refractory by removing their friends from office, if he could not remove the persons themselves. Sometimes, when he thought he could accomplish his purposes better, he has "stooped to conquer." He has tried "dining and wining" those whom he supposed could be influenced in that way, and by all these various means he had succeeded up to this hour, notwithstanding his gross violations of the sacred trusts confided to him, of keeping his neck out of the halter. By his operations the rebels were fast regaining the ground from which they had been driven by the noble and brave men who periled life and fortune in behalf of their country on the bloody battlefields of the rebellion. By his influence maimed and scarred heroes were being removed from post offices and other offices and clerkships, where they were trying by a faithful discharge of duty to earn enough to support a widowed mother or a helpless family, and their places given to men who denounced the war, prevented enlistments, or fought in the rebel ranks. All these things has Andrew Johnson been doing for the last two years, and yet during all that time he has been countenanced, visited, and shaken by the hand by good and true men. If he could do all these things and yet not be treated with scorn and contempt why could he not go one step further and defy the law, and sweep from his pathway a man who loved his country too well, and who had too much Roman firmness, to bow his neck to the usurper.

Nor was this all that Andrew Johnson had to encourage him. He had the support of all in the North who declared the war to be "unjust, unnecessary, and unconstitutional," of all who opposed coercion, all who opposed the draft, all who discouraged enlistments, all who cried down the currency, and, added to all these, every vile traitor and bloody-handed rebel of the South. To complete this list we may add all those who during the years of the war had been hidden away in dens and caves and other secret places, but who in the last two years have crawled into daylight, and, uncoiling themselves as they have been warmed into life by the smiles of Andrew Johnson, might have been heard exclaiming, as they congregated in the liquor shops and other disreputable localities, "Now is the winter of our discontent made glorious summer by this modern Moses."

Mr. Chairman, the country looks for the success of this impeachment, expects it, demands it. It is a legal, a financial, a political necessity. Sir, the voice of the people is in this case the voice of God, and that speaks to us today in the same words used to the children of Israel when they stood on the margin of the Red Sea threatened with destruction, and says to us, "Go forward." They could not retreat nor can we. The path of duty is plain before us, and if we are worthy of the places we occupy, we will not shrink from the responsibility which is ours. We war with principalities and Powers and political wickedness in high places, but if we gird on the whole armor of truth, justice, and patriotism we shall be more than equal to the emergency. If we hold the ship of State steadily in her course all will be well. If there be any fearful, any timid, to such we would say:

"Fear not each sudden jar and shock,
'Tis of the wave and not the rock;
'Tis but the flapping of the sail,
And not a rent made by the gale."

Yes, sir—

"In spite of shock and tempest's roar,
In spite of false lights on the shore,"

We shall sail on and breast the sea.

Impeachment.

SPEECH OF HON. R. P. BUCKLAND,
OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 24, 1868,

On the resolution reported by the Committee on Reconstruction for the impeachment of the President.

Mr. BUCKLAND. Mr. Speaker, the question before the House has been so ably discussed by others that I should not have felt myself called upon to say one word upon the subject but for the fact that when the resolution impeaching the President, reported by the majority of the Judiciary Committee, was before the House I was constrained from a sense of duty to the public interests to vote against it. I shall not, on the present occasion, stop to give all the reasons which brought my mind to that conclusion. I was just as well satisfied then as I am now that Andrew Johnson deserved impeachment, but our friends on the Judiciary Committee and in the House were divided in opinion, not only as to the expediency of impeachment under the then existing circumstances, but also as to the sufficiency of the facts proven to sustain an impeachment by the testimony taken and reported by the committee. That Andrew Johnson was in conspiracy with the enemies of the Government to defeat the legislation of Congress for the restoration of the rebellious States, and finally to place the Government in the power and control of those who but recently were in arms for its destruction, I entertained no doubt.

Many years ago a conspiracy was initiated by John C. Calhoun, having for its object the subjection of the Government to the control of the slave aristocracy of the South, or the dismemberment of the Union and the formation of a confederacy founded on human slavery. That conspiracy culminated in rebellion, and would have ended with the infamous assass-sination of Abraham Lincoln but for the perfidy of Andrew Johnson. If Andrew Johnson had been true to the patriotic people who in the midst of terrible war intrusted him with the second office in the Republic, the constitutional amendment known as the fourteenth article, establishing equality of civil rights and assuring justice and protection to every American citizen, would have been gladly accepted and adopted by the people of the States lately in rebellion, and to-day the Union would have been restored and the nation on the high road to prosperity and grandeur.

Andrew Johnson is responsible for the present unfortunate condition of the southern people, and they will soon find that he has been their worst enemy. Under his influence the conspiracy which had been crushed by the patriotism of the people and the valor of our armies revived. At what particular period he became a party to that conspiracy it is impossible to determine from any evidence yet brought to light; but it was certainly not long after, if not before, the assassination of Mr. Lincoln. It is doubtful whether the truth as to that question will ever be known to the public. His conversation with Judge Mathews, at Cincinnati, in February, 1865, shows that he at that time contemplated treachery to the loyal people who elected him, if nothing worse. During several months after Andrew Johnson assumed the executive office he continued, in speeches and in conversations with loyal men, to express his determination to "punish traitors and make treason odious," when, at the same time, it is said upon good authority he was giving, privately, assurances to traitors that he was their friend. His first object was to deceive and distract the loyal people of the country, as a necessary means to enable him to accomplish his purposes. Much of his success in this respect is due to the unwillingness of the people to believe that any man could be so faithless and so lost to his own fair fame as to betray a confiding people who had already sacrificed thousands of millions of treasure and hundreds of thousands of their patriotic sons to save the life of the nation. His constant effort has been to make use of this confiding spirit of a patriotic people by constantly proclaiming his own boundless patriotism and great love for the Constitution, and charging the representatives of the people with the design of overthrowing the Constitution. In this he has but followed the example of all men who have heretofore usurped, or attempted to usurp or destroy, the rights of the people. Notwithstanding his efforts to cover up and conceal his real designs, they have been plainly visible in all his conduct since the meeting of the Thirty-Ninth Congress. Yet the facts which it would be necessary to prove to sustain an impeachment for his official misconduct, and his connection with the conspiracy to give the control of the Government to its enemies are so numerous and spread over so much time that impeachment could not be accomplished without seriously damaging all the greatest interests of the country depending upon the legislation of Congress. His trial would have absorbed the time and attention of Congress, to the exclusion of other business, for the next six months at least.

Now, we have a plain, premeditated violation of the Constitution and laws of Congress, requiring but few if any witnesses to establish the fact, the President having himself furnished the necessary proof of his guilt in writing. The time had come when it was necessary for the success of the conspiracy that he should have control of the Army. He had utterly failed in his attempt to inveigle or seduce General Grant to the support of his plans. His only remaining chance of success was to secure a pliant tool in the War Department. General Lorenzo Thomas, Adjutant General of the Army, who was kept out of the Adjutant General's office during the war because he was incompetent or could not be trusted or for other reasons, was just the man for the occasion, and the President determined to attempt a coup d'état in hopes to find that Congress had not the courage to meet the issue. He labored under the delusion that a majority of the Republicans in the House had heretofore opposed impeachment from fear of his power, whereas they were actuated, in a great measure, from the belief that his power for mischief had been so completely limited by the legislation of Congress that it would be better to endure him for another year than to spend the larger part of that year in impeaching him for his many abuses of power. They believed that the President could not defeat the reconstruction of the rebellious States on the congressional plan without resorting to direct violations of the Constitution and laws, for which he could be impeached without much trouble or delay. They knew that General Grant and the Army could not be used to overthrow the Republic at the instance of a recreant usurper. In this they were not mistaken.

The President has violated the Constitution and the laws of the United States, and attempted to involve the General and other officers of the Army in his unlawful acts. He underestimated the integrity and patriotism of these officers and failed in his object. What are the powers and duties of the President of the United States which are necessary to be inquired into in order to determine whether the President has been guilty of the offense charged, rendering him justly liable to impeachment? The Constitution defines his powers and duties in regard to removals and appointments, as follows:

"He shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States, whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided, and which shall be established by law; but the Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they may think proper in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of Departments."

"The President shall have power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session."

The Secretary of War is one of the officers who can only be appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate except where a vacancy occurs during the recess of the Senate. The Constitution nowhere gives him the power to create a vacancy by removal even during the recess of the Senate. It is true, it has become the practice for the President to exercise that power during the recess of the Senate, a practice in my opinion not warranted by the Constitution and never ought to have been allowed.

The powers and patronage of the executive office have been constantly increasing by usurpations and misconstructions of the Constitution, and unless these usurpations and misconstructions are checked all the powers of the Government will soon be concentrated in the President, and we shall have a monarchy or despotism instead of a free Republic. It is perfectly clear that the Constitution gives the President no power to remove the Secretary of War during the session of the Senate, and no other President ever dared to attempt such an act of usurpation.

The motive which induced Andrew Johnson to make the attempt is plain. He wanted a tool in the War Office who would aid him in his determination to transfer this Government into the hands of its enemies. He had good reason to believe that the Senate would not consent to the appointment of such a man. He must have well understood that the Constitution gave him no such power; but he determined to disregard the Constitution and to use force, if necessary, to eject Mr. Stanton and force his man into the War Office without the consent of the Senate, in flagrant violation of that Constitution which he had taken an oath to support.

I have thus far considered the question of the power of the President to remove from and appoint to office, as granted by the Constitution, without reference to the action of Congress upon the subject. The Thirty-Ninth Congress, foreseeing that the President would seek to use all the power of the Government and the Army to defeat the laws of Congress and carry into execution his own designs, enacted a law regulating the removal from and appointment to office, the first section of which provides—

"That every person holding any civil office to which he has been appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and every person who shall hereafter be appointed to any such office, and shall become duly qualified to act therein, is, and shall be, entitled to hold such office until a successor shall have been in like manner appointed and duly qualified, except as herein otherwise provided: Provided, That the Secretaries of State, of the Treasury, of War, of the Navy, and of the Interior, the Postmaster General, and the Attorney General shall hold their offices respectively for and during the term of the President by whom they may have been appointed and for one month thereafter, subject to removal by and with the advice and consent of the Senate."

It is contended by some that this section authorizes the President to remove the Secretary of War because he was appointed originally by President Lincoln and continued in office by Andrew Johnson. But the President did not so understand it when he suspended Mr. Stanton during the recess of the Senate by virtue of the authority given him in the second section of the law referred to, instead of removing him, as he undoubtedly would have done but for that law. This is only a weak subterfuge resorted to after he found that he could not use General Grant.

The second section authorizes the President to suspend, during the recess of the Senate, any officer appointed as aforesaid, excepting judges of the United States courts, who shall be guilty of misconduct in office, or crime, or for any reason shall become incapable or legally disqualified to perform its duties, and says:

"In such case, and in no other, the President may suspend such officer and designate some suitable person to perform temporarily the duties until the next meeting of the Senate."

The President is required to report his reasons for the suspension to the Senate within twenty days after the first day of its next meeting, with the evidence on which his action is founded.

"But if the Senate shall refuse to concur in such suspension, such officer, so suspended, shall forthwith resume the functions of his office," &c.

The sixth section reads as follows:

"SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That every removal, appointment, or employment made, had, or exercised contrary to the provisions of this act, and the making, signing, sealing, countersigning, or issuing of any commission or letter of authority for or in respect to any such appointment or employment, shall be deemed, and are hereby declared to be, high misdemeanors, and, upon trial and conviction thereof, every person guilty thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $10,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding five years, or both said punishments, in the discretion of the court: Provided, That the President shall have power to make out and deliver, after the adjournment of the Senate, commissions for all officers whose appointment shall have been advised and consented to by the Senate."

This law does nothing more than to enforce obedience to the Constitution in letter and spirit, and prescribe the penalty for the violation of it, making the violation a crime or high misdemeanor. The President so understood it, and recognized its validity in suspending Mr. Stanton instead of removing him during the recess of the Senate. But he expected to induce General Grant to take the responsibility of violating the law, and he used every artifice to accomplish that object. He even promised to pay the fine and endure the imprisonment himself if Grant would only commit the crime. I suppose if the crime he wished Grant to commit had been the murder of some Radical he would have just as readily promised to suffer the hanging in the place of the General. General Grant had no disposition to violate the law, and if he had placed any reliance whatever on Andrew Johnson's promises he would have shown himself a greater fool than his worst enemies take him to be.

Having entirely failed to implicate General Grant in his unlawful purposes the President finally determined to take the bold step on his own responsibility, and issued the following order :

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
WASHINGTON, D. C., February 21, 1868.

Sir: By virtue of the power and authority vested in me, as President, by the Constitution and laws of the United States, you are hereby removed from office as Secretary of the Department of War, and your functions as such will terminate upon the receipt of this communication.

You will transfer to Brevet Major General Lorenzo Thomas, Adjutant General of the Army, who has this day been authorized and empowered to act as Secretary of War ad interim, all records, books, papers, and other public property now in your custody and charge.

Respectfully yours,
ANDREW JOHNSON.
Hon. EDWIN M. STANTON, Washington, D. C.

On the same day this order was served upon Mr. Stanton and a copy sent by the President to the Senate of the United States, Lorenzo Thomas appeared at the office of the Secretary of War, demanding possession and threatening to take possession by force unless Mr. Stanton voluntarily surrendered it. Upon receipt of the President's message transmitting the order the Senate went into executive session to consider the subject, and after discussion passed the following resolution :

IN EXECUTIVE SESSION,
SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
February 21, 1868.

Whereas the Senate have read and considered the communication of the President, stating that he had removed Edwin M. Stanton, Secretary of War, and had designated the Adjutant General of the Army to act as Secretary of War ad interim: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate of the United States, That under the Constitution and laws of the United States the President has no power to remove the Secretary of War and designate any other officer to perform the duties of that office ad interim.

Here, Mr. Speaker, is a palpable and defiant violation, not only of a law passed by Congress under the Constitution of the United States, but of the Constitution itself. By this act Andrew Johnson committed a crime or high misdemeanor, punishable by fine and imprisonment, for which he is also liable to impeachment, and ought to be impeached and removed from the high office which he has so long and so often abused. I do not subscribe to the doctrine that the President of the United States can only be impeached for offenses made indictable by statute or at common law; but that question does not arise in this case, and I shall not stop to discuss it.

Andrew Johnson has been guilty of many acts of official misconduct, for which I think he deserved to be impeached, and I hope hereafter no President who follows in his footsteps will be permitted to escape so long. It is high time that all men should be made to understand that it is the duty of the President to execute the laws, not to make them, or to dictate to Congress what laws it shall pass, or to assume to himself the judicial function of deciding upon the constitutionality of any law duly passed by the legislative department of the Government.

Andrew Johnson has not only failed to execute the laws in good faith, but has conspired with others to defeat them. He would have succeeded to a much greater extent in his nefarious designs than he has but for the precautionary laws passed by Congress to prevent him. No doubt he would have long ago ordered General Grant away from Washington, or placed him under arrest, but for the provisions of the second section of a law passed March 2, 1867, which I will read :

"SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the headquarters of the General of the Army of the United States shall be at the city of Washington, and all orders and instructions relating to military operations issued by the President or Secretary of War shall be issued through the General of the Army, and in case of his inability through the next in rank. The General of the Army shall not be removed, suspended, or relieved from command or assigned to duty elsewhere than at said headquarters, except at his own request, without the previous approval of the Senate; and any orders or instructions relating to military operations issued contrary to the requirements of this section shall be null and void; and any officer who shall issue orders or instructions contrary to the provisions of this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor in office; and any officer of the Army who shall transmit, convey, or obey any orders or instructions so issued contrary to the provisions of this section, knowing that such orders were so issued, shall be liable to imprisonment for not less than two nor more than twenty years, upon conviction thereof in any court of competent jurisdiction."

The President's attempts to get around or over this law have been not only shameful but amusing. Finding that General Grant stood between him and the Army, and could neither be persuaded nor driven to lend himself to the unlawful designs of the President, and would not allow the Army to be used in violation of law, he attempted to supersede General Grant in command at Washington by creating a new department with headquarters at Washington, with the intention of placing General Sherman in command with a nomination as brevet general, which he supposed the Senate would not dare to reject. But General Sherman was not to be caught with such chaff. Failing in this by the good sense of General Sherman, he tries General George H. Thomas with the same bait, and with like success. Having failed to entrap the leading generals, and induce them to take a position antagonistic to General Grant, he next tampers with officers lower in command to ascertain whether they could be induced to obey orders directly from the President in disregard of the law. But he could find none so forgetful of duty or so void of patriotism as to lend themselves to his base purposes. Yet some have feared and others have threatened that the President will use the Army to resist the action of Congress if he should be impeached and sentenced to removal from office upon conviction. All such talk is idle nonsense. Andrew Johnson will be impeached by the House, convicted by the Senate, and removed from office without the firing of a gun or the loss of a man. The country will then be rid of an incubus which has retarded its prosperity, encouraged its enemies, and discouraged its friends during the last two years. The moment honest BEN WADE takes charge of the helm of State traitors will be silent, patriots will rejoice, and confidence in the stability of our free institutions will be restored, and Andrew Johnson will be remembered only to be despised for his faithlessness. On the 4th of March, 1869, General U. S. Grant will be inaugurated President of the United States, and the great conspiracy of the slaveholders and their Democratic allies of the North against the inalienable rights of man and to perpetuate human slavery will be crushed forever.

SPEECH OF HON. RUFUS MALLORY, OF OREGON,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 24, 1868,

On the resolution reported by the Committee on Reconstruction for the impeachment of the President.

MR. MALLORY. Mr. Speaker, it may not be doing more than justice to myself to ask the indulgence of the House for a few moments to state the reasons that will control my action on the resolution now here pending. I am one of those Union men who, when a resolution similar to the one now under consideration was reported by a majority of the Judiciary Committee, opposed its adoption. The considerations that controlled my action then are not necessarily involved in this discussion, yet it may not be out of place for me here to say that in wandering through the labyrinthine mazes of the ponderous volumes of testimony presented by the Judiciary Committee to the House, I failed to find in it that which in my humble judgment would justify me, as a sworn Representative, to declare that upon that testimony the President of the United States was guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors, and ought to be called to answer at the bar of the high court of impeachment for his wrongful action and for his willful and wicked violation of the law. The charges of usurpation of power, the abuse of the appointing, the pardoning, and the veto power which the Executive is authorized to use in his discretion, having no rule defined and fixed by law within which such discretion shall be confined, requires of us, in the consideration of these charges, that we forget not the frailty of human wisdom and the proneness to err in the human judgment without a willful intent to commit a crime or do a wrong. It was the lack of sufficient proof to show the animus of Andrew Johnson in these acts that caused me to vote against his impeachment then, but it was far from being a declaration that I approved his conduct.

The honorable gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Beck] intimates that it is the purpose of the dominant party to hurry this matter through for the purpose of lashing the "timid and conservative of the party into voting for it." I desire to say to the honorable gentleman, if the fact of my having opposed this proposition induces him to class me among the timid or conservative who are to be lashed in by this haste to vote for the resolution, he is very much mistaken. I, sir, am here to act under the "lash" of no political party. The excitement of the hour in no manner affects my judgment or controls my reason. I have no feeling of hate or desire for vengeance. Against Andrew Johnson I have no animosity; he has done me no personal wrong, save as he has wronged the great American people, of whom I am one; but having wronged both them and me, in their name I demand that by the forms of the Constitution and the laws he shall be brought before the bar of justice to answer for his offending. In the performance of such a duty I shall proceed with clean hands and a pure heart. I shall act with the ever present consciousness that I am under the solemn obligation of an oath to support the Constitution and the laws, and that for my action I must answer to God and the country. The question as it is now presented to the House is without intricacies, and in no way surrounded with doubt. The act is a plain one, and is affirmed and entered upon the record over the President's own signature. He has removed Edwin M. Stanton, Secretary of the Department of War, and has appointed and commissioned Brevet Major General Lorenzo Thomas to be Secretary of War ad interim without the advice and consent of the Senate while that body was in actual session, contrary to and in express and positive violation of an existing law of the United States making such removal and appointment a high misdemeanor.

Take for a moment the most favorable view in which the President himself demands that his case shall be considered. Admit, as he claims, that under the Constitution he alone possesses the power of removal from office, and how does he stand before the country? I know of no higher or better rule by which he shall be tried, in this view of the case, than that laid down by one of the most eminent of the framers of the Constitution, James Madison. He, sir, while holding that the Constitution granted to the Executive the power of removal from office as a necessary incident to the exercise of the executive power, has not failed to place upon the record a clear and distinct definition of the very offense of which Andrew Johnson stands now charged, even though the tenure-of-office law had never been enacted.

HO. OF REPS.

Impeachment—Mr. Mallory.

40TH CONG....2D SESS.

Among other things, says Judge Story, speaking of the President of the United States:

"He must be presumed to possess integrity, independence, and high talents. It would be impossible that he should abuse the patronage of the Government, or his power of removal to the base purpose of gratifying a party or ministering to his own resentments, or of displacing upright and excellent officers for a mere difference of opinion. The public odium which would inevitably attach to such conduct would be a perfect security against it. And, in truth, removals made from such motives, or with a view to bestow the offices upon dependents or favorites, would be an impeachable offense. One of the most distinguished framers of the Constitution on that occasion, after having expressed his opinion decidedly in favor of the existence of the power of removal in the Executive, added: 'In the first place, he will be impeachable by this House before the Senate for such an act of maladministration; for I contend that the wanton removal of meritorious officers would subject him to impeachment and removal from his high trust.'"—2 Story on the Const., sec. 1541.

Apply this rule to the case of the President, now under consideration, and he stands impeached by this House, and, sir, is already impeached by the great people of the nation, for a "wanton removal of a meritorious officer," for the purpose of ministering to his own resentments, and placing in his stead some fawning sycophant who, for the sake of his patron, will consent to become a pliant tool in his hands for the accomplishment of his base purpose. Whatever may have been his own opinion of the conduct of the Secretary of War to justify him in suspending Mr. Stanton from the War Office during the recess of Congress in 1867, certainly no consideration that induced that action can be urged as a defense for this. He communicated to the Senate his own action in the suspension of Mr. Stanton and his reason for that action. After a full and deliberate consideration of the reasons assigned and the charges so presented the Senate found that there was no cause for his removal. Since that decision the President has refused to require Mr. Stanton to perform any of the duties of his office, and he cannot, therefore, have been guilty of any new official offense. And besides, sir, in sending to the Senate his message informing them of his removal of Mr. Stanton and the appointment of General Thomas ad interim, he makes no new charges against Mr. Stanton, but leaves him as the Senate left him, acquitted before the country of any offense that would justify his removal. What, then, has prompted him to this last act but a willful purpose to set at defiance the high authority of the Constitution by the "wanton removal of a meritorious officer" for the base purpose of gratifying a party and ministering to his own resentment and vengeance—an act which Mr. Madison says "would subject him to impeachment and removal from his high trust." Here, then, sir, he stands condemned by the construction which he himself claims for the Constitution, as that construction and acts like his under it are passed upon by Mr. Madison himself. He is condemned out of his own mouth; destroyed by his own philosophy; guilty by his own law.

But let us now examine upon what ground this power of removal from office is vested alone in the President. The President asserts that the power is derived solely from the Constitution, that it is a power that has been recognized and exercised by every President from the adoption of the Constitution to the present time. Let us see the authority. Says Judge Story:

"It is observable that the Constitution makes no mention of any power of removal by the Executive of any officers whatsoever. As, however, the tenure of office of no officers, except those in the judicial department, is by the Constitution provided to be during good behavior, it follows by irresistible inference that all others must hold their offices during pleasure, unless Congress shall have given some duration to their office."

The only ground, then, that the President finds in the Constitution upon which to base this sole power of removal from office is its utter silence and omission to vest that power in any single individual or body of men. It is not a power vested in the Executive in express terms, nor is it a power that arises as a necessary implication from the language used. The appointing power is specially defined in the Constitution. The language is:

"He shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur. And he shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate shall appoint, ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for and which shall be established by law."

"The President shall have power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during a recess of the Senate by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session."

The power of appointment is given to the President, but that power can only be exercised "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate." He may nominate without their "advice or consent," but he can only appoint by and with it. Is it a plainer inference to be drawn from this language that it was the intention of the framers of the Constitution to vest the power of removal in the Executive alone than that it should be vested in the power authorized to appoint? If the power to appoint was too great to be vested in one man I can see no reason that would justify that conclusion that would not apply with equal force when it is sought to give him the sole power of removal. If the former is a power so arbitrary and monarchical as to make its exercise dangerous to the best interests and liberty of the country the latter is not less so. Says Judge Story:

"It would convert all the officers of the country into mere tools and creatures of the President. A dependence so servile on one individual would deter men of high and honorable minds from engaging in the public service."

The silence of the Constitution upon the power of removal, and the specific declaration of who shall appoint, leads to the irresistible inference that, in the absence of legislation fixing a different rule, the power to remove is vested in and is inseparable from the power to appoint, which is not the President, but the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The events and discussion that took place contemporaneous with the framing and adoption of the Constitution are as likely to lead us to the true object of the framers of that instrument as any other to which we can refer. To the framers of the Constitution this matter was familiar. The construction claimed for this clause by those who sought to defeat it was the same as that which Andrew Johnson places upon it now. Such a construction was never claimed for it by any of its friends until long after its adoption; but the position was combated and so successfully refuted that the States were induced to adopt it, acting upon the belief that the power of removal was vested in the same hands as the power of appointment. Alexander Hamilton, writing to the Federalist, on the 4th of April, 1788, says:

"It has been mentioned as one of the advantages from the cooperation of the Senate in the business of appointments that it would contribute to the stability of the Administration. The consent of that body would be necessary to displace as well as to appoint," &c.

Here, sir, it is established beyond peradventure, by events contemporaneous with the adoption of the Constitution, that the friends of that instrument contended for the concurrence of the Senate in the removing power, while its enemies then, as now, claimed that this power belonged to the Executive. A further and still stronger evidence that the statesmen of that day did not claim this construction is shown in the fact that no such power was exercised or claimed to exist until, by legislation, after thorough and protracted discussion, it was given to George Washington, then President of the United States, and the splendor that attached to his character did more than any other thing to bring about that result; and it will be proper to observe that the act of July, 1789, conferring the power of removal in certain cases upon the President, only passed the Senate by the casting vote of the Vice President, when that power was to be conferred on no less pure and faultless a man than George Washington. In this decision the public have acquiesced. Judge Story, in his Commentaries on the Constitution, section fifteen hundred and forty-three, volume two, page 343, gives the following opinion on this subject:

"That the final decision of this question so made was greatly influenced by the exalted character of the President then in office was asserted at the time and has always been believed. Yet the doctrine was opposed as well as supported by the highest talent and patriotism of the country. The public, however, acquiesced in this decision; and it constitutes, perhaps, the most extraordinary case in the history of a Government of a power conferred by implication on the Executive by the assent of a bare majority of Congress which has not been questioned on many other occasions. Even the most jealous advocates of State rights seem to have slumbered over this vast reach of authority, and have left it untouched as the neutral ground of controversy in which they desire to reap no harvest, and from which they retired without leaving any protestations of title or contest. Nor is this acquiescence and silence without a satisfactory explanation. Until a very recent period the power had been exercised in few cases, and generally such as led to their own vindication. During the administration of President Washington few removals were made, and none without cause; few were made in that of President Adams. In that of President Jefferson the circle was greatly enlarged, but yet it was kept within narrow bounds, and with an express disclaimer of the right to remove for differences of opinion or otherwise than for some clear public good. In the administration of the subsequent Presidents, Madison, Monroe, and John Q. Adams, a general moderation and forbearance were exercised, with the approbation of the country, and without disturbing the harmony of the system. Since the induction into office of President Jackson an opposite course has been pursued, and a system of removals and new appointments to office has been pursued so extensively that it has reached a very large proportion of all the offices of honor and profit in the civil departments of the country. This is matter of fact, and beyond the statement of the fact it is not the intention of the Commentator to proceed."

"This extraordinary change of system has awakened general attention, and brought back the whole controversy with regard to the executive power of removal to a severe scrutiny. Many of the most eminent statesmen of the country have expressed a deliberate opinion that it is utterly indefensible, and that the only sound interpretation of the Constitution is that it avowed upon its adoption; that is to say, that the power of removal belongs to the appointing power."

Thus it will be seen, according to the learned commentator, that it was not only the express understanding of the Constitution at the time of its adoption that the removing was vested in the appointing power, and not alone in the Executive, but that that power was never claimed or sought to be exercised by him until conferred by act of Congress, and it is regarded as most remarkable that such a grant of power by a "mere majority of Congress" should have been so long and so silently acquiesced in. The people are referred to as having "slumbered over this vast reach of authority" upon such legislation sustained only by an implied power in the Constitution.

The First Congress that assembled under the Constitution and passed the act of 1789 granting this power of removal to the Executive evidently did not regard it inherent in the President under the Constitution, else they would not have deemed it necessary to confer it by law.

The right of the President to exercise this power under and by virtue of the Constitution is at once negated when the fact is established, as it has been, that such power was conferred in the first instance by congressional enactments, which may, by any subsequent Congress, be altered, amended, or repealed, thereby changing, modifying, or even destroying the power. The right to pass a law conferring a power implies the right to repeal the law and destroy the power. This power, conferred by act of 1789, continued in force until 1867, when the Congress by another act changed that law and deprived the President of the power. The law conferring it he recognizes and seeks to avail himself of for the accomplishment of his foul purposes, while that denying it he denounces as not within the pale of the Constitution, and arrogates to himself the right to act in the capacity both of judicial and executive officer. He flaunts his insolent denunciations into the face of the Congress, and bids them and the people an insulting and menacing defiance. No man was ever found who dared, even under the operation of the law of 1789, to assume the right to do what Andrew Johnson here stands charged with doing, and whose only plea to the charge is "guilty"—that of the wanton and unjustifiable removal of a meritorious and efficient officer from a high position in the Government while the Senate is in actual session. The Constitution provides that—

"The President shall have power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate by granting commissions, which shall expire at the end of their next session."

But where, sir, does he find the power to cause a vacancy to happen by his most royal order, his most princely order, that he may fill it with an ad interim appointment during the session of the Senate? It is not found in the written words of the Constitution, nor does it come as necessary inference from the language used; but, sir, it is in direct opposition and bold defiance of the plain letter and spirit of the written law. The Constitution gives him power to fill vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate, but it gives him no more power to create a vacancy as he has done here than it gave to John Wilkes Booth the right by the use of the assassin's pistol to create the vacancy in the presidential office which Andrew Johnson fills to-day but to disgrace. If he may exercise such a power in this case he has only to remove every civil officer who will not consent to be a fawning slave to his will, obedient to his nod, ready and willing to be a tool in his hands to perpetuate his power and destroy the Republic, and appoint others, ad interim, whom he can control and retain them in power, independent of the Senate, by sending to them for confirmation such men as that body could not and would not indorse and confirm, thus enabling him to hold within his single grasp the whole power of appointment, as well as removal, in spite of the Constitution and in defiance of the Senate. Like any tyrant, he commends the act that confers power upon him; but upon those who dare assert the right to take that power away he would visit speedy and sure destruction. He essays to place himself upon the Constitution as he interprets it, and defy the law. He assumes that a power once vested by law comes to have the dignity of a constitution and cannot be changed—a position which needs only to be stated to be denied. Having never possessed any power to remove from office other than that conferred by legislation how does he stand in the light of the last legislation upon that subject? Let us see. On the 2d day of March, 1867, the Congress passed by a two-third vote of both Houses, and after the same had been vetoed by the President, a bill of which the following is a part. Section one provides—

"That every person holding any civil office to which he has been appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and every person who shall hereafter be appointed to any such office and shall become duly qualified to act therein, is, and shall be, entitled to hold such office until a successor shall have been in like manner duly appointed and qualified, except as herein otherwise provided: Provided, That the Secretaries of State, of the Treasury, of War, of the Navy, and of the Interior, and the Postmaster General and Attorney General shall hold their offices respectively for and during the term of the President by whom they may have been appointed, and for one month thereafter, subject to removal by and with the advice and consent of the Senate."

Section six provides:

countersigning, or issuing of any commission or letter of authority, for or in respect to any such appointment or employment, shall be deemed, and are hereby declared, to be high misdemeanors, and upon trial and conviction thereof every person guilty thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $10,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding five years, or both said punishments, in the discretion of the court."

By the first section of the act of March 2, 1867, the act of 1789 is changed so as to take from the President the sole power of removal and vesting it in the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, going back to the rule as it was understood to exist in the Constitution at the time of its adoption. The sixth section fixes the penalty for its violation. This law Andrew Johnson has in the removal of Edwin M. Stanton, Secretary of the Department of War, purposely and willfully violated, and in the most insolent and arrogant manner—in a manner better becoming a tyrant or a despot than a President of a free, constitutional, republican Government, defied the law-making power, and assumes to become a law unto himself. He has removed Mr. Stanton without authority of the Constitution, removed him without authority of and in direct and positive opposition to the letter and spirit of the law; removed him that in the act he might the more effectually advertise his contempt for the Congress which he so bitterly characterized as "an unconstitutional body hanging as it were upon the very verge of the Government;" removed him because it was the boldest, plainest, surest act he could commit to tell this Congress that in his most gracious judgment they are a set of arrant cowards, and, bidding them do their worst, stands here to defy them; removed him to notify the people that he had concluded to become what he assured them he might before have been—a dictator. The nation's escutcheon is so stained and blackened with his offendings that we should be cowards, indeed, if we did not purge it of this pestiferous plague spot, that we may hand it down to those who shall come after us bright, pure, and spotless as in days of yore.

But we are told that it was only his intention to try the question of the constitutionality of the law in the courts, and no more. Mr. Speaker, I have to say that, so far as I am concerned, in this he shall not be disappointed. He may not be pleased with the details of the trial; but I can assure him that he shall have the full benefit of my little influence to have the question tried in the highest court of the nation; not, sir, as he may have hoped it would be, General Grant at the bar of justice, with the President's promise of vicarious suffering in case he should be found guilty; not with Mr. Stanton to answer for offenses of which Johnson alone is responsible, but with the chief criminal arraigned for his own offenses, crimes, and misdemeanors before the bar of the high court of impeachment, there to have determined whether or not a law passed by Congress, according to the forms of the Constitution, is for him to obey or defy. There is no higher court than this, none that possess higher power or judges better skilled in the meaning of the Constitution. If Andrew Johnson finds himself in a higher court, and in a closer relation to it than he expected to be, he ought to be more than satisfied. He clamors for justice and the law, and I propose that he shall have it, and even more than he desires.

But, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] raises a voice of warning, and bids us beware! beware!! beware!!! how we proceed to impeach the President. Sir, that advice is well; that warning is well. It is not best that we proceed with indecent haste with so grave a matter; but, sir, if the honorable gentleman meant by his remarks to insinuate that the Democratic bone and sinew and muscle of the Army and the country to which he referred would take up the gauntlet to keep Andrew Johnson in power by force and make him dictator and supreme ruler of this nation, I will tell him, sir, that if a million of swords leaped from their scabbards to put an end to rebellion and anarchy, ten millions will more quickly leap forth to strike down any and all who dare presume to attempt build a despotism upon the ruins of this Republic; and I thank the gentleman from New York for the word he has taught me; I bid him and his boasted Democratic bone and muscle to "beware" how either he or they engage in such an undertaking. For the corrupt use and the vile abuse of the power he claims that the Constitution gives him he is impeachable by the highest authority he urges in his own defense. For the willful usurpation of power which he cannot claim to possess, either under the Constitution or the act of 1789, in causing a vacancy to "happen" in a high civil office, and making an appointment to fill that vacancy without the advice and consent of the Senate, when that body was in actual session, he stands impeachable. For the removal of Hon. Edwin M. Stanton from the office of Secretary of the Department of War, in opposition to and in defiance of the act of March 2, 1867, he stands impeachable. For appointing and commissioning General Lorenzo Thomas to be Secretary of the Department of War ad interim, without the advice and consent of the Senate, when that body was in session, and contrary to and in defiance of the act of March 2, 1867, he stands impeachable. For these and each and all of these offenses Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, ought to be, and under God I believe he will be, impeached of high crimes and misdemeanors in office, and will be brought down from the high position he has proved himself unfit and unworthy to fill.

Impeachment.

SPEECH OF HON. JULIUS HOTCHKISS,
OF CONNECTICUT.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
February 24, 1868,

On the resolution reported by the Committee on Reconstruction for the impeachment of the President.

MR. HOTCHKISS. Mr. Speaker, it is with mingled feelings of grief and alarm that I address the House on the present occasion—in grief on account of the fact that I see the machinery of Government contrived for our safety prostituted to mere party ends and purposes by a proceeding not only entirely uncalled for upon any facts which have come to our knowledge, but altogether unwarranted by the Constitution and the laws; alarm, because every lover of his country and his kind must look upon the proceedings of the House during the past two days as most signal yet most lamentable evidences of that destruction that threatens not only our form of Government, but the principles upon which it is founded. We are so rapidly removing the ancient landmarks, those metes and bounds of the Constitution that define the duties and preserve the individuality of each branch of the Government, that, in a few years, instead of a republican form of government, we will have resolved ourselves into a radical despotism of unbridled and omnipotent parliament on the one hand, or into an unchecked, uncontrolled, and autocratic tyranny on the other.

It has been the hope of the American patriot, the fond dream of the American statesman, that although heretofore every republic in the world has degenerated into an unlicensed democracy, only to be crushed eventually under the armed heel of a military dictatorship or the scepter of an absolute despotism, yet the Republic of the United States would prove an exception to this general rule. Is this hope of the patriot to be so shortly dashed to earth? Is this dream of the statesman to be nothing but a dream after all; and simply for the reason that in order to preserve the ascendancy of a faction the Constitution is to be violated whenever necessary to that end, and laws are to be constantly passed to meet emergencies that seem to threaten not the integrity of the Government but the safety of a party? In any Government, republican or monarchical, when laws are passed for mere personal or party ends, when the Constitution is constantly violated; both in spirit and letter, in order to preserve the life of a failing faction, the result must surely be the destruction of the rights, liberties, and property of the people, and thus the subversion of all true order. Heretofore, in our country, parties have aimed ostensibly, at least, at perfecting laws designed to benefit the whole body-politic. Now, however, the sole end and aim of modern radicalism appear to be to perpetuate its party power through a series of acts which are not only rapidly undermining the personal rights and liberties of the people, but are changing the entire structure of the Government, limiting, curtailing, and destroying the functions of certain departments of it on the one hand, and on the other enlarging, extending, and making despotic certain other departments. It is claimed by the advocates of radicalism that the executive department is assuming arbitrary and unconstitutional powers. At the same time these powers so charged as thus assumed are so clearly within the constitutional scope of its functions that it has been found necessary on the part of Congress to pass special acts curtailing those functions, and thus causing the presidential office to be shorn of rights that it had exercised from the very foundation of the Government. The civil tenure act, under which it is proposed to impeach the President, is a specimen of these special acts.

But it is strange that the very department of the Government which the Radicals desire to deprive of its functions as delegated to it by the Constitution, on the ground that the President is usurping authority, is that very department which the fathers of the Constitution regarded as least likely to usurp authority not conferred upon it. They justly considered that our Government was not one in which numerous and extensive prerogatives are placed in the hands of an hereditary monarch. Were this so the executive department might be very justly regarded as the source of danger and watched with all the zeal which patriotism and a love of liberty would naturally inspire. Says the Federalist:

"In a democracy where a multitude of people exercise in person the legislative functions and are continually exposed by their incapacity for regular deliberation and concerted measures to the ambitious intrigues of their executive magistrates tyranny may well be apprehended, on some favorable emergency, to start up in the same quarter. But in a representative republic, where the executive magistracy is carefully limited, both in the extent and duration of its power, and where the legislative power is exercised by an assembly which is inspired by a supposed influence over the people, with an intrepid confidence in its own strength, which is sufficiently numerous to feel all the passions which actuate a multitude, yet not so numerous as to be incapable of pursuing the objects of its passions by means which reason prescribes, it is against the enterprising ambition of this department that the people ought to indulge all their jealousy and exhaust all their precautions. The legislative department derives its superiority in our Government from other circumstances. Its constitutional power being at once more extensive and less susceptible of precise limits, it can with greater facility mask under complicated and in direct measures the encroachments which it makes under the coördinate departments."

And is not this what Congress is now doing and has been from the day the Radical party came into power to the present, when this crowning act of usurpation, the proposed impeachment of the President, is about to be consummated?

Mr. Jefferson had a thorough appreciation of the dangers of legislative usurpation. In the case of his own State (Virginia) he took strong grounds against the intermingling or intermixing of the three great departments of the State. In order to convey fully the ideas with which his experience had impressed him on this subject allow me to quote a passage of some length from his "Notes on the State of Virginia," page 195:

"All the powers of government—legislative, executive, and judiciary—result to the legislative body. The concentrating of these in the same hands is precisely the definition of despotic government. It will be no alleviation that these powers will be exercised by a plurality of hands and not by a single one. One hundred and seventy-three despots would surely be as oppressive as one. Let those who doubt it turn their eyes on the republic of Venice. As little will it avail us that they are chosen by ourselves. An elective despotism is not the government we fought for; but one which should not only be founded on free principles but in which the powers of government should be so divided and balanced among several bodies of the magistracy as that no one could transcend their legal limits without being effectually checked and restrained by the others. For this reason that convention which passed the ordinance of government laid its foundation on this basis, that the legislative, executive, and judiciary departments should be separate and distinct, so that no person should exercise the powers of more than one of them at the same time. But no barrier was provided between these powers. The judiciary and executive members were left dependent on the legislative for their subsistence in office, and some of them for continuance in it. If, therefore, the Legislature assumes executive and judiciary powers, no opposition is likely to be made, nor, if made, can be effectual, because in that case they may put their proceedings into the form of an act of Assembly, which will render them obligatory on the other branches. They have, accordingly, in many instances, decided rights which should have been left to judiciary controversy, and the direction of the executive during the whole time of their session is becoming habitual and familiar."

Thus, while we have the testimony of the fathers of the Constitution that it is from usurpations of the legislative department that the liberties of the people have most to fear, we have the acts of a revolutionary faction in the country proclaiming to-day that this very condition of things of which the fathers so repeatedly warned us has reached such a point as to threaten the very existence of the Government. Under the pretext of checking some contemplated or threatened usurpation of the Executive Congress is constantly passing acts depriving him of privileges and prerogatives exercised by that department since 1789. The result is that the President is completely restricted in the selection of his Cabinet officers; and, instead of being his confidential advisers, under the immediate influence of no other branch of the Government, but unbiased in their judgments, he is surrounded by a set of men who are not in sympathy with him, either socially or politically; and thus, instead of being left free to exercise his judgment as provided for by the Constitution, and in strict accordance with the genius of the Government, he becomes the mere tool and instrument of Congress, bound to do its behests without reflection or question. Under such circumstances of what use is the office of President? Congress might as well decree that its own officers sign its acts as that they should be sent to such an automatic Executive as they would constitute Mr. Johnson.

Let me review the case. Let us, then, impeach and remove the President, and install Senator WADE, President of the Senate, in his place. Suppose, in that case, that Messrs. Seward, Wells, McCulloch, Stanbery, Randall, and Browning refuse to retire from the Cabinet, in what sort of a position would Mr. WADE find himself? How could he or how would he counsel with these gentlemen? If they were any of them like Mr. Stanton, morally or socially, to say nothing of politically, destitute of ideas and principles which regulate the intercourse between gentlemen, they would have it in their power, as it was in his, to act as spies upon the new President; and that Stanton acted in such a despicable capacity is a matter of public notoriety. In such a case what man on the Democratic side of the House would be found so recreant to all ideas and principles, as respects the amenities of life and of those courtesies that characterize the association of gentlemen with each other, to say nothing of the traditions of the Government and the well-known rules laid down in the case of the President and his Cabinet ministers, as to compel the President to daily counsel with men with whom he cannot politically be in accord? It is true that Mr. WADE might get along socially very well, and keep on excellent speaking terms with the above gentlemen, knowing them to be gentlemen who have not violated the plainest duties and commonest courtesies of official and social intercourse. But how could he possibly be expected to associate with them on terms of respectful and kindly intercourse which demanded the cordial greetings habitual to the association of gentlemen with each other if he knew these persons to be common spies upon his actions and common informers, hanging upon every word that fell from his lips like a detective upon the words of a supposed criminal, and anxious to entrap him in some careless moment into an expression that might be tortured into something approaching to a violation of law. No, gentlemen; he could not be expected to do this—to associate with men who in that case would be worse than criminals in the eyes of society; and all because Congress considered that he was an obstacle to the consummation of certain measures it desired to force upon the country. The party that would force a President to do this; the Congress that would so pervert the principles of the Constitution, so outrage the genius of the Government, and so stultify itself as regards an appreciation of the nature and character of our institutions, would be simply guilty of a profanation of republicanism. But is not this what the Radical party appears determined to do in the case of the President and Mr. Stanton, and which is the cause of this terrible impeachment movement?

When Mr. Montgomery Blair, Mr. Lincoln's Postmaster General, fell under the displeasure of the leading Radicals, a number of them, including several Senators, addressed a letter to Mr. Lincoln asking Mr. Blair's removal from the Cabinet, on the ground that the President should be aided by a Cabinet council in perfect accord with him and his measures. Mr. Blair immediately tendered his resignation to Mr. Lincoln, which that gentleman subsequently accepted. Had Mr. Blair then acted as Mr. Stanton has acted with Mr. Johnson what a howl these Radical gentlemen would have raised against him. Indeed, could any one at the time have been found in either party to sustain him in such a course as Mr. Stanton has since pursued?

Who is Edwin M. Stanton? Is it not on record that he is a spy upon the President and an informer in the service if not the pay of the Radical party? Here we have a Cabinet officer passing from the presence of the President, after cordially greeting him, and immediately proceeding to the residence of some prominent Radical, into which he steals, perhaps, under cover of darkness in order to betray the confidence of the man he had just left. Does history exhibit a record of such baseness as this? In all the ages have we presented to us a similar instance of such utter and unmitigated treachery? It is scarcely necessary for me to refer to this man's political record in order to paint his character in any darker colors than it is presented to the people of the United States in his intercourse with President Johnson in his capacity as Cabinet adviser. I need not tell you that he kept our poor soldiers starving at Andersonville; I need not tell you of his paid spies in private families; I need not tell you of his instrumentality in the official murder of an innocent woman; I need not tell you of his encouragement of secession until the country was plunged into a terrible war, and of his sudden conversion to radicalism; I need not tell you of the perfidy of his nine reasons for condemning the gallant Sherman, wherein he attempted to blast the fame of the noblest soldier of the war, nor of the sheepishness with which he quailed before the scornful glance of that proud and honest soldier, when, in the face of the world, he refused to take his hand, and turned his back upon him as he would upon a loathsome reptile. But, in all the history of this man's checkered social and political existence, of all the crimes of which he has been guilty, this base treachery, this foul perfidy of his to President Johnson stands out so prominently as to dwarf the rest by comparison with its unparalleled and unapproachable villainess and its unmitigated meanness. Yet this is the man for the removal of whom from his Cabinet and his presence we are called upon to impeach the President. This is the poor, despicable character for whom this country is to be plunged into the vortex of perhaps a bloody revolution. Can radicalism, in the very ecstasy of its madness, in the blindness of partisan passion, go further than this?

I come here, Mr. Speaker, from the busy scenes of a business life. I only review this question from the light of that experience and common observation outside of those legal acquirements possessed by the great majority of this House. In the absence of the more cultivated reasons of the schools, truth often, as by intuition, drops its sacred light into the inquiring mind. I believe a good deal in that native wit which goes straight to the mark, which strips the sophistries the lawyer has flung around the naked truth or the naked falsehood from the form thereof, and reveals it to the world in all the elegance of its beauty or all the hideousness of its deformity. I am not skilled in the subtleties of legal ratiocination, of that art which sometimes clothes falsehood with the garb of truth, and thus often deceives the honest inquirer after the genuine article. I leave the task of making the worse appear the better reason to the gentlemen of the legal profession, who compose two thirds of the radical side of the House, which fact alone would almost indicate that the whole proceeding is a conspiracy of lawyers for partisan purposes. And who so able to carry such a conspiracy forward to ultimate success as the members of a profession whose business as often leads them to engage on the side of evil as on the side of good, to take part with the wrong as often as with the right, with the oppressor as often as with the oppressed? To my poor judgment a lawyer, especially a radical lawyer, though calculated to make a very respectable politician and a very unscrupulous partisan, is as often liable to fail as a clear-headed and dispassionate statesman.

But before reviewing the action for which it is proposed to impeach the President in a necessarily cursory manner let me call attention to the man himself. I must confess that I have sympathy for him on account of his origin. He is what we call a self-made man; a man risen from obscurity to the highest position by the force of his native genius, and in spite of the obstacles which surrounded him. I might say that he was compelled to fight his way through life; all the time, as it were, "wrestling favors from fortune," not by means of superior literary attainments, but in spite of them, and in defiance of those fine-drawn sophistries which spring from the continual use of cultivated intellectual weapons and artificial intellectual armor in the battle of life. When Mr. Johnson entered the political arena, in the arena of the profession which he chose as his means of livelihood, he was compelled, like the simple squire of old, to fight the mailed knight armed with his sword and spear with the quarter-staff or the rude bill-hook; he was compelled to break through the guard of his adversary by the sheer force of his resolute will and indomitable courage. There is nothing of the cunning of the conspirator by nature or of the man whose profession teaches him how to break the laws by simply evading their pains and penalties in Mr. Johnson. He is evidently a man rugged almost to rudeness in the honesty of his speech, and open and above board in all his actions. He believed this tenure-of-office bill unconstitutional. He repeatedly so declared. He vetoed it on that ground. He thought he had a right to test its constitutionality in the courts, and he went about doing so in the only way open to him.

The terms of the law are such that he was unable to test the legality of the bill before the courts without (according to the lawyers on the other side of this House and of the Senate) exposing himself to impeachment. He could not obtain a quo warrant without removing, or attempting to remove, Mr. Stanton. But, according to the lawyers, who must have made this law especially with the purpose of entrapping him, he could not remove Mr. Stanton, even in form, without impeachment. Thus was he left with this obnoxious man in his Cabinet, like a horse-leech upon the human body while the hands of that body were tied, and with no possible means of ridding himself of him. Like a hungry dog whose fangs "stick," Stanton could neither be coaxed nor pulled away from his prey. From the hour that the Senate had reinstated him in his position, in the teeth of the opposition of the President, who could scarcely be expected to associate with a skulking spy, to the present, he has remained actually camped in the War Department, which he has had guarded with a detail of troops from the regular Army. Of late no one is admitted into his presence except those who are conspiring with him to prostitute the Government of the United States to a military despotism, or a consolidated and centralized oligarchy, part civil and part military—the civil portion being controlled by the votes of negroes just released from slavery and totally ignorant of the rights and duties of freemen or of the laws necessary to regulate the interests and protect the rights of a civilized people. Mr. Stanton's continuance in the War Department is part of the programme of the party that is determined to retain possession of the Government by fraud and even force. I have said that Mr. Stanton could not be coaxed or driven out of the War Office. General Sherman, for the good of the country, consented (notwithstanding that he despises the man and would have no communication with him except he considered the most urgent necessities of state required it) to call on Mr. Stanton and request him to resign. On this subject he wrote to the President on the 18th of January, as follows:

"The General (Grant) proposed this course. He will call upon you to-morrow, and offer to go to Mr. Stanton, to say, for the good of the service and of the country, he ought to resign. This on Sunday. On Monday I will again call on you, and, if you think it necessary, I will do the same—call on Mr. Stanton and tell him to resign. If he will not, then it will be time to contrive ulterior measures."

General Grant, in his late correspondence with the President, admits that he agreed with General Sherman upon the propriety of Stanton's resignation. He says on this subject:

"On the 15th ultimo, in presence of General Sherman, I stated to you that I thought Mr. Stanton would resign, but I did not say that I would advise him to do so. On the 18th I did agree with General Sherman to go and advise him to that course."

But why did not Mr. Stanton resign, as thus requested? Simply because the revolutionary cabal would not let him. It would disarrange their presidential programme. It would jeopardize the interests and even the existence of the party. Accordingly the same men who forced him to refuse to yield up his portfolio to General Thomas forced him to turn a deaf ear to the requests and entreaties of Generals Grant and Sherman. No, gentlemen; it was all in vain. General Grant and other members of his own party coaxed him; General Thomas was sent to put him out; but he was deaf as well to the entreaties of the former as to the demand of the latter. According, then, to the view of the men who framed this law, the President had no means of testing its constitutionality except through the branch of the Government which enacted it, and which is certainly an anomaly in our legislation.

Now, then, consider the natural character and constitutional idiosyncracies of Mr. Johnson when brought in contact with such an extraordinary act as this, levied, as it were, at his own person, intended to fit his individual case, and his alone; for it was never intended it should apply to his successor, especially if that successor is a Republican. He naturally chafed under the act itself, but more at the fact that such a person as Stanton, a man despised by all respectable people not blinded and warped by partisan prejudices, should be forced into daily personal contact and intercourse with him. Feeling as he did, was it any wonder that he desired to test the constitutionality of the law in the only way in which he supposed it could be tested? In fact, was it not just the way in which such a man as Andrew Johnson would proceed to test it? I am only surprised, judging from the President's past history, that he did not procure a guard of soldiers, and, sending them with the newly-appointed Secretary, order them to eject the old with whatever force was needful for that purpose.

"But," say the advocates of impeachment, "Mr. Johnson had no business to violate a law of Congress; he should have gone to the courts." Yes; but, as I have shown, he could not go to the courts. That way was blocked. At the same time the President, backed by every member of his Cabinet, who had given their opinions on the subject, including the President's legal adviser, believed and declared this law to be unconstitutional. Mr. Stanton himself denounced it as unconstitutional. Desirous, then, of legally testing this law, and having the opinions of the ablest legal gentlemen in the United States that it was unconstitutional, Mr. Johnson found himself compelled to appeal to the courts in the only way left open to him, and that way was by the appointment of an ad interim Secretary of War, and by directing him to demand of Mr. Stanton that he yield up his portfolio to General Thomas. And this is the head and front of the President's offending, no more and no less.

But, Mr. Speaker, though myself no lawyer, I can at least read the history of the legislation of the country as respects the constitutional right of the President to appoint and remove his Cabinet ministers at will. Among the earliest records on the subject of this right is the act of Congress of August 17, 1789, creating the War Department and providing for its administration. The second section of that act says:

"That there shall be in the said Department an inferior officer, to be appointed by the said principal officer, to be employed therein as he shall deem proper, and to be called chief clerk in the Department of War, and who, whenever the said principal officer shall be removed from office by the President of the United States, or in any other case of vacancy, shall during such vacancy have the charge and custody of all records, books, and papers appertaining to the said Department."

Now, sir, if this section does not give the President power to remove the Secretary of War there is no force in language. What is the meaning of the words, "and who, whenever the said principal officer shall be removed from office by the President of the United States?" Thus, according to the words of the original act creating the Department of War, the President had full power of removal. But, Mr. Speaker, I find, by consulting the records of the First Congress of the United States, that the power to remove Cabinet officers was not only believed to be, but declared to be, vested in the President. On the 19th day of May, 1789, the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States being in the Committee of the Whole, Mr. Trimbull in the chair, a motion introduced by Mr. Madison was under consideration. The motion was as follows:

"Resolved, That it is the opinion of this committee that there shall be established an executive Department, to be denominated the Department of Foreign Affairs, at the head of which there shall be an officer, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and to be removable by the President."

Also a similar motion was made in regard to a Treasury and a War Department. Mr. Smith, of South Carolina, moved to strike out the words "who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate." He conceived the words to be unnecessary; besides, it looked as if they were conferring power, which was not the case, for the Constitution had expressly given the power of appointment in the words there used. He also objected to the subsequent part of the paragraph, because it declared the President alone to have the power of removal. Mr. Madison thought there would be no injury in declaring in the resolution the constitutional mode of appointing the heads of Departments. "However," said he, "if gentlemen were uneasy he would not object to strike it out." The question was then taken on striking out those words, and carried in the affirmative. After this vote the committee proceeded to the discussion of the power of the President to remove this officer. Mr. Madison, Mr. Clymer, Mr. Goodhue, Mr. Smith, and others took part in the debate. Mr. Smith took the present radical ground upon the question. He said he had doubts whether the officer could be removed by the President. He apprehended he could only be removed by impeachment before the Senate, and that being once in office he must remain there until convicted by impeachment. Mr. Madison did not concur in this interpretation, and took the ground that we Democrats now take upon this subject. Among other things he said "that such a construction of the Constitution would, in effect, establish every officer of the Government on the firm tenure of good behavior; not the heads of Departments only, but all the inferior officers of those Departments would hold their offices during good behavior, and that to be judged of by one branch of the Legislature only on the impeachment of the other. "If the Constitution means this to be the case by its declarations we must submit, but I should lament it," said he, "as a fatal error interwoven in the system, and one that would ultimately prove its destruction." "I think it absolutely necessary," continued Mr. Madison, "that the President should have the power of removing from office; it will make him in a peculiar manner responsible for their conduct, and subject him to impeachment himself if he suffers them to perpetrate with impunity high crimes and misdemeanors against the United States, or neglect to superintend their conduct." Mr. Madison concluded by saying: "Of the constitutionality of this declaration I have no doubt." Mr. Goodhue concurred with Mr. Madison, as did also Mr. Clymer. This gentleman said:

"The power of removal was an executive power, and as such belonged to the President alone, by the express words of the Constitution, which are: The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America." The Senate was not an executive body; they were a legislative one. It was true, in some instances, they held a qualified check over the executive power, but that was in consequence of an express declaration in the Constitution; without such declaration they would not have been called upon for advice and consent in cases of appointment. Why, then, shall we extend this power, to control the removal which is naturally in the Executive, unless it is likewise expressly declared in the Constitution?"

After a lengthy discussion by the members of the House in the Committee of the Whole, the question was taken and carried by a considerable majority in favor of declaring the power of removal to be in the President. Thus the declaration that the power of removal rests with the President was made in the First Congress of the United States seventy-nine years ago. And it will be recollected that Congress was composed in part of the members of the Convention that had framed the Constitution. They declared, after a full consideration of, and a lengthy and free (not gagged) debate upon the subject, that the President derived the power of removal from the Constitution itself. What is this, also, but an emphatic avowal and assertion that Congress has no power to constitute the Senate a judge or court to decide the question of removal? Yet, in face of this avowal of the fathers who framed the Constitution, and for merely maintaining the principles therein maintained, it is proposed to impeach the President, and to impeach him by a Congress which, in this as well as in other numerous instances, has been guilty of violating the express provisions of the Constitution under the forms of which it is proposed to try the Chief Magistrate of the nation.

But I need not go back to the fathers of the Constitution, for I can show that the original earthly father of the Radical party himself, and, indeed, the original father of this whole impeachment movement, (the Speaker might rule me out of order were I to designate it a conspiracy,) held precisely the same views as those I have quoted from Mr. Madison and Mr. Clymer, and held them no longer ago than the year 1837. In that year he was a member of the Pennsylvania constitutional convention, and on the 13th of June thereof he made as strong a protest against a proposition to restrict the Governor in the appointment of officers as he now does in favor of restricting the same power in the President. He said:

"Why take the appointment of the heads of the Departments—the surveyor general, attorney general, secretary of the land office, and auditor general—from the Governor? They are essentially a part of his Cabinet. His own comfort and the comfort of each of them, as well as the public interest, require that there should be perfect harmony and unity of views and action among them. But if you take the appointments from the Governor it may, and probably often will, happen that he will be of one party and entertain one set of principles and they be of another party and hold entirely opposite principles; discord and opposition must then disturb their councils and injure the interests of the State." "It is far better to have less efficient public agents acting in friendly concert for the public good than to have able but hostile men plundering the public to provide means and the instruments for carrying on a contest against each other, founded on personal hatred or political rivalry. Why vest the power of appointment in the Legislature? Their legitimate duty is to enact laws, and not to appoint those who are to execute them. Sufficient inducements are now held out to them to make them swerve from the path of duty without multiplying the temptations by placing the patronage of this great State at their disposal."

The Governor and the Senate would either be of the same political or hostile parties; if of the same party the Senate would be no check upon the Governor, as there would be perfect concert before the nomination, and therefore this supervising power would be useless. If they were of hostile parties, constant and bitter collisions would exist between them, which would greatly disturb the faithful discharge of their other duties."

Are not these words of the father of this impeachment movement prophetic? Does he not faithfully predict and portray the very evils which this tenure-of-office law, enacted entirely to subserve partisan purposes, have brought upon the country? Has it not brought discord and disunion upon the country and into its councils? Has it not raised up a host of "hostile men plundering the public to provide the means and instruments for carrying on a contest against each other, founded on personal hatred and political rivalry?" Has it not made Congress "swerve from the path of duty" by "multiplying the temptations" and by "placing the patronage of the State at their disposal?" Has it not created constant and bitter collisions between the President and Congress, which have "greatly disturbed the faithful discharge of their other duties?" In fine, has not this odious bill done all, and more, than Mr. STEVENS declared a similar provision would do if incorporated into the organic act of the State of Pennsylvania? Yet it is for a constructive violation of this odious law, the principle of which was so terribly denounced by Mr. STEVENS in former days, that that gentleman would ignominiously bring the President of the United States to the bar of the Senate in order that he might be impeached for high crimes and misdemeanors. It seems to me that Mr. STEVENS should rather say to the President, "Well done, good and faithful servant of the people, who has personally vindicated the Constitution and maintained the law!"

But the advocates of impeachment charge that even if the tenure-of-office law were unconstitutional Mr. Johnson was not the judge; that he is bound to obey a law of Congress until it is declared unconstitutional by the court of last resort. Now, admitting this to be so, although it was contrary to the belief and acts of one of the ablest Presidents of the United States, General Jackson, the question comes up did Mr. Johnson really violate the tenure-of-office act when he appointed General Thomas Secretary of War ad interim? The first section of that act reads as follows:

"That any person holding any civil office to which he has been appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and any person who shall hereafter be appointed to any such office, and shall be duly qualified to act therein, is, and shall be, entitled to hold office until a successor shall have been in like manner appointed and duly qualified, except as herein otherwise provided: Provided, That the Secretary of State, of the Treasury, of War, of the Navy, of the Interior, the Postmaster General, and the Attorney General, shall hold their offices respectively for and during the term of the President by whom they have been appointed, and for one month thereafter, subject to removal by and with the advice and consent of the Senate."

This proviso only applies to heads of Departments, and says they shall "hold their offices during the term of the President by whom they may have been appointed, and for one month thereafter." Mr. Stanton certainly was not appointed by Mr. Johnson. Consequently the proviso does not apply to him, and the President is thus left free to act under the law of August 7, 1789, creating the War Department and providing for its administration. In case of the death of the President, the Vice President succeeds to the duties and responsibilities of the President. The death of Mr. Lincoln in 1865 closed his term of office and opened or inaugurated that of Mr. Johnson. The contingency of the death of the President fixes the duration of the Chief Magistrate's office. This gives, then, the general term of four years, and the contingent term from the death of the President and the assumption of the Vice President of the duties of the office. They are both of them constitutional terms of office, and have always been so recognized. Mr. Stanton remained in office on sufferance. He was not appointed by Mr. Johnson. His term of office expired one month after the death of Mr. Lincoln. So well has this been understood that the Secretaries have always tendered their resignations upon the occasion of the death of the President. This was so in the cases of Generals Harrison and Taylor, and would be so in Mr. Stanton's case if the latter possessed the honor of a gentleman, and if the radical programme did not call for his retention of the War Department, honor or no honor, law or no law. It was in the power of Mr. Johnson to remove Mr. Stanton at any time under the tenure-of-office law. So Mr. SHERMAN and other gentlemen declared in the Senate, and so Mr. Johnson believed was the correct understanding; so Mr. Stanton himself repeatedly declared in Cabinet councils. When the civil-tenure bill was passed by Congress the President submitted it to his Cabinet. They unanimously pronounced it unconstitutional. The President, in giving his reasons for the removal of Mr. Stanton, on this subject writes as follows:

"Every member of my Cabinet advised me that the proposed law was unconstitutional. All spoke without doubt or reservation, but Mr. Stanton's condemnation of the law was the most elaborate and emphatic. He referred to the constitutional provisions, the debates in Congress, especially to the speech of Mr. Buchanan when a Senator, to the decisions of the Supreme Court, and to the usage from the beginning of the Government through every successive administration, all concurring to establish the right of removal as vested by the Constitution in the President. To all these he added the weight of his own deliberate judgment, and advised me that it was my duty to defend the power of the President from usurpation, and to veto the law.

"I was so much struck with the full mastery of the question manifested by Mr. Stanton, and was at the time so fully occupied with the preparation of another veto upon the pending reconstruction act that I requested him to prepare the veto upon this tenure-of-office bill. This he declined on the ground of physical disability to undergo, at the time, the labor of writing; but stated his readiness to furnish what aid might be required in the preparation of materials for the paper."

Thus the President cites Mr. Stanton as denouncing in the Cabinet meeting the tenure-of-office bill as unconstitutional, at the same time that when removed from the Cabinet he endeavors to hold on to this very office through a law which he himself had pronounced unconstitutional, and summoning the Army to sustain him in his usurpation. Was there ever such an exhibition of inconsistency, treachery, and want of political and personal honor exhibited in the history of the world?

Here, then, we have the case in its legal and political bearings. And on what is it based? It is based on the mere fact that the President did that which every one of his predecessors did before him. He is to be impeached, forsooth, for doing what Washington, Adams, Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, the second Adams, Jackson, Van Buren, Harrison, Tyler, Polk, Taylor, Fillmore, Pierce, Buchanan, and Lincoln did, time and time again; what I have shown Congress, after mature deliberation in 1789, declared he had a right to do; and what every other Congress from that day to this admitted to be legal. If he is impeached, you impeach all his predecessors; in fact you impeach the fathers of the Constitution themselves. Indeed, if the President had not this power of removal, in what a dilemma it would place, for instance, the proposed constitutional successor of Mr. Johnson, should the Radical majority of this Congress succeed in its efforts to depose the President from office! He could not remove the present members of the Cabinet except by a quo warranto, and he could not sue out a writ of that kind without violating the tenure-of-office law. But gentlemen on the other side may say that if he appointed other gentlemen in place of the present members of his Cabinet, the Senate would certainly confirm his selections and sanction his removals. And here is just where the defect of the law lies. It is intended to fit a particular case. When it is broken by any one else than President Johnson there is no violation. When it is broken, or attempted to be broken by him, he renders himself liable to impeachment. Any other man in the presidential office might break the law with impunity. I believe that even a straight-out Democrat might do so, as the Senate would hardly dare compel a Democratic President to accept a Republican Cabinet as his private and confidential advisers, as the persons through whom he must issue his orders to his subordinates. But does the Constitution of the country and the usage of the Government make a distinction in the operation of the law, so that it can be construed to mean nothing whatever when applied to a Republican President by a Republican Senate, or to a Democratic President by a Republican Senate; but that when it is applied to a President who defected from his party, then it is to have full force and effect? Is it for the violation of such a law as this that we are called upon to impeach the President?

But let me inquire whether even Mr. Johnson is amenable to the operations of the law simply because, as the Radicals say, he has turned traitor to his party? If I can show that it was the party turned traitor to the President then do I not demonstrate that it was the Radicals in Congress themselves who turned traitors to the party and not the President, and consequently that the majority in Congress ought to be impeached and not President Johnson? Mr. Johnson's political record has been consistent from the commencement of the war to the present time. At the extra session, in the summer of 1861, Mr. Johnson introduced in the Senate and pressed to a vote that famous resolution declaring that the war was not waged for any purpose of conquest or subjugation, but that when resistance ceased the rights of the States would remain unimpaired. At the same session he took a leading part in giving seats to the new Virginia Senators who had been elected after the secession of that State. He thus recorded his opinion that a State did not lose its right of representation because it had engaged in rebellion. Later, in 1864, when nominated by the Republican party to the Vice Presidency, he reiterated the same views. Indeed, he pointedly alluded to the fact of such a nomination as a most unanswerable argument and proof that the Republican party did not consider the southern or seceded States out of the Union; and certainly his point was well taken. Upon his nomination the news was telegraphed to Nashville. In a speech to the friends who assembled to congratulate him on that occasion, he said:

"Next it [the nominating convention] said, (if I may be permitted to speak of myself, not in the way of vanity, but to illustrate a principle,) 'We will go into one of the rebellious States and choose a candidate for the Vice Presidency.' Thus the Union party declared its belief that the rebellious States are still in the Union, and that their loyal citizens are still citizens of the United States."

But the beauty of it was that the only Republican of any note in the party who took the opposite view to President Johnson at that time was Mr. STEVENS; and Mr. STEVENS vainly urged the objection to Mr. Johnson that the party was taking a man from a State which was outside of the Union; but they would not hear him. His advice was disregarded, and his voice of warning drowned in clamors for a Democratic Vice President in place of Mr. Hamlin, who was a Republican. If, then, there is any treachery to principle in the party to which Mr. Johnson belongs it is on the part of his opponents, not on his. He has always stood upon the platform on which he stands to-day. It is not because he stands upon the original Republican platform, but because he cannot be coaxed or driven off of it that he is to be impeached, and impeached for evading a law made purposely to entrap him, and which must be repealed so soon as he is gotten out of office, unless we are to have constantly the most annoying, perplexing, and ultimately disastrous contests waged between the executive and legislative departments of the Government.

I have thus shown that Mr. Johnson, instead of being a traitor to the principles as laid down by the Republican party at Baltimore, and most emphatically indorsed by the selection of himself, a citizen of one of the excluded States, as Vice President on the ticket with Mr. Lincoln, has continued to be almost their only exponent and upholder in that party. And why is this? Simply because since the death of Mr. Lincoln the Republican party has been controlled by the radical element that forms the most active and aggressive faction in it. That element sways the party in all its political movements. It first compelled the abolition of slavery by amendment to the Constitution ratified by the States. It found that even then it might not be able to retain control of the Government. It next pronounced the South still rebellious, in spite of the statements of Generals Grant, Sherman, and others, to the contrary, and demanded negro suffrage as a measure precedent to admission. Still, fearing this would fail, the more recklessly radical in the party gaining strength daily as the people of the North grew restive under the continued exclusion of the southern States, initiate and finally threaten to carry this impeachment programme to a successful termination, as they have heretofore carried their other measures, in spite of the opposition of the more conservative spirits of the party.

But where is all this thing to stop? Suppose the people still continue obstinate, still refuse to acquiesce in radical rule, what is the next measure? Why, nothing more nor less than a military dictatorship, to which all these other measures are but the steps of a ladder, necessary in order to carry the party to the culminating point of all its legislation, from the day that it attained the control of the Government to the present. Without this last measure, the complement and continent of all the others, and to which they are but the initiatory steps, radicalism will not have completed the circle of its existence. With this measure as the apex of the legislation with which it has so sorely afflicted the country, its programme will be completed, for there will be nothing further which its most fanatical leaders and their followers can desire.

But there is one phase of this impeachment business to which I beg leave most respectfully to call the attention of the House, and that is its effect upon our agricultural and commercial interests. I cannot believe the gentlemen who so pertinaciously urge it have well considered its effect upon the industry and finances of the country. We hear of the burdens of taxation, of the depreciation of our currency, while the dim shadow of repudiation has sometimes presented itself along with the results contingent in the future. Consume your impeachment measure and shadow becomes substance, our popular greenbacks and national currency will be greatly depreciated. Enforce this measure and you remove the Rio Grande boundary to our northern border; and the unstable and revolutionary Governments now lying below it will be extended all over our fair domains. Gentlemen when reminded of results sure to follow the course they are bent on pursuing, tauntingly remind us that they have heard similar warnings, that they are prepared to take the consequences; and the honorable gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] boasts that of his large majority of constituent supporters each one is physically equal to two that might be brought to oppose. Talk of this kind is not altogether new here. The earnestness of the times and facts to which he refers were no idle unmeaning expressions, but have had their fulfillment in cruel, relentless war, while desolation, destruction, and mourning have followed in a pathway of tears. The gentleman has heard similar warnings; the country has heard declarations similar to those made by the gentleman as to the prowess of men in certain localities over those in others. Are those repetitions of warning, those vaunting expressions of superior ability pleasing to the gentleman? Do they fall upon the ears of this House with no apprehensions of consequences? Are gentlemen prepared to enter on a renewal of the scenes of the past few years, and to plunge our country into another civil war? Are they anxious to again cast us adrift upon the sea of anarchy with the guiding star of the Constitution blotted out? So it would seem. And unless a greater than human arm is extended to our aid we sink beneath the waves of party fanaticism, weighted down with all the errors and falsities that surround the position of the lost. And here, standing in my place, I enter a solemn protest in the name of my people, whose voice in these Halls through her Representative declares these measures revolutionary, treasonable, disloyal to the fundamental law, and usurpations.

Mr. Speaker, the people will endure the condition of things brought upon them by such revolutionary measures as this but little longer. The only remedy that appears to be left the country is with them, and they will take it into their own hands; for the passions natural to the era of strife are fast subsiding, and "the still, small voice" of the Great Master is finding its way to charitable hearts. They are impressed that we have not been altogether right from the beginning, and deprecate this prolonged strife after the conflict is ended. They know, every one knows, that the material interests of the country would have been vastly improved had the policy of Lincoln, sanctioned by all of his Cabinet, and enforced by Johnson in 1865, been allowed to stand. They feel that the interference with it has at every step made matters worse, cost the country untold millions, and placed us a great deal further from harmonious settlement to-day than when Congress asserted its right to undo what had been so justly done; undoing it, too, in a spirit of hate and revenge, of exultation in being able to place its feet upon a prostrate and helpless victim. I feel sure the policy inaugurated by the radical faction, and about to culminate in this mad impeachment scheme, can never produce prosperity. To put down that well-established class that alone has ascended the heights of civilization and put imbecility and incapacity in its place will not do it. Places the Almighty has designed for each to fill must be recognized. Capacity and ability alone can inaugurate and restore a successful order of industry, while those fitted only for subaltern positions must make themselves useful in their proper places. If the black race was to receive any substantial benefit in the measures of the dominant party, if we were meeting the demands of enlightened, benevolent effort, we would consent to suffer on. But in view of the history of that race and its present condition we honestly doubt the result.

We cannot point in their history to any noble effort in the way of advancement. In their native country they fail to accept the proffered missionary effort of civilization, and, after more than a thousand years and the loss of hundreds of self-sacrificing men, who have thrown away their lives in this direction, no trace of their labor outlives their personal presence. They are in their native country to-day living, as they did thousands of years ago, in a state of simple nature, with but little more power to originate methods of clothing than even the surrounding animals that fall below any claims to humanity. In this state they were brought to this country, so low in the human scale that a system like the one they have passed through was absolutely necessary to beget in them any of the proprieties of civilization. Through the power of imitation, which they largely possess, they could be forced to do many things required of them, and they have performed a use in the world, while controlled by masters, greater than their entire race ever before performed for the world's common good, at the same time approximating nearer civilization and Christianity than ever before. To say that this race did not originate from the same human parents as ourselves may be deemed presumptuous by those who, with myself, acknowledge the divinity of the Word, yet I do so assert, and leave for the near future to harmonize science with revelation in this case, as the last quarter of a century has the six literal days of creation.

That slavery was an evil as affecting our race I admit, and should rejoice to see the subjects of it within the "boundaries of their appointed habitations" as fixed in their creation, there to fulfill the objects of their peculiar organisms as destined by creative wisdom. I know it is said that the negroes will do better in the future. I venture to say they will do worse; that they will continue to slide downward until they reach the position in which they were found in Africa, and made slaves by our English grandfathers; and that this attempt at reform, like all others in their interests, will, when the controlling hand is removed, fall back to the unchangeable order of their native instincts, weakened by the unnatural strain made upon the negro to stand in relations for which he had no power to occupy and exercise. Those making use of him now to secure political ends are falsely representing the relations he sustained during the rebellion, and the aid the northern cause received through his willing efforts. During the larger part of the conflict he was as ever passively submissive to his master, toiling for the support of his family, building breastworks over which thousands of our young men laid down their lives; scarcely, and without exception, on all occasions loyal to the southern cause, and with not a single instance of an attempted rebellion on his part to hasten the overthrow of the power that enslaved him. It was not until our armies inclosed him within our lines, and the alternative was left to join with us or starve, that his reluctant loyalty was born, and then generally at the demand of a recruiting officer, to make merchandise of the operation in filling the quota of some northern State.

Mr. Speaker, to retrieve the errors of the past, to restore, in some measure, our former prosperity and prevent the continuance of this complete prostration of business and reward for useful labor, we must, for the time being, at least, cease to be partisans and view the case as philanthropists and statesmen. We want peace, we want quiet, we want "all the States with their rights unimpaired." We want all of our kindred race to know what is protection and equality in one section is protection and equality in another; that the great law of charity exists everywhere; that wherever an opportunity offers of being magnanimous, of forgetting bygone errors, that there the Christian heart is made glad in this exercise.

The startling fact is made known that values of southern real property have depreciated seventy-five per cent. How is it at the North? Are we prepared to see an approximating reduction in our manufacturing property? I greatly fear a similar result and warn the country to prepare for a great depreciation in value on this kind of property. The farmer, also, must prepare to see his former customer and consumer enter into competition in agricultural pursuits, become a joint producer, and lessen the prosperity that has of late years been so abundantly his. Will this impeachment imbroglio help the country forward in the road to prosperity which has been so terribly cut up by the war and the subsequent prolonged political agitation, not less deleterious in its effects, and which has unfortunately been kept up at fever-heat since its close? It certainly will not. On the contrary, it will cause every material interest to still further and more deeply suffer. In a few weeks the spring trade will be upon us, from the opening of which it was hoped the business of the manufacturer and the merchant would receive such an impulse as to enable them, in some degree, to recover from the terrible depression of the past three years. Keep up the present political strife during the four to five or six months necessary to carry this impeachment scheme to its consummation, and what is the result? Why, you prolong an agitation that verges upon actual revolution through a period during which the country needs peace more than at any other time. You introduce a disturbing element into the commerce and manufactures of the country at a time when we need firmness and stability in values, and such a condition of things generally that the business man will be able to face the future with some assurance that his transactions are predicated upon a basis which affords reasonable hopes of living profit.

The business men of the country look on with amazement mingled with fear while Congress takes step after step in the programme of usurpation, in the progress which the country is so rapidly making toward a consolidated despotism. The people are beginning to sensibly feel the effects of these revolutionary movements. Already even the financial men in the radical party are becoming alarmed at the prospect of a long and doubtful impeachment trial, or, rather, contest; for if there be a trial the accused will be condemned from the moment that he is arraigned. If brought to the bar for trial the President will not be brought face to face with a court which will give him a fair and impartial hearing; he will be brought face to face with the Radical party, hounded on by the fanatical leaders who are thirsting for his political execution with as mad a passion as burned within the hearts of the maniacs who deluged France with the blood of her noblest sons and daughters during the reign of terror. Imagine, gentlemen, the condition of the country as regards its financial and commercial interests during the progress of a trial which, of necessity, can be nothing but a heated political contest prolonged for months and gathering intensity as it proceeds and as it feeds upon the agitation which it creates. The radical financiers, in the interest of their own business, will be compelled to press their party to dispen- with the forms of law, and hurry the trial through as rapidly as possible. They will be compelled to do this in order to avert a commercial revulsion, and to gain time to rally the party for the coming presidential contest. On the other hand, all those in the country who love justice, and are not altogether under the influence of partisan passion and prejudice, will demand that the President be fairly dealt with; that he will be permitted every form of legal procedure; that he shall not be condemned unheard, and that he shall have no mock trial by judges and jurors who have already prejudged his case. At any moment a spark may ignite the elements of strife brought into such active contact and close proximity by this unusual proceeding, and, extending themselves on all sides through the entire community, the result no man can foresee. Gentlemen, every step you take in this business is fraught with untold dangers to the country. Let me beg of you to pause before it is too late; to let reason and reflection take the place of prejudice and passion. If you will not pause, if you will not substitute reason for passion in this particular case, you will as surely plunge the country into an abyss of ruin as that every individual who refuses to be led by the teachings and the promptings of his higher and better nature is sooner or later overtaken by that retribution which inevitably follows the disregard of justice and the despoliation of equity.

Impeachment.

SPEECH OF HON. O. FERRISS,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 2, 1868,

On the articles of impeachment reported from the committee.

Mr. FERRISS. Mr. Chairman, when a resolution to impeach the President of the United States for high crimes and misdemeanors was before this House in December last, with a conscientious regard to a faithful discharge of my duty as one of the Representatives of the people, and fully impressed that it would best serve their interests, in common with a majority of the Republican members upon this floor, I voted against that resolution. A few brief months have sufficiently demonstrated the wisdom of that action. Emboldened by the hesitation and unwillingness of this House to resort to extreme measures, and mistakenly attributing that hesitation to a cowardly fear upon its part to redress the wrongs which, in the name of liberty, and with a hypocritical regard for the Constitution, were being perpetrated upon the loyal people of this country, the President has boldly, defiantly, wickedly, and maliciously violated, not only the spirit and very letter of a plain criminal statute, but has arrogated to himself powers not found in the Constitution itself. For this House to hesitate longer would be, indeed, a cowardly abandonment of the great interests committed to its charge, and a deliberate surrender of those interests to the enemies of the Republic and of constitutional liberty.

On the 2d day of March, 1867, the act known as the tenure-of-civil-office act became a law. The first and sixth sections of that act are as follows:

"Be it enacted, &c., That every person holding any civil office to which he has been appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and every person who shall hereafter be appointed to any such office, and shall become duly qualified to act therein, is and shall be entitled to hold such office until a successor shall have been in like manner appointed and duly qualified, except as herein otherwise provided: Provided, That the Secretaries of State, of the Treasury, of War, of the Navy, and of the Interior, the Postmaster General, and the Attorney General shall hold their offices respectively for and during the term of the President by whom they may have been appointed, and for one month thereafter, subject to removal by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

"SEC. 6. That every removal, appointment, or employment made, had, or exercised contrary to the provisions of this act, and the making, signing, sealing, countersigning, or issuing of any commission or letter of authority for or in respect to any such appointment or employment, shall be deemed, and are hereby declared to be, high misdemeanors, and upon trial and conviction thereof every person guilty thereof, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $10,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding five years, or both said punishments, in the discretion of the court: Provided, That the President shall have power to make out and deliver, after the adjournment of the Senate, commissions for all officers whose appointment shall have been advised and consented to by the Senate."

It is said that "the Secretary of War does not come within the provisions of this law; that he is one of the officers named in the proviso of the first section; that he was appointed by Mr. Lincoln, was never reappointed, and is holding over by sufferance, the month named in the proviso having long since expired." Let us see whether this reasoning is good. Mr. Stanton was appointed by Mr. Lincoln during his first term, and whether reappointed upon Mr. Lincoln's second election is perfectly immaterial. He was the Secretary of War regularly appointed, continuing in office without any limitation of his term by law or otherwise; was acknowledged and recognized as such by the acting President, even in his orders to remove him and appoint a successor. The month mentioned in the proviso, if it applied to the first term of Mr. Lincoln, expired before his death. This being the state of affairs when the law was passed, the proviso only did not include the Secretary of War, otherwise the law would be retroactive.

In direct violation of the Constitution and of that law, the President has, during the session of the Senate, issued an order removing Edwin M. Stanton, Secretary of War, and appointing in his place Lorenzo Thomas Secretary of War ad interim, and General Thomas has, under the direction of the President, given notice of his acceptance of the place, demanded possession of the office, and notified the Secretary that he should take charge of the mail matter pertaining to the War Department. The President had before suspended the Secretary of War from the exercise of the duties of his office, and the Senate refusing to confirm the President's action Mr. Stanton had been regularly, and in pursuance of, returned to his place at the head of the Department. This act of the President is not only a violation of the statute, but an assumption of power not granted by the Constitution of the United States, either expressly or by implication. It is the first time since the organization of the Government that a President has appointed a Cabinet officer during the session of the Senate and attempted to induct him into office. If ever claimed that power has never been exercised and is not granted, but, on the contrary, clearly prohibited by implication. The Constitution provides that—of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law."

"He [the President] shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate shall appoint, ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges

It further provides that—

"The President shall have power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate, by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session."

And neither the law of 1795, the civil-tenure act, nor any other law of Congress has enlarged the power here given and defined.

The constitutionality of the law of March last is questioned. Upon that subject it might be sufficient to say the President is not the proper officer or tribunal to pass upon the constitutionality of any law. He finds it upon the statute-book, and among the duties he has assumed "he shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed." It is so enjoined by the very Constitution he invokes to his aid. If he ignores the law upon the ground that it is unconstitutional he does so at his peril. Like the plea of insanity to escape the penalty of murder the unconstitutionality of a law has become a common excuse for its violation. Whether a public officer is justified in refusing to execute a law of doubtful validity it is unimportant to discuss. The President has no such case to justify him. He had already been informed, in a manner and from a source he is bound to respect, that the civil-tenure act was in all its parts constitutional. It will be observed that this law was passed near the close of the last session of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, sent to the President for his signature, and returned with his objections, prominent among which are objections to the constitutionality of this identical sixth section. The bill and these objections were reconsidered by the Senate and passed over the presidential veto by the constitutional majority of two thirds, and, being passed by the same majority in the House, thus became the law of the land, the President's objections to the contrary notwithstanding. The majority of two thirds required to pass the bill is the same majority required to convict upon impeachment, and the men constituting that majority are there now to try the President upon the charges of high crimes and misdemeanors. In deciding questions presented as legislators they were impelled by the same convictions of duty and moved by the same reasons as must control them when sitting as a court. The Senate has peculiar powers. It is one of the coordinate branches of the law-making power, and in cases of impeachment it is the court to enforce the law of its own creation. The constitutionality of this law was, therefore, practically settled. The Senate has passed upon that question. It is in vain that gentlemen may appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States. I respect that learned body as one of the branches of the Government, and I have no doubt, were the question fairly presented, that court would sustain this law. If it did not, the decision would be of no possible consequence whatever, except as the opinion of men learned in the law, and would be of no more binding force upon the court for the trial of impeachments than the decision of a police justice of the District of Columbia. No case that comes before the Supreme Court can possibly come before the court for the trial of impeachments. The Senate has the sole power to try impeachments. In this regard it has original and sole jurisdiction. It has no other jurisdiction as a court, and no other court can in any way take jurisdiction of persons impeached or the subject-matter of impeachments. There is no appeal from the decision of the Senate as a court. It is the highest court known to the Constitution and laws of our country. Its judgment is final and irreversible. No power on earth can review it.

I have spoken of the Senate as the highest court known to the Constitution and the laws. It is nowhere called a court. It is the Senate which is to try impeachments. For that purpose it is clothed with the powers of a court. All there is upon that subject is contained in the last paragraph of section three of the first article of the Constitution, and is in these words:

"The Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments. When sitting for that purpose they shall be on oath or affirmation. When the President of the United States is tried the Chief Justice shall preside; and no person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two thirds of the members present.

Judgment in case of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States, but the party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment, according to law."

The calling of the Chief Justice to preside in cases where the President is tried does not change the character of the Senate. Whether it was thought the Vice President would have such an interest in the trial which, if it resulted in a conviction, would make him President, as to render it improper for him to preside, or, what is much more probable, it was to provide a presiding officer in case the President was suspended from exercising the duties of his office and the Vice President was discharging those duties while the trial was progressing, as was stated by Mr. Madison in the debates in the Virginia convention, is of no importance whatever. The Vice President is not a Senator any more than the Chief Justice. Which ever presides it is still the Senate, which, by the provisions of the Constitution last quoted, has power to try and render a judgment—attributes pertaining to all courts. It passes upon and decides, while trying impeachments, similar questions, and in the same manner as tribunals known only as courts. In this manner it must determine the validity of laws. So must every court, high and low; and so must every tribunal, man, or number of men upon whom devolves the duty of doing any act whatever in pursuance of a written law.

The Supreme Court is not created for the purpose of passing upon the constitutionality of the laws. It must perform that duty when the laws or a law is called in question in a case regularly before it. Its decision is conclusive in such case, so far as that court is concerned, and is only binding as authority upon inferior tribunals from which an appeal may be taken to that court. Such decision does not blot out the law; it remains upon the statute-book. It is true the same court may overrule its own decision, and declare void a statute which it had before sustained; but while the law is unrepealed and the decision stands it is controlling upon inferior tribunals and all persons whose acts may come within the jurisdiction of those tribunals. It is no less true that the Senate, while trying an impeachment, may overrule its former determination as a branch of the Legislature, but until it does so its conclusions are binding authority and notice to all persons who may be brought within its judicial jurisdiction. He is a bold man, then, who proclaims the civil-tenure act unconstitutional. The President, in this respect, has assumed an unenviable responsibility.

In the remarks submitted on Monday last, by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Woodward,] I was not surprised to hear that gentleman characterize Congress as "irregular, unconstitutional, fragmentary bodies." He might, without in the least marring the harmony of his speech or weakening his argument, have added in the emphatic language of the distinguished individual whose cause he advocates, "hanging on the verge of the Government." Sir, if this is not a constitutional Congress, if it has no right to make laws, and the Senate is not authorized to act as a court in cases committed by the organic law to its jurisdiction, if this House is an "irregular, unconstitutional, and fragmentary body," with all due respect to that gentleman I would like to know what brings him here? In what capacity is he acting, and for what purpose does he take part in the work of making laws and the other legitimate business of Congress, such, for instance, as taking action upon the resolution presenting the Chief Magistrate for high crimes and misdemeanors? If he entertains the opinions he has given utterance to has he no conscientious scruples about receiving the people's money in pay for his salary as a member of Congress? Is he acting with and as one of an unlawful body in the making of laws which are void and of no effect whatever, and does he still claim pay for such services? Who is to-day the acting Chief Magistrate of the United States, whose term in office we propose to shorten, and by what authority does he assume to sign or veto laws, issue proclamations and orders, appoint men to and remove them from office, and exercise all other powers pertaining to the chief executive officer of the nation? Fewer States than are represented upon this floor placed him in the second office in the gift of the American people. His own State of Tennessee had no part or lot in it. Through the misplaced confidence of Republicans of the loyal States alone he became Vice President of the United States. A contingency occurring for which provision had been made the duties of President devolved upon him. How faithfully and well he has discharged those duties I propose to show hereafter. Is he a fragmentary President? Perhaps so, but whether a fragment or an entirety he is certainly near "the verge of the Government," and if justice is done will soon be beyond that verge. If this is not a constitutional Congress then we have no Government at all, and secession accomplished its purpose. The voluntary withdrawal from Congress of the Senators and Representatives from a single State would at any time have broken up the Union. These States are held together by no such watery tether as that. Suppose the Representative from the State of Delaware should die, must the business of legislation be delayed until the vacancy is filled? It would be very strange, indeed, if the wheels of Government could be blocked in that way. The right to exclude Representatives for crime cannot be questioned; and the effect whether excluded for good reason, or the States remain unrepresented of their own choice, can make no difference.

Mr. Chairman, I was not honored with a seat in the Thirty-Seventh Congress, but, sir, I was not indifferent to the stirring events of that period. The bitter denunciations and covert threats in the form of warnings which fell from the lips of my colleague [Mr. Brooks] in the early part of this debate, and the incendiary language with which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Woodward] closed his remarks, forcibly remind me of the hour when treason, which had been thirty years incubating, threw off the shallow covering which concealed it from the public view and stood forth in all its naked and hideous deformity armed for the destruction of the Republic. I remember well, sir, how the loyal people of this nation stood appalled as the traitors, ripe for their hellish work, one by one abandoned their places and went forth from these Halls to take part in the bloody contest which they had here matured. Sir, I am unwilling to pursue the parallel further. When I reflect that the chief conspirator is to-day an indicted felon, awaiting his trial before a jury of his countrymen for the highest crime known to our laws, and those of his coconspirators who, escaping the sword, fled from the land of their birth, whose benignant laws and liberal institutions they sought to destroy, are now fugitives in a foreign land, without a home or a country, without considering the miseries and desolation that follow in the train of war, I will not believe there is a single Representative upon this floor who would knowingly or intentionally inaugurate another rebellion. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania fully realize the full import of his words when he says:

"If I were the President's counselor, which I am not, I would advise him, if you prefer articles of impeachment, to demur both to your jurisdiction and that of the Senate, and to issue a proclamation giving you and all the world notice that while he held himself impeachable for misdemeanors in office before the constitutional tribunal he never would subject the office he held in trust for the people to the irregular, unconstitutional, fragmentary bodies who proposed to strip him of it. Such a proclamation, with the Army and Navy in hand to sustain it, would meet a popular response that would make an end of impeachment and impeachers."

Such language grates harshly upon loyal ears. Such advice is seditious, rebellious, revolutionary. Its impotency excites ridicule, and alone shields it from fitting rebuke. I would not, under any circumstances, willingly trust with power the head or heart that could give utterance to such sentiments. How any man who has been long clothed with judicial power, learned and schooled in the civil law, and accustomed to see its decrees and judgments respected and enforced, can advise forcible resistance to a proceeding in pursuance of the provisions of the Constitution is utterly incomprehensible. Such advice, if followed, leads straight to civil war.

The same gentleman characterized the charges against the Executive as both "false and foolish," words whose use is not prohibited by any parliamentary rule, if it accords with the taste of the speaker to adopt them. Folly is more frequently a misfortune than a crime. The Creator has not endowed all men with equal mental powers or equal moral graces, and, while a reasonable allowance should be made for the excitement of debate, the wisdom is not enviable or the morality commendable which, with the light and experience of the past few years before it, would advise the President to issue his proclamation of resistance to the law and call upon the Army and Navy to sustain him. His repeated attempts to seduce Grant, Sherman, Thomas, and their compatriots in the Army from their allegiance to their country have signally failed. His last attempt to subordinate the War Department to his unholy purposes has been thwarted; the citizen soldiers who stood by the flag in the dark days of the rebellion are true to it still, and if the question were asked them, "Will you have Andrew Johnson for President or king," the response from half a million voices would be, "Neither." What! call upon the Army and Navy to sustain him; as well might the evil one call upon saints to aid him in enticing victims to his infernal regions. The Army and Navy of the United States do not answer to such calls as that. He may call, but, like calling spirits from the vasty deep, they will not come.

The material power of this Republic has been settled. After four years of such strife as the world had never witnessed; after five hundred thousand of our youth had found an early, bloody grave; when every hamlet in the land was draped in mourning, and thousands of households were bowed down with grief and sorrow; after towns and cities were laid waste, and the desolation which follows in the track of war marred the fair face of our common country, treason and rebellion, powerful beyond any previous conception, went down before the armies of the Union, and the starry banner of the Republic floated high above the sea of blood, peacefully, gracefully, triumphantly inviting beneath its protecting folds the oppressed of all the nations of the earth. The power of this Government to defend itself and maintain its existence and integrity against its enemies, internal as well as external, was fully determined and forever settled.

We are now about to test the moral power of the Government. A resolution impeaching the President for high crimes and misdemeanors has already passed this House. Articles of impeachment have been presented charging him with deliberate violation of both the Constitution and a law of Congress. The act is not denied. It only remains to establish the criminal intent. Unfortunately for the President, he has no good character to fall back upon. His previous course has not been such as to disarm suspicion. In arraigning the President I would not indulge in generalities; but his moral turpitude is so engraven upon the public heart that specifications would be superfluous. Foremost among the public men who denounced treason in his inception he stole the confidence of Republicans throughout the Union. Alone of all the Senators from the seceding States he stood firmly by the Union when the day of separation came. As military governor of Tennessee he was the personification of loyalty itself. Bold, defiant, energetic, and untiring in battling the enemies of his country, he became the special object of rebel vengeance and copperhead abuse. He was profuse with denunciations of treason and traitors. He went further than the Republican party of to-day have ever gone or thought of going. He declared that traitors must be punished and impoverished and treason made odious. He insisted that their social power should be destroyed, that Union men should be remunerated out of the pockets of the rebels. His language in reference to protecting Union men and restoring the States to the Union is so significant that I quote it entire:

"I hold it a solemn obligation in every one of these States where the rebel armies have been beaten back or expelled, I care not how small the number of Union men, if enough to man the ship of State, I hold it to be a high duty to protect and secure to them a republican form of government until they again gain strength. They must not be smothered by inches."

In calling a convention to restore States he said:

"Who shall restore it? Shall the man who gave his influence and means to destroy the Government? Is he to participate in the great work of reorganizing the Government who brought this misery on the State?"

He said if there were but five thousand loyal men in a State they should govern it. He favored a division and partition of large plantations among the loyal men of the South. He promised protection to the freedmen, and assured them, if no other leader appeared, he himself would be their Moses to lead them from a worse than Egyptian bondage.

With such promises and professions as these he secured the confidence of the Republican party and cheated them out of a nomination and election to the Vice Presidency. Now comes another chapter in the history of this man: on the day of his inauguration, in the presence of the nation's Representatives and the representatives of foreign Governments, he disgraced himself and dishonored his office. He brought shame and humiliation upon all the people, and how has he kept his promises and pledges given during the rebellion? Instead of punishing traitors he has pardoned thousands, and the whole rebel host are now his most ardent admirers and earnest supporters. Not one has been brought to trial before a civil tribunal. What kind of a Moses he has proved to the colored race is answered by the massacres of New Orleans and Memphis, and the blood of thousands of these people, murdered by rebels, and no effort made to mete out punishment to the murderers. Has he compelled traitors to take back seats in the work of reconstruction? His persistent efforts to restore rebels to power, the appointment of scores of men to office throughout the southern States who could not take the oath of office without committing perjury, furnish ready answers. Have traitors been impoverished? The restoration to rebels, without compensation, of railway property of incalculable value, and upon which the Government had expended more than forty million dollars, the stripping of freedmen of thousands of acres of confiscated land which had been dedicated to them by law, and turning over these lands to their former rebel owners, are facts which furnish a reasonably satisfactory answer to that question.

40TH CONG....2D SESS.

Reconstruction—Mr. Dixon.

SENATE.

He created officers unknown to the law, and used the public money to pay their salaries without authority or color of right. He has refused to recognize the right of Congress to institute measures for the restoration of the rebellious States and the protection of Union men in the enjoyment of property and liberty. He has sought to obstruct the execution of the laws of Congress. He has taken to his confidence and council men who, during the rebellion, were open-mouthed in their sympathy with traitors. Men who, during the war, found no warrant in the Constitution for calling out volunteers to defend the nation's life, who pronounced the draft unconstitutional, and could find no power in the General Government to coerce a sovereign State, are now his most earnest supporters and defenders, and would, if they were his counselors, advise him to call upon the Army and Navy to "put an end to impeachment and impeachers." Such a record as this leaves no room to doubt criminal intent in his last attempt to get forcible possession of the War Department by ejecting a faithful public servant, in violation of both the Constitution and the statute. The record opens with the humiliating and mortifying spectacle at his inauguration, and will end with impeachment and removal from office.

There is one more prominent incident in the career of the President which cannot be omitted without leaving the picture incomplete. Just two years before the debate began upon the resolution which we have already passed, in a speech to an excited mob of rebels and copperheads the President, forgetful of the obligations he was under to the Republican party, with base ingratitude toward the men to whom he was indebted for more official honor than the Democratic party will ever be able to confer upon him, from the steps of the White House denounced Republicans in the most bitter terms, two of whom he stigmatized as "traitors." On that day he transferred to the vanquished rebels and their sympathizers all the favors and patronage he had to bestow. Then commenced the struggle between the Executive and the people, which has been continued without interruption to the present time. The contest is nearly ended. On Tuesday last the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, whose efforts in the cause of freedom have marked him as the champion of equal rights, and whose name is graven high upon the temple of liberty, as a messenger from the House, announced to the Senate that, "in the name of the House of Representatives and of all the people of the United States we do impeach Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, of high crimes and misdemeanors in office." Loyal men who listened to his words felt that the day of the nation's deliverance was at hand. He was a fit messenger for such a message. It was retributive justice for the unfounded and malicious accusation of the 22d of February. One of the distinguished individuals whom the President had branded as traitors was now his accuser, and the other was about to sit in judgment to try the accusation. Law and order had triumphed—a triumph which will yet be more full and complete.

The events of to-day mark an epoch in the history of our country. An apostate Executive, who has used the power of his high office to thwart the will of the people, whose perfidy had well-nigh rendered of no avail all the fruits of a terrible but successful civil war, has completed the full measure of his infamy by the deliberate violation of a criminal statute in a last abortive attempt to absorb in himself all the powers of the Government. His defenders upon this floor remind us of incidents in English history. Are these happy reminders for their apostate chief? It was Charles the First, I believe, who quarreled with his Parliament because they opposed his unlawful measures and exercised the privilege of voting for or opposing such measures as they saw fit. At the head of a handful of soldiers he marched to the Commons and demanded the surrender of Hampden and others, with the intent to try them for treason, simply because they opposed his outrageous and tyrannical policy. The end of Charles was speedy. He inaugurated civil war and died upon the scaffold. Some of the same race of men who dealt with the first Stuart came over in the Mayflower. They were the founders of constitutional liberty upon this continent. The institutions they established lie at the foundation of our Republican structure, and their descendants are the men—the hated Yankees—who led our armies in the rebellion against the representatives of the Cavaliers and Huguenots. Perhaps the President will attempt the rôle of the English king; men in confederate gray can be found to follow him. It is their arms that now uphold him and their voices plead for him, and a fawning sycophant, without character or capacity, might be found here and there wearing shoulder-straps who would obey executive mandates, whether legal or illegal, and whether issued in defense of the Government or to destroy it. With such support is a coup d'état advisable? If he attempt it history will repeat itself. The great heart of the loyal people beats to the music of the Union, and it is in vain the organs of the Democracy attempt to inflame the public mind.

The President's mouth-piece in this city calls upon the people "to rise in their might and majesty and eject the Goths and Vandals who have desecrated the temple of freedom with their foul deeds." Such ebullitions are the expiring throes of that false civilization whose corner-stone was slavery. These people have yet to learn that "this is a Government of the people for the people." The mission of the Republican party is not yet ended. Slavery, which had so long cursed our land, went down in the bloody conflict inaugurated by its worshippers to extend its area and perpetuate its existence. The chivalry will not believe it dead. They are like the Eastern princess whose liege lord had died and was laid out in state: living, she loved him to adoration and would not believe him dead, but sat day by day watching his return to life, until the stench of the decaying corpse drove her away. These men are now watching over the carcass of slavery in the hope of resurrection—just when and how they do not know. They hope in vain. Its vitality has forever fled. Its rotting carcass pollutes the atmosphere, and the Democratic circle who were sincere and genuine mourners at its obsequies is fast receding, and the day is not far distant when none will be found so poor as to do honor to its memory.

The contest in our country has been between republican ideas on one side and aristocracy on the other—the Pilgrims and the Cavaliers. Jamestown typifies the one and Plymouth rock the other. Weeds and thistles have overgrown the site of the first settlement on the banks of the James, but Plymouth rock remains; and ages after the waves of the ocean shall have worn away the last vestige of that rock the free civilization and social ideas of New England shall be doing their work of christianizing the races and inculcating a love for liberty which is as broad in its philanthropy as the universe, and knows no distinction of race or color.

SPEECH OF HON. JAMES DIXON,

OF CONNECTICUT,

IN THE UNITED STATES SENATE,

March 11, 1868.

The Senate having under consideration Senate bill No. 207—

Mr. DIXON said:

MR. PRESIDENT: The Senate of the United States entered upon this great debate upon the question of reconstruction, so called, at a moment when three years of civil discord, following four years of actual war, found at their close this country still distracted, disunited, overburdened with debt, and paralyzed in every department of business. In ten southern States, if we may credit impartial witnesses, destitution has reduced many to imminent danger of actual starvation, and the people are sunk in utter despair. In the States represented in Congress industry seeks in vain its accustomed occupation; the apprehension of want saddens many hearts who never before knew such a fear, and in silent perplexity men are everywhere awaiting the developments of the future, full of uncertainty and distrust.

If at such a time there are Senators who suppose that those who differ from them can be silenced by words of reproach, of personal abuse, of vituperation, they have already found themselves mistaken. If there are Senators who suppose that to assail the motives or denounce the action of other Senators is the style of argument demanded by the necessities of the times, and desired by a suffering and patient people, they are equally mistaken. For myself, I choose rather, if possible, to imitate those who meet us with calm and dispassionate arguments. In assailing measures, as I shall feel bound to do, it is not necessary to impute to their authors and advocates unpatriotic designs. Of what consequence is it to an agnized people what are the designs and motives of the authors of the measures under which they are suffering. If it be true that the ruling party in this Congress do not intend to produce the wide-spread distress which their measures may cause, that truth alleviates no suffering, feeds no starving family, brings hope to no despairing breast; rather it may bring deeper discouragement and dispel all hope of a change of policy. It is, therefore, no source of relief to the people to be convinced that the Congress by which all the Departments of this Government, to an extent never contemplated by the Constitution, are now carried on, believe their measures to be wise and proper. The question, sir, is not what are your designs and motives, but what is the necessary effect of your policy. That is a question in which the people are beginning to perceive they have some interest. For the effect of that policy you will be held responsible. For that you are now on trial before the intelligence of the whole country.

Mr. President, in the labored defenses to which we have listened of the legislation of Congress respecting the portion of the Union lately in rebellion, the opponents of this legislation have been charged with a clamorous expression of regard for the Constitution. Even during the war, we are told, they demanded that constitutional measures should be adopted for the suppression of the rebellion. Then, as now, it is alleged, they insisted that, as the object of the war was to defend the Constitution and reassert its supremacy, its plain, indisputable provisions should not be violated in the attempt to reestablish them. Now that the war is over, and the supreme authority of the Constitution is acknowledged and obeyed in every part of our national territory, the same demand, we are told, is still made; so that the position occupied by the opponents of the congressional policy is that of the peculiar champions of the Constitution. As such they are assailed and reproachfully reminded of the fact that in the dark hours of the war they were also champions of the Constitution. "Constitution savers," they are sneeringly called. Sir, if this charge is well founded, permit me to say it redounds to the eternal honor of those against whom it is brought. The Constitution of the United States is amply sufficient for all purposes, both of war and peace. It provides for both. Its restraints may be even more necessary in war than in peace, and they do not in any manner weaken, but rather give added strength to, the administration of the Government. Our fathers did not ordain a Constitution which in time of peace should limit and direct the action of the different Departments of the Government, but which in time of war should leave them without a guide, unrestrained, and clothed with despotic authority. Powers which are dormant in peace may, it is true, spring to life in war; but under the Constitution the powers necessary for conducting a war are full and ample. Those, therefore, who object to the control of the Constitution in war, either misunderstand our system of government or else they utterly disregard and are willing to overthrow it. I repeat, then, that whatever party demands obedience to the Constitution in war as in peace is right in so doing. Especially are those right who, after the close of a war waged in defense of the Constitution, demand that the great organic law which has been vindicated and defended on the field of battle shall be obeyed as the supreme law of the land. I accept, therefore, for myself and for those with whom I act, the charge of being Constitution savers, with all the reproach that charge may convey. I do desire to save the Constitution, and the present, in my judgment, is the hour of its greatest peril.

Sir, the contest in which we are now engaged is one of far greater danger to the Constitution and to our federal system of government than the struggle of material forces which took place during the four years of actual war. The result of that struggle, though sometimes it might have given us solicitude, was never really doubtful. The victory was sure to be with the strongest. But subtle forces are now at work which may silently change the whole character of our institutions. Unseen dangers surround us. Causes, the effects of which may not be fully seen during this generation, and may be developed in future centuries; hatreds which may slumber till opportunity shall wake them to life, differences of race, diversities of interest, which will deepen and intensify as our continent becomes more populous—all these, and numberless other circumstances, which to the thoughtful mind need scarcely be suggested, give an incalculable importance to the mode to be adopted of restoring the harmonious relations of the States. The permanence of our federal system of government will be far more endangered by an error at this stage of our condition than it was by any open acts of hostility to which it has been exposed. To save and perpetuate the Constitution, if any patriotic party is endowed with the wisdom to perform such a work, is indeed a task for the wisest and the best; let them not be driven from it by the denunciations of the thoughtless and inconsiderate.

I listened with interest to the speech of my colleague, and in one portion of his remarks, at least, I found myself able to agree with him, if his meaning is limited, as I suppose it to be. I believe with him that the people of the United States constitute one nation. Yet I believe, and so I think must my colleague, that the Government established by the Constitution is limited and restricted in its powers. The very design of our constitutional form of Government was to delegate, or, to use another word of the Constitution, to grant, certain specified powers. The people undertook to do what never before had successfully been done, to grant to the Government they were about to establish certain powers, and to reserve to themselves (or to the States) the powers not granted. The Government thus created is not, therefore, in the sense in which the word is used in Europe, sovereign. It has limitations and restrictions. There are certain acts which it cannot perform—certain functions of Government from which it is prohibited. It cannot, for example, establish a national religion. Mr. Webster, in his reply to Mr. Calhoun, admirably describes and defines its character in view of these limitations of its power. I read from volume 2, page 185, of his works:

"The nature of sovereignty or sovereign power has been extensively discussed by gentlemen on this occasion, as it generally is when the origin of our Government is debated. But I confess myself not entirely satisfied with arguments and illustrations drawn from that topic. The sovereignty of Government is an idea belonging to the other side of the Atlantic. No such thing is known in North America. Our governments are all limited. In Europe sovereignty is of feudal origin, and imports no more than the state of the sovereign. It comprises his rights, exemptions, prerogatives, and powers. But with us all power is with the people. They alone are sovereign. None of these governments is sovereign in the European sense of the word, all being restrained by written constitutions. It seems to me, therefore, that we only perplex ourselves when we attempt to explain the relations existing between the General Government and the several State governments according to those ideas of sovereignty which prevail under systems essentially differing from our own."

My colleague speaks as if we supposed the character of our Government had been in dispute from its formation to the end of the late war. But by all that portion of the southern people who agreed politically with Mr. Clay and Mr. Webster, and by almost the entire intellect of the North, the doctrines of Mr. Webster in his reply to Mr. Hayne in 1828, and in his reply to Mr. Calhoun in 1833, have been accepted as correct and unanswerable. In those speeches may be found a perfect exposition of the true character of our federal system and of the relations and rights of the States, which, so long as our constitutional form of government shall remain, will require no further comment or elucidation. Perhaps my colleague, in his theory of nationality, does not wish to be understood to differ materially from the doctrines of those discussions. Possibly, if he had entered more fully into the subject, he might somewhat have limited and restricted his meaning. Certainly he cannot mean to deny that powers not granted are reserved, nor that the State of Connecticut, within the sphere of her legitimate powers, can exercise the very highest attributes of sovereignty by the enactment of laws which have strength enough to deprive a human being of liberty and life. He cannot mean to deny that all the domestic relations, speaking generally, are there regulated by laws enacted by the State Legislature, with which the Government of the United States has no power to interfere. Marriage, divorce, the descent of real and personal estate, the punishment of every species of local crime, the regulation of suffrage, all these are wholly within the control of the Legislature of Connecticut, and in relation to them, within the jurisdiction of a State, the Government of the United States is wholly powerless. I know not, therefore, precisely what my colleague means when he speaks of "all municipal and State organizations revolving around the great central orb, the nation!" Can he possibly suppose that the relations of a State to the Federal Government are similar to those of a "municipal organization" to the State government? The municipal organizations, or in other words incorporated cities and towns, exist by the permission of the State; can at any moment, by an act of State legislation, be changed or abolished or extended, always provided that no contract is violated. They are, indeed, mere creatures of the State—municipal corporations, created by law. Is that the character of a State? I think my colleague must have used language hastily and unguardedly; yet, if uncorrected, his speech must mislead those, and I know they are many, who rely on his teachings.

Permit me here, as this is a matter which ought to be fully understood by the people, to read two extracts which throw a clear light upon the subject of the relations of the Federal and State governments, and the peculiar mode of existence of both. The first extract is from the opinion of the late Chief Justice Williams, of Connecticut, in the case of Pratt vs. Allen, 13 Connecticut Reports, page 119. I will barely read the marginal note of the case:

"The Constitution of the United States is a grant of powers where they did not before exist; but the constitution of this State is a limitation of powers already existing, leaving the legislative department, subject to the limitation specified, as it found it."

The second extract is from the speech of Mr. Webster in reply to Mr. Calhoun, from which I have already quoted. Works of Mr. Webster, volume 2, page 117:

"The people, sir, in every State, live under two governments. They owe obedience to both. Those governments, though distinct, are not adverse. Each has its separate sphere and its peculiar powers and duties. It is not a contest between two sovereigns for the same powers, like the wars of the rival houses in England, nor is it a dispute between a Government de facto and a Government de jure. It is the case of a division of powers between two Governments made by the people, to which both are responsible. Neither can dispense with the duty which individuals owe to the other; neither can call itself master of the other; the people are masters of both. This division of power, it is true, is in a great measure unknown in Europe. It is the peculiar system of America, and, though new and singular, it is not incomprehensible. The State constitutions are established by the people of the State. This constitution is established by the people of all the States."

It thus appears that within its proper sphere of action, and in that vast region of governmental function, where it cannot possibly come in conflict with the Government of the United States, the government of Connecticut, and of every other State, is as truly a government and as completely sovereign as any such organized power can be, limited, of course, by the restrictions placed upon it by the people in their State constitutions. The Senator, my colleague, says:

"Thus far I may seem to have been arguing truisms. I now go a step further, and assert that this sovereignty [of the people of the United States] is exercised primarily through suffrage."

That assertion, if my colleague will permit me to say so, does not seem to me a very wide step from "the truisms" which he had already asserted. Of course, sovereignty is exercised primarily through suffrage, and nobody will undertake to deny what the Senator proceeds further to assert, that "the right of suffrage in the individual man is derived from his participation in the sovereignty of the Republic, and that if all participation in it is lost suffrage is lost." That, I take it, is only a mode, perhaps not very clear, of saying that every man must exercise his sovereignty by voting, and that his right of voting may be forfeited or abandoned. My colleague will pardon me if I find some little obscurity in this part of his speech. But I only notice it lest under it should lurk some hidden heresy like that on which those Senators rest who claim that Congress may enact suffrage laws for the States. If that notion is concealed under his peculiar phrasology I beg my colleague not to consider me, by acquiescing in a degree in his doctrine of nationality, as waiving my right to protest against the heresy in question.

I have been led, Mr. President, to a longer digression into the path of discussion opened up by my colleague than I intended. I now proceed to the line of argument which, in my own mind, I had assigned to myself in this debate. I claim that the conservative people of the country—it is immaterial by whatever name they are called, whether Conservatives or Democrats—are justified in their present demand, that the mode of reconstruction, so-called, and all the action of the Government with regard to the States now unrepresented in Congress, shall be controlled by and founded upon the Constitution of the United States, and should be in harmony with the true theory of the relations of the States and the Federal Government, as heretofore understood and acknowledged. To establish this I lay down three propositions, which I shall attempt to prove.

1. That the war was avowedly conducted, on the part of the President and of Congress, on the theory that their action was to be controlled by the Constitution and that it was so controlled, if their professions could be relied on.
2. That the war was also conducted on the theory that the rebel States were States in the Union, with valid constitutions, and that their loyal people had a right to representation in Congress, which right was constantly acknowledged, and actual representation was permitted and invited in both Houses of Congress.

3. That after the close of the war this theory continued to control the action of the Government until the passage of the reconstruction act, so called, when the constitutional theory was abandoned, and it was proclaimed for the first time by the chairman of the Reconstruction Committee of the House of Representatives, the acknowledged leader of that body, that the entire legislation of Congress on this subject was outside of the Constitution.

I propose to take up these three propositions in their order.

1. That the war was avowedly conducted, on the part of the President and of Congress, on the theory that their action was to be controlled by the Constitution and that it was so controlled.

What was the first act of President Lincoln after the actual outbreak of hostilities by the assault on Fort Sumter? The first resort was to the Constitution, and to the law passed in conformity with it, for instructions. In obedience to that law, and in strict compliance with its provisions, he issued his proclamation of April 17, 1861, calling for seventy-five thousand men to suppress the insurrection. So careful was he to obey the injunctions of the law that we can now scarcely repress a smile at the almost grotesque formality of his compliance with the requirement that he should order the insurgents to disperse to their homes within the period specified in the statute. The time of service required of the troops was limited to the period of three months, the utmost extent allowed by the law. Having thus done all that the Constitution and the laws permitted, the President summoned Congress to meet on the 4th of July. Meanwhile, Virginia passed her ordinance of secession, and a rebel army approached within thirty miles of Washington, where an unsuccessful attempt was made with the troops thus legally called out to suppress the insurrection.

The battle of Bull Run took place on the 23d day of July, 1861. Two days after that battle both Houses of Congress, with almost entire unanimity, issued a manifesto declaring the purposes and objects of the war in the form of the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the present deplorable civil war has been forced upon the country by the disunionists of the southern States now in revolt against the constitutional Government, and in arms around the capital; that in this national emergency Congress, banishing all feeling of more passion or resentment, will recollect only its duty to the whole country; that this war is not waged, upon our part, in any spirit of oppression, nor for any purpose of conquest or subjugation, nor purpose of overthrowing or interfering with the rights or established institutions of those States; but to defend and maintain the supremacy of the Constitution, and to preserve the Union, with all the dignity, equality, and rights of the several States unimpaired; that as soon as these objects are accomplished the war ought to cease."

Why was this resolution adopted? In the House of Representatives it was offered by John J. Crittenden, of Kentucky. In the Senate it was offered by Andrew Johnson, of Tennessee. Was it the offspring of fear? Our Army had been defeated, and our capital lay at the mercy, as some supposed, of the rebel invader; yet neither in this body nor in the House of Representatives were there any signs of fear. Cowardice did not dictate that resolution. It was a calm, deliberate expression on the part of the nation's representatives of the nation's purpose. It declared to the world the theory of the war. It disavowed any purpose of subjugation, and declared that the institutions, the rights and dignity of the States were to be maintained. To the rights and dignity of what States did it refer? Of course the States in which the insurrection prevailed. The rights and dignity of no other States were in peril. Was there, Mr. President, a single Senator voting for that resolution who then believed that after the war it would be repudiated, and that subjugation would be avowed as its accomplished end? My friend from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] smiles. He is somewhat relieved from responsibility with regard to it, although he did not meet it with his usual courage. His silence, perhaps, gave consent.

Mr. SUMNER. My friend knows I did not vote for that resolution.

Mr. DIXON. He sat in his seat, I remember, on that occasion.

Mr. SUMNER. I refused to vote for it.

Mr. DIXON. Yes; I listened for the tones of his voice in vain. But, sir, it was, I think, unanimously adopted, with the exception of the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. TRUMBULL,] who denied the truth of the allegation that the rebels were surrounding the capital, and for that reason, as he stated, voted in the negative. I shall allude again to this resolution in another part of my remarks, but I now wish to advert to the claim sometimes made, that necessarily its provisions were abandoned in the progress of the war, and particularly in the subsequent abolition of slavery. I deny that the action of the Government on the subject of slavery was, in any respect, a departure from or a denial of the true intent and meaning of this resolution. Slavery was abolished by three different proceedings, all of which were entirely consistent with its language. First, by the proclamation of Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States, issued in September, 1862. This proclamation was merely a war measure, as much so as the firing of a cannon or the explosion of a mine. It was only as such a measure that it had any legal effect. That this was so understood is proved by the fact that it excepted from its operation the States of Delaware, Maryland, Kentucky, West Virginia, Tennessee, and all that portion of Louisiana which was in the actual control and possession of the Federal power. The dignity and the rights of the slaveholding States not in rebellion were held sacred, and where in the rebel States the Government had actual possession and physical power to abolish slavery it was not abolished. Thus far, then, slavery had only been attacked as a stronghold of the enemy and as an act of war. The next step in the abolition of slavery was the liberation of the slaves in the District of Columbia by act of Congress. To the owners of these slaves full compensation was made. The law passed for this purpose was an ordinary act of legislation, which, by the express terms of the Constitution, Congress had full power to enact.

The next step in the progress of emancipation was the amendment of the Constitution of the United States, by which slavery was abolished in all the States. This amendment was proposed and ratified in the mode pointed out by the Constitution itself, was cheerfully consented to by most, if not all, of the rebel States, and was in no respect inconsistent with the letter and spirit of the resolution of July, 1861. Thus it will be seen that the action of the Government in relation to slavery was neither in point of fact nor intention a repudiation of that resolution. Those, therefore, who declare that the progress of events has rendered it impossible to carry into full effect its meaning, and mention as a proof of this the subsequent abolition of slavery, entirely misunderstand the nature and mode of that proceeding.

Secondly. I now proceed to my second proposition, that the war was conducted on the theory that the rebel States, so called, were States in the Union, with valid constitutions, and with a right on a part of the loyal people thereof to representation, which right was constantly acknowledged, and actual representation in both Houses of Congress permitted. And here I call your attention again to the resolution already quoted of July, 1861. That resolution speaks expressly of the rebel States as States, and of their dignity and rights and separate existence. But I pass from this resolution to another even more solemn proceeding of Congress, and more conclusive as to the real intentions and purposes of the Government, inasmuch as it took the form and was clothed with the authority of law. I refer to the act passed December 31, 1862, by which the State of West Virginia was created from a portion of the territory of the State of Virginia. The Constitution provides that no new State shall be made from the territory of an existing State except by its own consent. It was necessary, therefore, before the State of West Virginia could be formed, that the State of Virginia should perform the most solemn and the most important act of legislation of which we can conceive, namely, its own subdivision and disintegration. The State of Virginia performed this act; or if this fact is denied, then it follows that the State of West Virginia has now no existence. The preamble of the act of Congress creating the State of West Virginia is in the following language:

"Whereas the people inhabiting that portion of Virginia known as West Virginia did, by a convention assembled in the city of Wheeling on the 20th of November, 1861, frame for themselves a constitution with a view of becoming a separate and independent State; and whereas at a general election held in the counties composing the territory aforesaid, on the 3d day of May last, the said constitution was approved and adopted by the qualified voters of the proposed State; and whereas the Legislature of Virginia, by an act passed on the 13th day of May, 1862, did give its consent to the formation of a new State within the jurisdiction of the said State of Virginia, to be known by the name of West Virginia, and to embrace the following named counties, to wit:—
* * * * * "And whereas both the convention and the Legislature aforesaid have requested that the new States should be admitted into the Union, and the constitution aforesaid being republican in form, Congress doth hereby consent that the said forty-eight counties may be formed into a separate and independent State."

It is too late for the Government of the United States, or for any member of Congress who shared in that legislation, to deny that, at that time, Virginia was a State in the Union with a valid constitution, with a Legislature capable of performing any legislative act, and with a government as sovereign and as complete in all its parts as that of any State in the Union. Yet rebellion and insurrection held a large portion of that State in adverse possession and forcibly excluded the Government of the United States from the region so held. A large majority of the people of Virginia were then rebels against the authority of the United States, claimed to be freed from that authority by the ordinance of secession, and assumed to be citizens of a foreign government. Yet the Congress of the United States and the President of the United States, in spite of all this, took the correct ground that Virginia had an existing Legislature and retained all the powers and was subject to all the duties of a State within the Union of States.

I now proceed to show under this head that the Government also acknowledged the rebel States to possess valid constitutions and the right to representation in Congress, and that actual representation was allowed and invited in both Houses. Without a valid State constitution it is difficult to see how an act of legislation can be performed by the Legislature of a State. The constitution of Virginia, as of every other State, defines the separate action of each branch of the Legislature, regulates the veto power of the Governor, and, in short, under its directing provisions all legislation is performed. To acknowledge, therefore, valid legislation on the part of a Legislature of a State is to acknowledge the validity of its constitution, and if the constitution of Virginia was valid two years after the passage of the ordinance of secession and while the war was flagrant it remains valid to this day, unless repealed by proper authority.

I now come to the right of representation. I call to the recollection of Senators the fact shown by your own records, and by solemn credentials now on file in your archives, that after the passage of the ordinance of secession the same Legislature of Virginia, whose power you recognized as sufficient to consent to the division of that State, elected and returned to this body two Senators of the United States for the State of Virginia, namely, Mr. Carlile and Mr. Bowden. Both these Senators were qualified and admitted as members of this body. One of them, Mr. Bowden, died before the expiration of his term. The other, Mr. Carlile, continued to hold his seat during his term of service, and was a Senator of the United States from Virginia almost to the time of the surrender of General Lee's army. In the House of Representatives a similar condition of things existed. Several districts in Virginia were represented in that body during nearly the whole continuance of the war. Nor was Virginia the only seceding State represented in both Houses of Congress. Who then denied the right and duty of Andrew Johnson to continue to act as a Senator from Tennessee, although that State was swept by the hostile armies of the confederacy, and had undertaken to secede from the Union? Yet the Senator from Oregon [Mr. WILLIAMS] argued that every citizen of Tennessee was an alien enemy during the war, and, as such, liable to forfeit life, liberty, and property. We acted on a very different theory. Our Government admitted the right of representation on the part of loyal citizens of all the States. Nor was this all. The Executive of the United States, being then authorized by act of Congress to offer terms at his discretion to the insurgents, on the 22d day of September, 1862, issued his first premonitory proclamation relating to the emancipation of slaves. From that proclamation I quote the following:

SENATE.

Reconstruction—Mr. Dixon.

"That the Executive will, on the 1st day of January aforesaid, by proclamation, designate the States and parts of States, if any, in which the people thereof, respectively, shall then be in rebellion against the United States; and the fact that any State, or the people thereof, shall on that day be, in good faith, represented in the Congress of the United States by members chosen thereto at elections, wherein a majority of the qualified voters of such States shall have participated, shall, in the absence of strong countervailing testimony, be deemed conclusive evidence that such State and the people thereof are not then in rebellion against the United States."

What do we here find? An express invitation to rebels in arms to occupy seats in the Congress of the United States as Senators and Representatives, and an express promise that if they will consent to do so the proclamation of emancipation shall be withheld and slavery be permitted to live forever. This, Mr. President, was from Abraham Lincoln, the great apostle of liberty, and yet we are told that when his successor, following in his footsteps and pursuing his policy, proclaims his belief that the war being over and slavery forever abolished with all its incidents, the loyal people of the South ought to be represented in Congress, he is a traitor and a usurper.

If, in reviewing the action of the Government during the war, we turn our eyes to the debates in Congress, we shall find that the leaders of the Republican party were almost unanimous in the support of the doctrines upon which I have shown that the Government proceeded. One Senator only, Mr. SUMNER, of Massachusetts, propounded a different theory.

By reference to the Congressional Globe of April 2, 1862, page 1493, the following extract may be found from the speech of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN.] Senators who were then present will remember that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] was informed in that debate that he stood alone in his theory with regard to the rebel States. The opinion then entertained with regard to it by Republican Senators was correctly expressed in what I will now read from the speech of the Senator from Ohio:

"I, therefore, cannot help but say that, while I respect the motives of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, while I give him credit for consistency, ability, and a great deal of culture, and am always glad to hear him speak, yet I must confess that, when I looked over his resolutions, they struck me with surprise and regret. They would revolutionize this Government. Sir, strike the States out of this system of government, and your Government is lost and gone. I cannot conceive of the United States governing colonies and provinces containing millions upon millions of people, black and white. I do not think such a thing can exist. I do not believe it is in the power of secession to bring us to such a state of things. I can draw no distinction between the resolutions of the Senator from Massachusetts and the doctrines that are proclaimed by Jefferson Davis. If a State can secede the people of the State can make a new government. If the people of South Carolina are firm and united in their policy, which no man doubts; if they have power to secede, they have seceded, and their doctrine is true. But I do not believe they have the power to secede. They may go in banishment, wandering all over the face of the earth, but they cannot take with them a single foot of the soil of this country over which our flag ever floated. The doctrine of the Senator from Massachusetts is substantially an acknowledgment of the right of secession, of the right to secede. He, however, puts the States in the condition of abject Territories, to be governed by Congress. Jefferson Davis puts it in the power of the people of the States to govern the States themselves. As to which is the most dangerous or obnoxious doctrine I leave every man to determine."

The progress which has been made since that day is instructive. Opinions held by men capable of forming and holding an opinion have been abandoned, and doctrines which then shocked the candid and well-informed minds of distinguished Senators are now accepted as the basis of their actions. Sir, it is not my province to condemn others, but having at that time taken ground in the Senate against the theory then first proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts, I have, as yet, seen no reason to change my opinion. I stand where I then stood, and there I propose to stand. If others find sufficient reason to change their deliberately expressed opinions, they should be slow to condemn those who may not change with equal facility.

I now come to the close of the war, and shall, in the third place, show that the constitutional theory on which the war was conducted continued to control the Government until the passage of the reconstruction act, so called, when it was abandoned, and it was proclaimed for the first time by the chairman of the Reconstruction Committee of the House of Representatives, the acknowledged leader of that body, that the entire legislation of Congress on this subject was outside of the Constitution.

President Lincoln had then been reelected. Andrew Johnson had been rewarded by a grateful people for his fidelity to the Constitution by the second office in the Government. President Lincoln had announced only three days before his death, in a public speech, his policy of reconstruction. The sworn testimony of Mr. Stanton before the Impeachment Committee shows that his policy was taken up and pursued by President Johnson, under the advice of the Cabinet, which, as a unit, he inherited from his predecessor. Everything which President Lincoln had done up to that period, and everything President Johnson afterward did, in pursuance of President Lincoln's plan, had been ratified and confirmed by the people at the preceding presidential election. Had President Lincoln lived, this policy would have been pursued by him, and in it he would have been sustained by a majority of Congress. But after his lamented death the spirit of Radicalism revived. At first the great end at which it aimed—the elevation of the negro race to political supremacy in the southern States—seemed only dimly to be apprehended by itself. Then that bolder line of policy, since adopted, the disfranchisement of a sufficient number of the white race to make the black element controlling in the South, had not been entered upon, perhaps not even imagined.

President Johnson was, of course, unable, opposed as he was by two thirds of each House of Congress, to give affirmative force to the plan of reconstruction which he had inherited from his predecessor. He, however, did all that the executive Government could do to restore the Union. And finally, on the 20th day of August, 1866, he issued his proclamation declaring to the nation the perfect and entire restoration of peace throughout all the States of the Union. Was that proclamation of binding force? The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FREELINGHUYSEN] declared that the President had no power to declare the return of peace, and that such a declaration on his part had no authority unless ratified by Congress.

I find on the pages of the statute-book a ratification of that proclamation by solemn act of Congress, passed on the 2d day of March, 1867. Section two of an act entitled "An act to provide for a temporary increase of the pay of officers in the Army of the United States, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1867, reads as follows:

"That section one of an act entitled 'An act to increase the pay of soldiers in the United States Army, and for other purposes,' approved June 20, 1864, be, and the same is hereby, continued in full force and effect for three years from and after the close of the rebellion, as announced by the President of the United States by proclamation bearing date the 20th of August, 1866."

Peace, then, was restored, as all must admit, on the passage of this act.

Before proceeding to the consideration of the new policy inaugurated by the reconstruction act, so called, I ask a moment's attention to the resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, known as the fourteenth article. The provisions of that section, with the causes of its rejection by the States of the South, have been fully discussed by the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. DOOLITTLE.]

When that resolution was proposed by Congress, only a little more than one year ago, the project of universal negro suffrage and restricted white suffrage at the South had not been conceived. The proposed amendment proceeded on the ground of exclusive white suffrage. It proposed to leave the question of suffrage where the Constitution left it, with the people of the several States, South as well as North. On that issue the present House of Representatives was chosen. On no other issue could a House of such a political character have been chosen. Yet, suddenly, at the first session of the legislative body thus elected, a new edict went forth from their great political leader, to which, with almost entire unanimity, his followers yielded submissive, unquestioning obedience. Here is the letter in which he boldly declares to the country that all the Radical leaders agreed that their action was outside of the Constitution and that they had repudiated that sacred instrument:

COLUMBIA, PENNSYLVANIA, August 24, 1867.

DEAR SIR: Several of your intelligent constituents in this region, no doubt from want of proper information, are complaining of mistakes made by Congress in not passing laws at the last session restraining the removals of certain officers engaged in reconstruction. I contended that you had passed an act at the very close providing for that very contingency, but which is not executed. Will you be so good as to inform me now? for our Representative is responsible for this omission, if omission it be. You know we are in the habit of dealing familiarly with the member from the ninth. A brief answer will much oblige.

Your friend,
HON. THADDEUS STEVENS, Lancaster, Pennsylvania.

LANCASTER, PENNSYLVANIA, August 26, 1867.

DEAR SIR: You are right in supposing that Congress makes mistakes, as is the inevitable lot of man; but you mistake in supposing that there is any law to prohibit the removal of district commanders without the consent of the Senate. Soon after the commencement of the last session of Congress I reported a bill from a committee of the House of Representatives which contained provisions prohibiting removals without the consent of the Senate. It passed the House and was sent to the Senate. The Senate struck it out and returned it to the House, who refused to concur in the amendment. The result was a committee of conference, where an animated contest ensued. There were several other questions in controversy between the Houses, which the House offered to yield if this would be granted. The Senate perseveringly refused, declaring that they would sooner lose the bill. As that would frustrate all our legislation it could not be allowed. The House yielded, with a warning of the evil it would inflict upon the country. Some of the members of the Senate seemed to doubt their power under the Constitution which they had just repudiated, and wholly outside of which all agreed that we were acting, else our whole work of reconstruction was usurpation; or, perhaps, they had a desire to be thought to be grossly conservative and magnanimous. The ideas seemed to control the action of some half a dozen Senators, who preferred trusting the President. My dear Colonel, a few Senators of great ability, undoubted patriotism, and purity have become so saturated with what they are pleased to call conservatism (whose meaning, I confess, I am unable to understand) that I fear they will forget the monster that was slain in 1776 and again in 1861; and will thus do great damage to the creation of a Government now so capable of being converted into a political paradise. This is liable to happen, not so much by a direct and palpable attack upon its framework as by gradually forgetting the vital principles of the Declaration of Independence. Strike out one of the living sparks which gave life to our Goddess of Liberty, and a mysterious and intense heat, whose welding fires near a century ago and at present are fusing principles of freedom and reducing despotism to cinders, will gradually cool, until the most conservative despot could thrust his sword into it without affecting its temper. I have said above I did not know the meaning of conservatism. I have since seen the report of a speech said to have been made by an Ohio Senator at Canton, Ohio, which, if it be truly reported, and is to be considered as a definition of that doctrine, then it to me is very alarming, worse than copperheadism. It is legislation without authority and reconstruction by usurpation.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
THADDEUS STEVENS.
Colonel SAMUEL SCHOCH, Columbia, Pennsylvania.

With the passage of the first reconstruction act, so called, commenced the final and complete triumph of ultra-radicalism in the Republican party. If there were some feeble struggles to resist the inevitable tendency they were unavailing. On the 2d day of March, 1867, the first of the series of measures now appearing as laws on your statute-book and proposed to be supplemented by the bill now under consideration was enacted. The whole country was in a state of actual peace, so declared to be by the proclamation of the President of August, 1866, ratified and recognized by the act of Congress of March 2, 1867, as already cited. In the language of Mr. THADDEUS STEVENS "it was legislation without authority and reconstruction by usurpation." I can only rapidly glance, at the extraordinary provisions of this bill pushed through the House by Mr. STEVENS under the previous question. The whole country knows its contents by heart. The writ of habeas corpus it suspends, unless its issue be authorized by a military officer; it establishes a military despotism throughout the ten States so harsh and severe that one of the officers in command has been charged with violating the law and threatened with dismissal for intimating a design to give the civil authority, in some few instances, supremacy over military power. Under the pretense of establishing a republican form of government every vestige of liberty has been blotted out and every guarantee of human rights known to our Constitution utterly abolished and destroyed. The right of suffrage has been indiscriminately extended to an ignorant race, many of whom have not the slightest conception of the meaning of the act of voting.

Sir, here I would gladly stop. I am not unmindful that there are men of generous and magnanimous natures who, forgetting the high and sacred character of the voter's duty, and the dependence upon its proper and intelligent exercise of the very existence of republican institutions, imagine we have a right indulgently to confer the privilege of suffrage, as we would confer a private benefaction, upon all alike, whether qualified or not for its exercise. But, if we acknowledge that the honest advocates of universal suffrage are not without a claim to our sympathy, even when their arguments do not convince our judgments, what shall we say when we find that this show of universal suffrage now made by the advocates of the congressional policy is only a pretext and a delusion. You do not, after all your pretenses, mean universal suffrage. On the contrary, your law actually disfranchises a large portion of the white people. You refuse to adopt intelligence as a test, and then you proceed to strip that class whom you know to be most intelligent of the right of voting which they have always enjoyed. Thousands upon thousands of the thinking minds of the South find themselves deprived of the right of voting by a law which you dare to tell the country is intended to make suffrage universal. I find, sir, under this law, that almost every man capable of holding the pettiest office comes under the ban of your proscription, and is to be allowed no share in the government of the community in which he lives. How is this done? Not on the face of the law, but in a manner furtive and deceptive. The fourteenth proposed amendment to the Constitution provides that a certain specified class, including all who ever held any office, shall, under certain circumstances, be deprived of the privilege of holding office under the State or Federal Government. The reconstruction law simply provides that all who, by this proposed amendment, were to be excluded from office shall be refused registration as voters. Thus the work is done. How many white men are thus reduced to a political condition beneath that of their former slaves it is difficult accurately to ascertain. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORRIS] admits the number to be fifty thousand. I have no doubt, judging from the effect which such an exclusion would have if existing in my own State, that the number disfranchised in the entire South is at least two hundred thousand. But take the estimate of the Senator from Indiana, namely, fifty thousand; that number accomplishes the object of the disfranchisement. We find that the negro majority on the total registration lists of the whole South, as given in the Tribune Almanac, is about forty-five thousand in the aggregate. The disfranchisement of fifty thousand white men accomplishes, therefore, the intended object, negro supremacy. In five States this supremacy is complete and overwhelming. In Virginia, by the same authority, the white majority is only six per cent., and in Georgia only one per cent. So that in those two States, also, the black vote, controlled as it is and held in one compact body by emissaries from the North, governs the State.

But, sir, even this is not all. The supremacy of the colored population is not, as some Senator has claimed, temporary, and confined to the election for members of the conventions and the ratification of the State constitutions. The perpetuity of this supremacy is provided for by a contrivance which exceeds in diabolical ingenuity anything ever recorded in the annals of political management. The new constitution of Alabama, which we now propose to ratify and confirm, although supposed to be rejected by the popular vote in that State, contains the following provisions, which continue in force the disfranchisement of the white population whose registration as voters is now prohibited by congressional legislation, and also forever disfranchise every man who will not bind himself by oath, in effect, never to oppose unqualified universal negro suffrage. These provisions will undoubtedly, under instructions from headquarters, be copied into all the southern State constitutions. Here they are, as they stand in the new constitution of Alabama:

"It shall be the duty of the General Assembly to provide, from time to time, for the registration of all electors; but the following classes of persons shall not be permitted to register, vote, or hold office:

"Those who may be disqualified from holding office by the proposed amendment of the Constitution of the United States known as article fourteen, and those who have been disqualified from registering to vote for delegates to the convention to frame a constitution for the State of Alabama, under the act of Congress to provide for the most efficient government of the rebel States, passed by Congress March 2, 1867, and the acts supplementary thereto, except such persons as aided in the reconstruction proposed by Congress, and accept the political equality of all men before the law: Provided, That the General Assembly shall have power to remove the disabilities incurred under this clause.

"All persons, before registering, must take and subscribe the following oath: 'I, —, do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will support and maintain the Constitution and laws of the United States and the constitution and laws of the State of Alabama; that I am not excluded from registering by any of the clauses in section three, article seven, of the constitution of the State of Alabama; that I will never countenance or aid in the secession of this State from the United States; that I accept the civil and political equality of all men, and agree not to attempt to deprive any person or persons, on account of race, color, or previous condition, of any political or civil right, privilege, or immunity enjoyed by any other class of men; and, furthermore, that I will not in any way injure, or countenance in others any attempt to injure, any person or persons on account of past or present support of the Government of the United States, the laws of the United States, or the principle of political and civil equality of all men, or for affiliation with any political party.'

What, sir, is the object of this? Is it pretended that it is needed to protect the black man in a State where he is a voter, and where his race has an immense majority of registered voters? No, sir; that is a mere pretext. He needs no such protection. It is designed to continue, as it will ever continue in force, the disfranchisement and humiliation of the white population. Sir, apply it to your own State. How large a proportion of your own people would be disfranchised if you demanded of them an oath never to vote against negro suffrage? How many of my own? And yet the people are told that negro supremacy at the South is a fable devised for political effect.

My colleague has discovered an excuse for the disfranchisement of this large proportion of the intelligent white people of the South, which certainly is new with him, and the ingenuity of no other Senator has suggested it. He does not trouble himself as to the fact, nor attempts to diminish the estimated number; but he boldly asserts that nobody is disfranchised at all, because, by the rebellion the whites had all forfeited the right of voting; and, as it only has not been restored to them, they were disfranchised already. Does my colleague suppose that by such a technicality he can satisfy honest, plain people, who desire to do right? When he argues that the blacks of his own State ought not to be disfranchised would he be satisfied with the answer that we do not disfranchise them because they were disfranchised already? Sir, my colleague knows very well that if the disfranchised white people of the South ought to be permitted to vote—now the more especially, as their emancipated slaves have that privilege—it is the merest mockery to say that our law does not disfranchise them because they were disfranchised already. Remove, then, the disfranchisement if it ought to be removed, as, by your law, you have power to do. If you refuse to do this, then boldly avow your purpose, and do not seek refuge in technicalities like these. But, in point of fact, my colleague is entirely mistaken in supposing that the white people of the southern States, who are now refused registration as voters, were disfranchised before the passage of the act of Congress, by which they are denied the right of suffrage. It is not true that they were, as my colleague alleges, disfranchised already. On the contrary, their right to vote was fully recognized by the proposed fourteenth amendment of the Constitution, which proceeded on the idea that suffrage was confined to the white people of the South. The Legislatures which refused to ratify that amendment were chosen by white voters only. The blacks were then the only disfranchised class; so that my colleague's technical defense is unsupported by the facts in the case.

Sir, I have observed that very few Senators openly excuse and defend the disfranchisement of white men at the South. Some declare that it was forced upon them by the House of Representatives; some deny that it exists to so great an extent as is actually shown; but nearly all, by their mode of treating it, acknowledge it to be a great wrong. Why, then, is not the evil remedied? It is not, even now, too late. You have power to, at one blow, strike off the shackles of the white race and make them at least the equals of the blacks. Will you do it? By so doing you will, at this late hour, remove one of the principal objections to your reconstruction acts. The time has now actually come when we stand here in the Senate of the United States and ask you to give the right of equal suffrage to the white man. You refuse. Is there no purpose in this? Sir, I think there is a purpose, and I believe it is revealed in what I now propose to read, in an extract from a speech delivered at this session of the Senate, by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WILSON.] I had occasion once before to allude to the remarks in question, and lest I should misquote the Senator, I have obtained from our faithful reporter, Mr. Sutton, from the short-hand notes taken at the time, the precise words uttered by him. They were as follows:

Extract from notes of Mr. Wilson's speech, Dec. 4, 1867.

"Since the morning of creation no seven hundred thousand men have shown more principle, more patience, more devotion, more of all the virtues to be commended than the seven hundred thousand black men of the rebel States into whose hands we have put the ballot and put the destinies of that portion of the country; and whoever says otherwise slanders and maligns them."

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does the Senator understand that the Senator from Massachusetts was speaking for anybody but himself?

Mr. DIXON. Of course not; but I claim that the honorable Senator from Massachusetts is a representative man. He represents a large body of the people, and is generally accepted as a representative of his party.

Mr. EDMUNDS. He only represents the people of his own State.

Mr. DIXON. "The destinies of the South to be placed in the hands of the black man." That, in few words, gives the design and effect of the congressional policy. On that question I await the final verdict of the people.

Mr. President, there is but one more point in your reconstruction policy to which I wish to allude, and my work is done. I find on your table a bill which has already passed the House of Representatives by a strictly party vote, by which the power which has heretofore existed in the Supreme Court of the United States to decide impartially all cases involving constitutional questions, as they decide all other questions, is, under certain circumstances, taken from that august tribunal. I find, also, in another bill, which passed the House of Representatives and is now before the Senate, a prohibition, complete and entire, against any decision whatever on the question of its own constitutionality, by that ancient and venerable court, in which the Constitution declares the judicial power of the United States to be vested. I find another bill reported in one House which takes from the same great tribunal its time-honored and long-exercised appellate jurisdiction, in certain cases involving the constitutionality of an act of Congress. Can the people of the United States look without deep emotion, without alarm, without indignation, upon the bare statement of such a series of measures.

My colleague, who seems himself shocked at their enormity, satisfies himself with the assurance that these measures are not yet adopted. Sir, if my colleague had enjoyed the benefit of even my own imperfect experience in the peculiarities of radical legislation he would at once dismiss from his mind any expectation of relief from these radical measures to which I have alluded, on the ground that they have not yet been adopted. The word, let me tell him, has gone forth. By a party vote, two of them have already passed one House, and if my colleague supposes he can safely indulge in the luxury of exercising his private judgment in the vote he may give upon them in this body, his confiding inexperience is truly painful to behold. Sir, there is no right of private judgment permitted in the Radical party.

There are Senators before me who have attempted to exercise it, and any comment by me on the result might probably be considered unkind and offensive. The Senate knows and the country knows when and how the lash has been held in readiness; its application has been witnessed; the recreant and straying members have meekly returned to the fold, and the lesson has not been forgotten by their fellows. I commend it to the careful consideration of my colleague.

The honorable Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON,] whose views now differ so widely from those advocated with equal ability by him three years ago, accounts for his own acknowledged inconsistency by saying that he has been educated by the progress of events. But while it is true that newly-discovered facts may properly change opinions as to the expediency of measures, yet great constitutional principles do not rest upon events. State constitutions which were valid at the close of the war have not lost their validity by the varying events to which the Senator alluded; nor have the people of the rebel States lost any power which they then possessed to form constitutions. If, for example, Tennessee had a valid constitution in 1865, established by the people while the State was said to be in rebellion against the Government of the United States, it is impossible for the Senator from Indiana to show that valid State constitutions did not or might not, at the same time, exist in other States similarly situated. How can the Senator claim, in view of the joint resolution readmitting Tennessee into the Union, from which I now read, that other seceding States, as well as Tennessee, had not by their people formed valid constitutions, or had no power so to do?

That resolution declares, as follows:

"Whereas, in the year 1861, the government of the State of Tennessee was seized upon and taken possession of by persons in hostility to the United States, and the inhabitants of said State in pursuance of an act of Congress were declared to be in a state of insurrection against the United States; and whereas said State government can only be restored to its former political relations in the Union by the consent of the law-making power of the United States; and whereas the people of said State did, on the 22d day of February, 1865, by a large popular vote, adopt and ratify a constitution of government whereby slavery was abolished, and all ordinances and laws of secession and debts contracted under the same were declared void; and whereas a State government has been organized under said constitution which has ratified the amendment to the Constitution of the United States abolishing slavery, also the amendment proposed by the Thirty-Ninth Congress, and has done other acts proclaiming and denoting loyalty: Therefore,

Be it resolved, &c., That the State of Tennessee is hereby restored to her former proper, practical relations to the Union, and is again entitled to be represented by Senators and Representatives in Congress."

I ask Senators to remember that the constitution of Tennessee, which, by this act, is declared to have been in force in 1865, was amended by the people of that State in the year 1863. The fact of its amendment, of course, implies its valid existence. How was it amended? In the first place, President Lincoln, on the 3d day of March, 1862, appointed Andrew Johnson military governor of Tennessee by the following order:

WAR DEPARTMENT, March 3, 1862.

SIR: You are hereby appointed military governor of the State of Tennessee, with authority to exercise and perform within the limits of that State, all and singular, the powers, duties, and functions pertaining to the office of military governor, including the power to establish all necessary offices, tribunals, &c.

EDWIN M. STANTON,
Secretary of War.

Hon. ANDREW JOHNSON.

On the 19th day of September, 1863, President Lincoln issued an additional order as follows:

EXECUTIVE MANSION.

WASHINGTON, D. C., September 19, 1863.

You are hereby authorized to exercise such powers as may be necessary and proper to enable the loyal people of Tennessee to present such a republican form of State government as will entitle the State to the guarantee of the United States therefor, and to be protected under such State government by the United States against invasion and domestic violence. All according to the fourth section of the fourth article of the Constitution of the United States.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

Hon. ANDREW JOHNSON, Military Governor of Tennessee.

Thus it appears that a republican form of government was to be established in Tennessee by order of President Lincoln. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] now says that no valid government was thus established. His entire argument rests on this basis. Congress, however, declared otherwise. The government existing in Tennessee in 1865 is declared by the act of Congress restoring Tennessee to have been a government which had power to abolish slavery in that State, to ratify an amendment of the Constitution of the United States, and to do other acts, &c.

I invite the Senator from Indiana to show, if he can, in what respects the government and constitution of Tennessee in 1865 were more valid and legal than those of other southern States whose constitutions had been in a similar manner amended. President Johnson commenced and carried on the work of restoring civil governments in those States in a manner copied exactly from President Lincoln's mode with regard to Tennessee. Congress declared that State to have been possessed of a valid constitution and State government in 1865. The Senator then acquiesced and now acquiesces in that declaration. Yet he insists in his elaborate argument that action in other States precisely similar to that in Tennessee, and had under precisely the same circumstances, is usurpation.

He assumes on the entire foundation of his argument that there were no valid governments at that time in any of the seceded States. Such is the absurdity to which he and others who agree with him are driven. Sir, the truth is, there have been no events of such a character as to justify the change in the Senator's opinions. He may have changed those opinions for reasons perfectly satisfactory to himself, and no doubt honestly entertained; but he held them and ably advocated them three years since, under a state of circumstances precisely similar as to their effect to those now existing. The validity of State governments and of State constitutions after the war, the power of the people of States lately in rebellion to form constitutions for themselves, and the existence of organized civil institutions there were then admitted by the Senator himself, or nearly every Senator, as I have already shown. The honorable Senator from Indiana then supported the true doctrine by arguments which his own power of reasoning has not been able satisfactorily to answer. And the doctrine which he now advances, that Congress has a right by military force to overthrow existing State governments and set up others in their place, to compel a people to adopt a constitution at the point of the bayonet, was condemned in this body in the strongest language by Senators who now lead in the Radical councils. Sir, I propose to recall to the recollection of the Senate some utterances on this subject which have been quite too soon forgotten. With due respect for the Presiding Officer of this body, I shall read some extracts from a speech delivered here by him so late as January, 1866:

"The Senator began by invoking the principles and aid of the preceding Administration, and informed us that the present Administration was proceeding upon the same principles that Mr. Lincoln had adopted. It is true that Mr. Lincoln had entered upon a certain policy in regard to the admission of some of these States; the question was agitated before us, I believe, during the whole period of the last Congress; but, notwithstanding my anxiety to find some way by which these States could be safely admitted into the Union again, all the arguments that were made for that purpose during that whole Congress entirely failed to convince me that the time had arrived when it was safe to admit any of them; and therefore, for one, I contended against it, and with a good deal of zeal; and for that I, with some others here, was accused of being a little factious, and sometimes it was said we flustered against the will of the majority to keep these States out."

40TH CONG....2D SESS.

Reconstruction—Mr. Dixon.

SENATE.

I call the attention of the Senate to these remarks of the honorable Senator from Ohio:

"Now, sir, I wish to say that in my judgment President Johnson has made a great improvement upon the state of things that existed during the last Congress, although, as yet, he has not reached the point where I think the difficulty begins."

Mr. HOWARD. What is the date of that speech?

Mr. DIXON. January 18, 1866; but little more than two years ago.

He continues:

"Mr. Lincoln advised us to admit Louisiana into the Union at a time when probably more than one half her territory was trampled beneath the hostile feet of the enemy. Our flag did not cover her territory, and perhaps not half her population, when he thought it would be safe to permit her to come back into the councils of the nation and participate with us Union men in the great work of legislation. I had not seen anything in the proceedings of the people there that warranted me in saying that that would be safe, and therefore I thought it best to make what stand I could against that measure. You will recollect, sir, that Mr. Lincoln did not then require, if I recollect aright, in order to the admission, anything more than that one tenth part of the population of Louisiana should take a certain oath, and that not a very difficult one, and when they had done that the State was to be in a condition to be admitted. Mr. Johnson, I repeat, has made an improvement, and a great improvement, upon all this, for he does require, if I understand him, that they, by their fundamental law, shall abolish slavery; he requires at their hands that they shall repudiate the rebel debt; he requires that they shall renounce the right of secession; he requires that they shall agree to the constitutional amendment abolishing slavery forever. These, in my judgment, are great improvements upon the system adopted by Mr. Lincoln. Had Mr. Lincoln himself?"

And here I beg to call the attention of the Senate particularly to this—

"at that period, required these things, and had the States assented to them, I believe I should then have yielded to his wishes and given my support to the measure."

Sir, that is very significant language, and it comes from a very important source. I am now denounced, and every conservative man here is denounced, as desiring to bring bloody-handed rebels into Congress, when so distinguished a leader as the honorable Senator from Ohio, now in the chair, declares to us that if Mr. Lincoln's policy, which he then opposed in a written protest, had been as good as Mr. Johnson's he would have adopted it. The ground taken by President Johnson satisfied him, and if President Lincoln had taken the same ground he would have yielded.

"Had Mr. Lincoln himself, at that period, required these things, and had the States assented to them, I believe I should then have yielded to his wishes."

It seems President Lincoln had wishes on this subject as well as a policy—

"and given my support to the measure."

But that is not all. Sir, there was no more able and eloquent defender of President Johnson two years ago in this body than the present Presiding Officer of this body. I well remember his speech. Again he says:

"Why, then, did the President impose these conditions on the seceded States? Because they are out of the Union, and therefore he was right in demanding conditions. I say he has done well, so far as he has gone."

Of whom was the Senator from Ohio then speaking? What was the subject under discussion? It was denied here that President Johnson had a right to impose conditions upon the southern States, and the honorable Senator from Ohio says:

"Why, then, did the President impose these conditions on the seceded States? Because they are out of the Union, and therefore he was right in demanding conditions."

He adds:

"I say he has done well, so far as he has gone."

That was on the 18th of January, 1866. I thought so, too. I think so still. Other Senators have changed their opinion. Then the Senator went on to give his views as to a military organization in the southern States. There were some then who, anticipating events, propose to adopt what we have now adopted, a military organization to govern the southern States; and if there was a Senator in this body who denounced it, as we should have expected him to do from his known character and love for free institutions, with more force and ability than any other Senator, it was the honorable Senator from Ohio, [Mr. WADE,] then sitting on my left. He says:

"Again, sir, I deny that the organization of these State governments in the South has begun at the right end so far. I contended during the last Congress that the President had no right by Military Order No. 37, or any other military order, to organize a State government anywhere. Our Government must be a Government of the people. In this country you cannot force a Government upon anybody. It might be very convenient if we could. A despotic Government may do it with perfect ease. When Russia conquers Poland she may trample her under foot, because armed with despotic, irresponsible power. When we conquer a people we must deal with them within the pale of the Constitution, in analogy to the great principles of our glorious free Government."

That is the very ground I took then and take still. When we deal with a conquered people we must deal with them within the pale of the Constitution, not "outside of the Constitution." The latter was a recent discovery reserved for another distinguished gentleman who also claims to be a leader of the Radical party and whose claim must be admitted. The Senator from Ohio tells us that "when we conquer a people we must deal with them within the pale of the Constitution, in analogy to the great principles of our glorious free Government"—not as Russia conquers Poland. Why, sir, that illustration seems to be resorted to at this time by men of conservative views. Some historical allusions have been made here. Two years ago an honorable Senator known as a Radical member of the body could refer to the course pursued by Russia toward Poland.

"Who has asked the President and Congress to establish civil government in the South? How can Democrats contend that a people shall be bound by an organization emanating from the center? That is not the place for it to originate. These people must be held under military subjugation (though an equitable one I would contend for) until they themselves shall see that the time has come when they can act in accordance with the old Constitution and Government of the United States. They have not come to that yet, and nobody is surprised that they have not. Do you suppose that in a moment the temper and disposition of men who breathed fire and wrath against you for four long years, and murdered three hundred thousand of your bravest sons, and committed all the atrocities to which I have alluded, have been so changed that they will ask to be taken back into that Government which they had invoked foreign despots to overthrow, and to destroy which they had hazarded their lives and fortunes?"

"I know that the southern people will come back. I know it is as much for their interest, and infinitely more for their interest than it is for ours. We all have a pride in the whole nation; as the Senator from Wisconsin said, we will never consent to lose a single star from the old flag; but when we repair this breach I want it to be done by the people of the South becoming convinced that it is for their interest, and telling us, 'We are sick of war; we are sick of contending against the power of the United States, and we ask and petition Congress now to permit us to organize a State government in accordance with the Constitution of the United States.'"

Then he goes on to say:

"I know that they will come in due time, but you cannot force it."

He was for waiting, giving them an opportunity. He did not denounce them because they were not ready to return at that moment. He adds:

"What I wish to impute and insist upon is the utter absurdity of supposing that a democratic people can force another people to join them and comply with the forms of the Government when their hearts are at variance with it. The old maxim was that one man could lead a horse to water, but ten men could not make him drink. You cannot make a people drink in democracy until they are ready for it. You may give them the forms, but they are all idle ceremonies unless they are imbued with the spirit. Govern them justly by the strong arm of the nation until such time as they themselves shall have had an opportunity to reflect, to cool off, to become willing that a State government should be revived over them, when they see their interest plainly in that direction. When that is done there is no doubt they will come asking to be allowed to have a State government, some sooner, some later. Time is a great element in all such cases."

The Senator did not denounce them at that time, but they have been bitterly denounced since by Senators because they did not accept our terms in a moment. The fourteenth amendment to the Constitution was proposed in July, 1866, and when we came together in the following December it had not been ratified. This was held up as proof of the fact that that people were still rebels because in three months they had not accepted those propositions. The Senator from Ohio took a very different and much more statesmanlike view of it.

He said:

"And until the people themselves can agree to it it is vain and idle, and worse, to contend that you can force them into this Government by this house operation, and induce them to harmonize with you. They will come back in due time, no doubt, and no man will rejoice more than I shall when that time shall come, and I can tell you when it will come. Leave them to themselves; do not send your great officers down there to persuade them."

I wish that advice had been followed.

"Do not send your great officers down there to persuade them; do not leave your conqueror with arms in his hands to say to them, 'Come up and make such and such a constitution, and come into the Union with it.'"

The very thing you propose to do to-day, and those of us who have followed this advice are now called rebels and traitors. Mr. WADE added:

"That is not the way; but govern them equitably until it is shown by their petitions, by their speeches, by their actions, which nobody can mistake, that the great heart of that people has relented and repented of the crimes they have committed, and that they are willing and anxious to come back to the Union as the ark of their safety, and there lodge and travel and act with us."

"Sir, I shall look as anxiously as any other man to see that there is this repentance, this temper and disposition, that will enable us, when they ask it, to say to them, 'You shall have the right hand of fellowship, you shall stand on as high ground as you ever stood on before;' but I can never consent that a government shall be organized from this central point to bring States into the Union."

Do we understand the English language? Is not that what you now propose to do—to organize a government here from this central point to bring States into the Union?

"You can bring them in by the Army of the United States; you can force them to go through the form of making a State government and send their Delegates here; but would that be a republican government? Would that be a democracy? Would it be a government having its authority in the consent of the people, such as our great Declaration of Independence calls for?"

Mr. SUMNER. Who says that?

Mr. DIXON. I have already said, the Senator from Ohio, now presiding over this body, [Mr. WADE.] The Senator considers him authority—one of the greatest. Sir, I had not long to search for that speech in the Congressional Globe. Its echoes have been ringing in my ears for the last two years. I listened attentively to the speech at the time of its delivery, and it was not easily forgotten. I thought it right then, and I think it right now.

Mr. President, what was then denounced in such able and eloquent terms is the very thing now proposed. Where are we? Is it so that there is no such thing as consistency? Are events rushing on at such tremendous speed that in two years what was anti-republican, anti-democratic, wrong, unstatesmanlike, improper, becomes right, becomes republican, becomes correct, and a policy which the Government and the people of the United States are called upon to adopt and accept? Now, sir, at that time this distinguished Senator not only said that up to that period President Johnson's policy had been a vast improvement upon that of President Lincoln, but he also said that if President Lincoln had advanced so far, had raised himself to so high a plane as Andrew Johnson, he would have adopted the policy.

If it was a right policy to adopt under President Lincoln, it was a right policy to adopt under President Johnson. What did the Senator mean? There are some things which finite minds cannot understand. It was either right or wrong. If it was right, it was right under Andrew Johnson as it would have been under Abraham Lincoln. But I am not criticising the precise language. There is the statement, that Andrew Johnson's policy at that day was correct, and if Abraham Lincoln had adopted it the honorable Senator from Ohio would have consented to it. Furthermore, we are told that the policy then foreseen by this honorable Senator of sending a great military ruler to govern the South and forcing a government in that way upon that people is wrong in itself and should not be adopted.

Here, sir, is what the honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. WADE] then thought of a project, not then supposed possible to be executed, for forcing constitutions by armed force on the southern States. Here is his idea of the propriety of sending "great officers" there to rule them with despotic sway. And here, sir, is what he then thought of the policy of Andrew Johnson. He was then the defender and eulogist of this policy as compared with that of Mr. Lincoln. That policy was then so commendable that had Abraham Lincoln in his time attained to its high merit, the Senator from Ohio declared he would himself have supported it, and the excluded States would have been restored under it! Let the people mark this, and let them remember that it is for his perseverance in this policy, honestly adopted by him from his predecessor, and improved to such an extent as to command the warm approbation of the present Presiding Officer of this body that President Johnson has been assailed, vilified, and denounced as a traitor.

Mr. President, there are many conservative and patriotic men who then believed, with you, that President Johnson's plan was copied, with improvements, from that of President Lincoln. They saw him honestly endeavoring to complete the work of his predecessor by the restoration of the Union. They gave him their confidence and their support. When he was assailed, reproached, vilified, hunted down, they came to his defense. When the party with which they had acted departed from its established, conservative, constitutional policy and took ground outside of the Constitution they refused longer to act with it and took up their position outside of the Radical party. There they still remain in earnest hostility to the ruinous and destructive measures which have at last brought the country to the verge of ruin. Many of these men are found among my own constituents. If my voice could reach them I would entreat them to cast their eyes backward on the events of the last three years and calmly consider whether all that they apprehended as the consequence of the radical policy has not been more than realized. Do they find in its full development anything which invites them to aid in establishing it as the permanent policy of the Government? Do they not see more plainly than ever before that it is incompatible with constitutional freedom and the true interests of the people? It is now fully exposed to their view, with its military despotism, its contempt of the supreme judicial power of the nation, its usurpation of executive authority by Congress, its instigation of a conflict of races for supremacy, by refusing to an immense class of white men the privilege of suffrage granted indiscriminately to uneducated blacks, its sectional bitterness, its spirit of undying revenge, its gospel of hereditary hatred. It is in the power of this great body of intelligent conservative voters, with whom party ties are less strong than love of country, to overthrow this policy and restore peace, good-will, and unbounded prosperity to a suffering and distracted people. It is in their power even now to compel the adoption of a policy modified and amended in the manner proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin, consistent with all the rights of humanity in which the intelligent minds of the North and the South shall cordially agree and which shall harmonize conflicting opinions in both sections.

If they exert their power, and, by a united effort through the ballot-box, accomplish this great work, our Union may yet be restored upon the constitutional basis, the rights of every human being may be protected, liberty may be established upon the same foundation of law, and, through all the years of the nation's life, the people of the North and the South, having no further possible ground of quarrel, may become more and more harmoniously joined together in the willing bonds of fraternal union. But if the policy and the spirit which now control our legislation are to receive the popular sanction, and be perpetuated, our history will be no longer a glorious record of human progress and of unexampled national and individual prosperity, but its dark and bloody pages will be written, like the roll seen in the vision of the prophet, within and without, with lamentations and mourning and woe.

SPEECH OF HON. JOHN COBURN,

OF INDIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 24, 1868,

On the resolution reported by the Committee on Reconstruction for the impeachment of the President.

Mr. COBURN. Mr. Speaker, I have been pained to hear during the course of this debate the statement made by some of the advocates of impeachment that the recent acts of the President in violation of the law prescribing the tenure of civil offices and of the Constitution, in relation to the removal of officers during the session of Congress, as trivial matters compared with other acts of his administration in violation of law. It may be a quiet and simple act to remove a Secretary of War, injuring the person or the property of no one, and be consummated by the writing of an official note dispatched in a minute, but it is none the less an open, intentional, willful, and flagrant breach of law. Parallel with this are many of the acts which have become memorable in history and mark epochs in the life of nations. The crossing of the Rubicon, an insignificant stream which was the boundary of Caesar's province, was the first act, bloodless and quiet, of a war which broke down the oldest and strongest Republic that ever existed, and paved the way for that imperial dominion which is the great prototype of despotism. The refusal by John Hampden to pay a few shillings of ship-money demanded of him as a right began the contest which ended in the overthrow of the monarch of England, cost him his head, and for a time gave to the despised Puritans the control of the foremost nation in Europe. The refusal of our forefathers to pay the tax on stamped paper and the duties on tea, light though they were, and not intended to harass or oppress, but done rather in denial of the right of representation, kindled the flames of a war which raged seven years, and resulted in the lasting independence of our people.

In this simple act of defiance to law in the removal of Mr. Stanton, done without arms, without warning, without the demand of public necessity, in cool, impudent, insolent disregard of the plain words of law, I see a movement as radical in its intent and as searching in its effects as any one could be thought backed by the Army and Navy and driven through with all their power. What is it, then, that the President has done that has deserved the instant and indignant rebuke of the Representatives of the people? On the 2d of March last Congress, having long had reason to doubt the patriotic purposes of the President, passed a law in relation to the tenure of civil offices, providing, among other things, that Cabinet officers should hold their offices during the term of the President by whom they were appointed and for one month thereafter, unless removed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and that no such officer should be removed from office without the consent of the Senate; and that if, during a vacation of Congress, a suspension should be made of such officer, and on being reported to the Senate in twenty days after meeting, and the cause be deemed insufficient, he should resume the duties of his office. It is further provided by the sixth section of this act that every removal, appointment, or employment made, had, or exercised contrary to the provisions of this act, and the making, signing, sealing, countersigning, or issuing of any commission or letter of authority for or in respect to any such appointment or employment, shall be deemed and are declared to be high misdemeanors, and upon trial and conviction thereof every person convicted thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $10,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding five years, or both. Here, then, was this simple provision of law, so plain that the fool might run and read, governing the President, and which he deliberately chose to violate. There could be no mistake about its meaning, no doubt as to its intent, no cavil as to its scope.

Again, there was just as plain a provision of the Constitution which gave the President power to nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate to appoint, all officers of the United States whose appointments are not therein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law, and to fill all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session. These are his powers of nomination and of supplying vacancies; no power of removal or of creating vacancies is given during a session of the Senate. And yet he has usurped this power not given him, gone beyond the restrictions of the Constitution, which no sane man could for a moment misunderstand, and assumed to make a removal, create a vacancy, and fill it.

On the 21st of February, 1868, he transgresses the statute and the Constitution by successive acts without excuse or palliation or provocation by ordering the removal of Mr. Stanton from the office of Secretary of War and the appointment of Lorenzo Thomas as Secretary ad interim. That he failed to remove Mr. Stanton is no defense; that he did not create a vacancy is no defense; that he did not succeed in getting Thomas into office is no defense—no more than that the murderer is caught in the overt act and prevented from the consummation of his deadly purpose.

It is no defense to say that the tenure-of-office law does not apply to the case of Mr. Stanton because he was appointed by Mr. Lincoln, and could only hold his office, under that appointment, during Lincoln's life, and not afterward, except by sufferance, for Mr. Stanton, by the terms of that law, holds his office not during the mere continuance in office of the President appointing him, but "during the term of the President by whom he was appointed."

Now, the person who was President might continue in office a half, a quarter, a tenth part, or the whole of his term. That term was fixed and unchangeable, and was four years. So Mr. Lincoln did not serve out a thirtieth part of his term, and Mr. Johnson is now serving it out and may not complete it, but some other incumbent may come in and complete Mr. Lincoln's second term of four years.

Nor is any defense to say that the President is the sole trustee of the executive power of the nation, and that the required concurrence of the Senate is only a regulation for the exercise of this power. For the executive power of this nation is not an unlimited one, but is very narrowly limited and guarded, and at all points controlled by laws. The President is the sole trustee of very few powers, and the regulations binding him in their exercise are not to be violated with impunity. It is certainly a new doctrine to say that because an officer is an executive one he is not to be arraigned for a violation of law, and that because he has the appointing power he has another distinct one, and that is the removing power, where the Constitution does not confer it and the law plainly forbids it. It would seem but reasonable that if the power of removal had been expressly conferred on the President by the Constitution, that it should be exercised, like the appointing power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; but in a case where the power of removal is conferred by law and limited in its exercise to the consent and concurrence of the Senate, it would seem absolutely preposterous to say it should be exercised totally independent of the Senate. To sustain this position the tenure-of-office law is declared to be unconstitutional, and the essential absolutism of the Executive asserted in this matter of removal. To a mind imbued with the simplest ideas of republican government such an assertion is abhorrent, and to one at all regardful of public policy or the public safety it never would occur.

The absolute power of removal from office is a relic of monarchy; at war with our whole system; dangerous to liberty; corrupting in its exercise and effects; begetting a slavish subserviency to the Executive.

The madness and folly that claim despotic power for our Chief Magistrate are fitly akin to the treason which has for six years labored so sedulously to destroy the Constitution. The executive power of the nation may be limited and hedged in, not only by the terms of the Constitution, but by legislative enactments, and it is the duty of the national Legislature whenever it perceives a dangerous exercise of such power to put on it the necessary restraints. True enough, the President is the sole trustee of the executive power of the nation, but that power is guarded by a flaming sword at every point; and executive powers are not to be set up, like kingly prerogatives or divine rights, in defense of transgressions. The Executive, like the citizen, is the subject of law, bound by its requirements, amenable to its penalties. But we are warned that it is dangerous to interfere with a coördinate branch of the Government. Coördinate in what? In power, in importance, in use, in extent—in what respect coördinate? Coexistent rather; not coördinate. As well say the streams are coördinate with the ocean into which they pour. As well say the planets are coördinate with the grand luminary about which they revolve, as to say, that the executive and judiciary are coördinate with the legislative branch of this Government. The one is the center, the depository of power, the seat of life, the source of progress and improvement, while the others are rigidly confined by strict laws and jealously guarded in their obedience.

We have too long been in the habit of regarding the executive and judiciary branches of the Government as of equal dignity with the legislative, while in no sense can the executors and construers of law be said to equal in importance the makers of law. For the time being an adventitious importance may attach to them; but in a Government whose great distinctive feature is this, that it is based on representation in its Legislatures, and not on judges or presidents or kings, the law-making power must forever be preëminent. It is a misuse of terms to talk about coördinate branches of the Government in the presence of the legislative which can create and destroy, which can impeach and remove, which can make war or peace, which knows no restraint imposed by judge or President, and is bound only by the Constitution.

In the presence of this majestic power all other powers of our Government shrink into insignificance; and when the President attempts to assert a policy and lay down rules of action he is as much a usurper as if he violates a public law. He has no more right to a policy than a constable or sheriff in the exercise of his functions as such. He is to look to his writ, his letter of authority, and execute it, and then and there stop and be silent till his master, the people, speaks.

Who, then, shall interfere with these branches of the Government for their regulation and correction if the people, through their only mouthpieces, their Legislatures, cannot? In fact, it is no interference; it is the bounden duty of the legislative branch to step in promptly and check every assumption of power by the other branches of the Government.

Again, it has been said that the President may disobey an unconstitutional law, that he is to look at the higher rule of the Constitution, and if, in his judgment, the latter overrides the former he is guilty of no crime, making crime a matter of opinion and not of fact, and the guilt or innocence of the offender dependent on his own sense of duty, regardless of the enactments of Congress—a new rule, certainly, in jurisprudence. But it is said the act is unconstitutional, and therefore the President may disregard it. If it be so he is bound by it until in a legal way it is set aside, and he who violates it sets the bad example of disobedience, and subjects himself to the penalties prescribed for it.

But what is there in the assertion that the tenure-of-office law is unconstitutional? The idea is based upon the opinion of public men at an early period of our history who thought it to be the duty and peculiar province of the President to superintend the conduct of his appointees and remove them summarily, thus checking their excesses and arresting their violations of law or malfeasances in office; some going so far as to say that the President would be impeachable if he did not remove officials he had appointed who were guilty of crimes and misdemeanors.

But the history of the Government and all our public experience have shown that the danger does not lie in that direction, but rather in the opposite one. The arbitrary removal of men from office by the President for mere opinion sake has been a crying evil since the days of Andrew Jackson, who initiated proscription for political opinions, and began that system which soon degenerated into one whose motto was "To the victors belong the spoils." Here began the dark days of the Republic; here the greed of gain, the thirst for office, the struggle for preferment at any cost, entered side by side with the war of opinions and the debates of political projects and principles, and corrupted and defiled them; and right here lies the most dangerous rock ahead of the ship of state. To guard against this unwarranted, almost unlimited, almost despotic power of removal and appointment the whole nation for years has been anxiously looking for a method, and were at last driven to the adoption of this law relative to the tenure of civil offices. The reasons that operated on the minds of our fathers when they were silent on the power of removal were found to be of no force, and the fears they entertained of the corruption of inferior officers, unless guarded and checked by the executive head, were proved to be vain and futile. It was found that there was much more danger in a corrupt and powerful executive officer, wielding and molding all his inferior officers to base purposes, than in their becoming, individually, unfit to exercise the functions of offices.

The struggle to expel from office Mr. Stanton began soon after the passage of the reconstruction acts of last March. He had honestly and faithfully undertaken to carry them into execution, while President Johnson, with dogged and willful determination, resolved to thwart and defeat them; first, by his vetoes, insulting in tone and unlawful in spirit; then by his private declarations, and then by his unwarrantable interference with the officers to whom were entrusted the administration of affairs. When it was found that the southern people were about to acquiesce in these measures Mr. Johnson and his emissaries, by all means, endeavored to dissatisfy them; and, finally, to prevent the permanent reorganization of certain States, removed successively the most faithful, honest, and gallant district commanders—Sheridan, Sickles, and Pope. When it was found that the people of the South were going on to register themselves, preparatory to an election, white and black alike peaceably acquiescing in the mode of procedure; when it was found that the rebel soldier was forgetting the wrongs and ills of war, and was emerging from the shadows of despair cast upon him by the mistakes and crimes of his leaders; when he was again beginning to resume cheerfully the duties of life, and again taking upon him the rights and obligations of a citizen; when it was found that Longstreet, Barringer, Beauregard, Joe Johnston, Wade Hampton, and even Lee counseled acquiescence in the law, and some of them even urged a cheerful concurrence in its execution by all the people; when it was found that soon these regenerated States would range themselves in the line of the Union, loyal to the core and Radical Republican, then it was that President Johnson, at all hazards, resolved to prevent it—to stop the wheels of progress, to check restoration, to keep up the reign of anarchy and misrule, to perpetuate the disorders, the distractions, the enmities, the perpetration of crimes—then it was that he resolved that, come what might, be it war, with its waste of treasure and blood, be it an overthrow of the Constitution, he would trample on the law, defy it, and put it down forever. Reconstruction should not take place as Congress had determined.

The removal of the district commanders was followed, in August last, by the suspension of Mr. Stanton and the appointment of General Grant in his place, who in his turn yielded to Mr. Stanton under the decision of the Senate. And here, for a time, the grim tragedy which has so long strutted the stage suddenly degenerates into a farce. General Grant is assigned the duty of playing hocus pocus with the War Department; of acting the part in which, "now you see it, and now you don't see it;" but the grave and silent man stubbornly refuses to play as directed. General Sherman is suddenly honored with a brevet as general, and he is expected to put on the dress of a mountebank and play for Mr. Johnson some feats of ground and lofty tumbling in the face of the nation; but the great flanker declines to be outflanked by an empty brevet, and goes off toward the sunset to look after the Indians. Quick as the changing scenery of the stage another doubly breveted veteran is marched out with solemn face and stern bearing—the old hero of Nashville. His surprise at his sudden honors bewilders him for a moment, and he wonders what mean thing he has done to deserve all this from the President. At length, fairly awake, he says he can remember nothing that he has done since the battle of Nashville that is worthy of mention, and to the high-sounding titles offered him by the presidential hand bows himself off the stage with: "No, sir; I thank you." Well done, George Thomas. You never did a manlier thing in your life. The people will never forget your answer in this brevet business. Then comes the last act of this low comedy. Lorenzo Thomas reels upon the stage with a commission in his pocket and claims of Mr. Stanton the keys of the War Office. Has the President at last found a tool? Has he found one so weak or so wicked, or both, among those whom the nation has long supported and honored with high official position? It is but too true.

This trifling must be stopped. These flagrant violations of law must have an end. The patience of the people will not endure forever. They are determined that their measures of reconstruction shall go on; that Andrew Johnson, Lorenzo Thomas, or whoever else he may be, who sets himself in the way of their progress, shall go down. The future welfare of ten States is not to be periled by the unlawful interference of a President who madly proclaims and dictates to them a policy of reconstruction. The mighty future of the whole nation is not to be endangered by the despotic assumptions of a President who hates the trammels of law, who forgets the obligations of his oath, who rudely scorns the voice of the people.

This is no mere contest in the interest of Mr. Stanton. The right to violate one law implies the right to violate all; and to basely submit to the arrogance of the Executive in this would be as shameful as the subserviency of vassals to the crowned heads who tax them and work them and fight them at their will. One man has set himself up against the power of the people; one man has said my will, not theirs, shall be obeyed; one man has said my word is worth more than the word of all my countrymen. This day we call upon him to make that assertion good. This day we impeach him in the name of an outraged people, whose Constitution he has broken, whose law he has defied, whose majesty he has mocked and insulted.

His whole history as President has been marked with usurpations of power and violations of rights. His assumption of the right to reorganize the rebellious States; his appointment of traitors to office; his proclamations of pardon and amnesty; his open attempt to surrender all the power, snatched by our brave soldiers in arms from the enemies of the country, back into their hands; his indecent and insurrectionary denunciations of Congress in public speeches; his retention in office of wicked, dishonest, and thievish officials who are plundering the Treasury before his eyes; his constant efforts to render null and void the reconstruction acts in the southern States; his unjust removal of the most faithful officers; his insulting, arrogant, and rebellious veto messages, can all be passed by in view of the facts, so startling, which have occurred within the past week. Not content with his former aggressions against popular rights he repeats the blows, confident that a forgiving and indulgent public will still disregard them. He has gone too far. He cannot retrace his steps. Already they lead down to that raging whirlpool of popular condemnation from which there is no rescue.

SPEECH OF HON. CHARLES E. PHELPS, OF MARYLAND,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
February 22, 1868.

The House having under consideration the resolution reported by the Committee on Reconstruction for the impeachment of the President—

Mr. PHELPS said:

MR. SPEAKER: The House of Representatives, in the capacity of grand inquest of the United States, and for the first time in its history, seems about to enter upon the impeachment of the President of the United States. Upon this day, the anniversary of the birth of Washington, and upon this judicial question, the most momentous within the compass of official duty, the clamors of partisan tumults should be awed to silence by the deep-toned voice of law. Before proceeding to the consideration of the resolution this day reported from the Committee on Reconstruction, with notice of its being forced to a passage before the setting of the sun of the next legislative day, I propose very briefly to advert to the preliminary stages of the impeachment movement as essential to a just conception of its true character and real purpose. The agitation of this question was foreshadowed; it was actually commenced during the term of the predecessor of the present incumbent. A bill was passed by the Thirty-Eighth Congress providing for the reconstruction of the States then in rebellion. The President did not approve that act, nor did President Lincoln veto it. He kept it during the constitutional period necessary to prevent its becoming a law, and sent to Congress a proclamation of the reasons which had induced him to suppress it.

That proclamation, like many previous measures of the President, developed a radical antagonism between the policy of the prevalent majority here, and the policy of the Executive upon the question of reconstruction. It went further. Its purport plainly was that with the views then held by President Lincoln, that official would be found by Congress an inconvenient constitutional obstruction in its design of converting the apparatus of a defensive war into the machinery of conquest and subjugation.

It was at that prospect, thus presented, that the specter of impeachment first stalked across the congressional stage. A Senator from Ohio, now acting Vice President of the United States, and heir presumptive to the executive chair, [Mr. WADE,] in concert with a Representative from Maryland, the reputed author of the reconstruction bill, [Mr. H. Winter Davis,] and my immediate predecessor in the seat which I hold upon this floor, were delegated or assumed to speak for Congress to Mr. Lincoln, and they did speak to him in a very plain message, known at the time (July, 1864) as the "Wade and Davis Manifesto," a document which the proceeding inaugurated upon this day is destined to immortalize. It was nothing less than the voice of the partisan majority in Congress, speaking through the leaders of the respective Houses, denouncing President Lincoln as a usurper, and threatening him with impeachment.

But, sir, for the purposes of those who furthered that enterprise, the movement was made at the wrong time and initiated in the wrong manner. It was not for want of support in this House as then constituted, or in the other as then constituted, that it failed. It is well known that the enemies of Mr. Lincoln in that Congress, within the lines of his own party, were many and bold, and that his friends were few. But he was sustained by the people of the country, and by the same people his accusers were condemned. One of them, [Mr. Davis,] whose lamented death has been publicly mourned in this Hall, with such national obsequies as have been accorded to no other private citizen in this generation, and to whose gifts of oratory no man has succeeded, was promptly and almost unanimously repudiated by the district I now represent. The retribution of his colleague [Mr. WADE] was longer delayed, but not longer than the first opportunity which his constituency were offered. That Senator, his political course condemned and himself repudiated by his State, steps from the Senate Chamber either into the plenitude of executive power, as President of the United States, or into the private obscurity to which his own people have consigned him, according as the programme originally foreshadowed in the document referred to now succeeds or fails. And, sir, had Abraham Lincoln lived and prosecuted the line of policy laid down by the proclamation thus assailed, as faithfully and as fearlessly as his successor, this movement to-night would have been directed against Abraham Lincoln instead of Andrew Johnson.

Let us trace the history of impeachment still further before coming directly upon the merits of the present prosecution, in order to throw light upon its animus and aim, and strip it of all extraneous matter.

The Thirty-Eighth Congress was distinguished by the Wade and Davis manifesto. Another abortive impeachment experiment was conducted in the Thirty-Ninth Congress, under the lead of the member from Ohio, [Mr. ASHLEY,] at much greater expense to the public Treasury.

On the 7th of January, 1867, the Committee on the Judiciary was instructed to inquire and report upon articles of impeachment of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, for high crimes and misdemeanors, presented by the gentleman referred to. The President was charged with a usurpation of power and violation of law, in having corruptly used the appointing power, in having corruptly used the pardoning power, in having corruptly used the veto power, in having corruptly disposed of public property, and in having corruptly interfered in elections. The committee was composed of nine members, all of whom but two were politically hostile to the President. They labored upon these charges for nearly a year. The investigation was strictly an ex parte one, and the sessions secret and confidential. Every advantage was afforded the accusers. The whole contingent fund of the House was at their service, backed by the Treasury of the United States. The widest range of inquiry was freely allowed, not only into public conduct, but private character. Cabinet ministers were made to disclose the confidences of the executive council. Confidential secretaries and household domestics were brought to the rack of confession. Spies, detectives, and informers, convicted perjurers and suborners of perjury were mustered into the service. The whole country was searched by a drag-net in the hands of professional experts. Every malicious whisper, and every item of scandal, rumor, and personal gossip was eagerly caught and received with approbation. Witnesses were fished for in dens of infamy and the dungeon of the convicted felon. Every resource of malignant cunning was exhausted to fasten a stigma of moral turpitude upon the personal character of Andrew Johnson. And most shameful of all, there were those among his accusers who did not scruple to darkly insinuate complicity with assassination.

It may be said without disparagement that few men either in public or in private life, subjected to such an ordeal, would have emerged from it with as pure and unspotted a reputation as was conceded to Andrew Johnson by the reluctant confession finally extorted from his prosecutors themselves. With the recorded result of ten months prodigious effort before the House, in the shape of a portentous volume of more than a thousand printed pages, it was so apparent that the cloud of defamation could not be condensed into a drop of even prima facie proof, that the prosecution was definitely abandoned by one of the most decisive votes ever taken in this body.

But, Mr. Speaker, it may well be doubted whether, after all, the failure of this formidable attempt at impeachment was owing so much to the failure of evidence, as to the unmistakable signs of popular disapprobation and well-founded fears of public indignation. The fall elections of 1867 had but recently taken place, and in their result the impeachers had found themselves impeached. The reaction against revolutionary usurpation which had commenced the year before in Maryland now extended from Maine to California, reversing majorities in many States and reducing them in all. To insult the sense of public justice by impeaching and removing the constitutional Chief Magistrate for simply endeavoring to restore harmony to the country and stability to its credit, because in so doing he necessarily obstructed to some extent a congressional scheme of partisan supremacy, required a greater depth of audacity than was yet attained by the requisite majority of numbers.

At all events, Mr. Speaker, the Judiciary Committee were regarded as hopelessly demoralized, and entirely useless for the purposes of impeachment, and another agency was selected. On the 27th of January last a resolution was passed which in effect authorized the Committee on Reconstruction to inquire into the propriety of renewing the prosecution of the President, with particular reference to his controversy with General Grant. The investigation of the committee elicited nothing more than the well-known fact of the President's anxiety to test the validity of the tenure-of-office act by proper judicial proceedings, and this third impeachment movement was strangled in the committee-room.

Mr. Speaker, it is fortunate for the President and for the country that by these repeated experiments and repeated failures the subject has been cleared, carefully and sedulously cleared, of all extrinsic matter, and the House is now called upon, and the Senate will probably be called upon, and the country in turn will be called upon, to pronounce upon a single and specific act which is relied upon as in itself sufficient to warrant this gravest of all judicial proceedings against a coordinate branch of the Government of the United States. No charge of general official misconduct or corrupt administration and no suspicion of personal turpitude appear in the case as finally presented. Congress passed an act on the 2d of March, 1867, and it is charged that on yesterday, the 21st of February, instant, the President undertook to perform an executive function in direct contravention of the terms and meaning of that statute. The high crimes and misdemeanors which he is alleged to have committed have all been perpetrated in the single act of sending to Mr. Stanton an official note, which reads as follows:

EXECUTIVE MANSION.
WASHINGTON, D. C., February 21, 1868.

SIR: By virtue of the power and authority vested in me as President by the Constitution and laws of the United States you are hereby removed from office as Secretary for the Department of War, and your functions as such will terminate upon receipt of this communication.

You will transfer to Brevet Major General Lorenzo Thomas, Adjutant General of the Army, who has this day been authorized and empowered to act as Secretary of War ad interim, all records, books, papers, and other public property now in your custody and charge.

Respectfully, yours, ANDREW JOHNSON.
Hon. EDWIN M. STANTON, Washington, D. C.

It is claimed that in thus ordering the removal from office of the Secretary of War, and authorizing the Adjutant General of the Army to act as such ad interim, the President has violated the provisions of a penal statute, and committed the identical act which is defined by its express terms to be a "high misdemeanor." The act of March 2, 1867, provides, in its sixth section:

"That every removal, appointment, or employment made, had, or exercised contrary to the provisions of this act, and the making, signing, sealing, countersigning, or issuing of any commission or letter of authority for or in respect to any such appointment or employment, shall be deemed, and are hereby declared to be, high misdemeanors, and, upon trial and conviction thereof, every person guilty thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $10,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding five years, or both said punishments, in the discretion of the court: Provided, That the President shall have power to make out and deliver, after the adjournment of the Senate, commissions for all officers whose appointment shall have been advised and consented to by the Senate."

The questions that first arise upon this section are, first, whether any removal or appointment have yet been made, in point of fact? And second, whether, if made in fact, such removal and appointment were made "contrary to the provisions of this act?"

So far as anything contained in the record before the House is concerned, or so far as anything is known outside of that record, there can be but one answer to the first inquiry. Mr. Stanton has flatly refused to obey the order of removal, or to recognize the Adjutant General in the capacity of Secretary ad interim. On the contrary, he has intrenched himself in the War Office, and, notwithstanding the order of the President, assumes at this moment to act in the lawful discharge of all the duties, and claims the title, honor, and emoluments of the office of Secretary of War. So far, then, it is clear that there has been neither an accomplished "removal, appointment, nor employment" within the terms of the act. There has been no "removal," for Mr. Stanton has forcibly prevented it. There has been no "appointment," for the order of the President did not "appoint" a Secretary of War, but only "authorized and empowered" a named officer to act as such ad interim, that is, until a Secretary of War should be appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

And there has been no "employment," so far as any evidence now before the House is concerned. The whole offense, therefore, is narrowed down to the "making, signing, and issuing of a letter of authority, for or in respect to such appointment or employment."

But this is not an offense, unless the removal, appointment, or employment were "contrary to the provisions of the act." Those provisions which relate to this particular case are all embraced in the first section:

"That every person holding any civil office to which he has been appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and every person who shall hereafter be appointed to any such office, and shall become duly qualified to act therein, is and shall be entitled to hold such office until a successor shall have been in like manner appointed and duly qualified, except as herein otherwise provided: Provided, That the Secretaries of State, of the Treasury, of War, of the Navy, and of the Interior, the Postmaster General, and the Attorney General shall hold their offices respectively for and during the term of the President by whom they may have been appointed and for one month thereafter, subject to removal by and with the advice and consent of the Senate."

Now, Mr. Speaker, is the case of Mr. Stanton within the law at all? Was his removal, assuming the removal to be accomplished, a removal contrary to its provisions? Manifestly it was not by any rational construction of the law itself. His case, with that of the other Cabinet officers, is expressly excepted from the general application of the statute, and is by the proviso distinctly placed upon a separate footing. The tenure of his office is secured to him "during the term of the President by whom he was appointed, and for one month thereafter," and during that period he is "subject to removal (only) with the consent of the Senate." Here, then, is a clear authority by manifest implication from the letter of the act itself, to remove him at any time after one month from the expiration of the term of the President who appointed him. If doubt had ever existed as to the power of the President under the Constitution to remove a Cabinet officer without the consent of the Senate, that doubt is removed by the proviso to the first section of the tenure-of-office law, at least so far as the present case is concerned. It is notorious that Mr. Stanton was never appointed by President Johnson at all, but by his predecessor, whose term of office expired with his brutal assassination in April, 1865. To interpret the language of this proviso so as to bring Mr. Stanton's case within it it is necessary to assume for fact the absolute fiction that Mr. Stanton was actually appointed by President Johnson, or else to maintain the palpable absurdity that a dead man is holding a term of office. No such forced and violent construction even of an ordinary act of Congress or of a State Legislature would be listened to in any court of justice in an action of trespass on the case, much less in the interpretation of a highly penal statute in a criminal proceeding. For a violation of this law the penalties prescribed are of a character hitherto unknown in this class of legislative enactments. Not only removal from office and disqualification with the attendant disgrace, but the penitentiary for five years and a fine of $10,000. The character of the act, penal to the last extreme of severity, in derogation of the common law, in derogation of personal liberty, and in derogation of the Constitution as will shortly be shown, demands the strictest rule of construction.

I do not deem the question either doubtful or debatable, but if authority were needed to sustain this view it is furnished in the contemporaneous exposition of the framers of the bill. On the 13th February, 1867, Mr. DOOLITTLE called the attention of the Senate to the language of the proviso in the first section, and remarked:

"By the terms of this law the Secretary of the Interior, the Postmaster General, and the Attorney General must remain during Mr. Johnson's term; but the Secretary of State, the Secretary of War, and the Secretary of the Navy, according to the terms of this provision, may be removed by him to-morrow."

He then added that notwithstanding the plain terms of the bill it had been said in the debate upon the original bill, "by some friends of the restriction of the President's power over the Secretaries, that it was not to be tolerated that the present Chief Magistrate should have the power to remove the Secretary of War." To which it was immediately replied by Senator SHERMAN, of Ohio:

"That the Senate had no such purpose is shown by its vote twice to make this exception. That this provision does not apply to the present case is shown by the fact that its language is so framed as not to apply to the present President. The Senator shows that himself, and argues truly that it would not prevent the present President from removing the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Secretary of State. And if I supposed that either of these gentlemen was so wanting in manhood, in honor, as to hold his place after the politest intimation by the President of the United States that his services were no longer needed, I certainly, as a Senator, would consent to his removal at any time, and so would we all."

No voice was raised in the Senate in opposition to this view, and under this undisputed construction the bill was shortly after put upon its final passage. I conclude, therefore, that by the very terms of the act itself, assuming for the moment its constitutionality, the President was empowered to remove Mr. Stanton from office as Secretary of War. Such removal, of course, created a vacancy. How could that vacancy be lawfully filled?

It is not contended that the President may absolutely appoint a Secretary for any Department without the advice and consent of the Senate; nor has such power been claimed or exercised in the present case. The authority conferred upon the Adjutant General was temporary and qualified, and in pursuance of the act of 13th February, 1795, section one—

"That in case of vacancy in the office of Secretary of State, Secretary of the Treasury, or of the Secretary of the Department of War, or of any other officer of either of the said Departments, whose appointment is not in the head thereof, whereby they cannot perform the duties of their said respective offices, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, in case he shall think it necessary, to authorize any person or persons, at his discretion, to perform the duties of the said respective offices until a successor be appointed or such vacancy be filled: Provided, That no one vacancy shall be supplied, in manner aforesaid, for a longer term than six months."

This law remains upon the statute-book in full force and effect, unrepealed by the tenure-of-office act or any other legislation. It applies to all cases of vacancy, however created, and whether during the session or a recess of the Senate. It is one of those laws which the Constitution enjoins the President to "take care" shall be "faithfully executed."

I have thus shown, Mr. Speaker, that, assuming for argument sake and for the sake of nothing else, the validity of the so-called tenure-of-office act, the President was fully warranted by its express and undisputed provisions in taking the measures he yesterday adopted, "by virtue of the power and authority vested in him by the Constitution and laws of the United States," and that the Committee on Reconstruction have failed to present to this House even the baldest prima facie case for an impeachment.

The Constitution of the United States provides that—

"The trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury."—Art. 1, sec. 2.

HO. OF REPS.

Impeachment—Mr. Phelps.

40TH CONG....2D SESS.

In section two of the first article it is declared that—

"The House of Representatives shall have the sole power of impeachment."

And the third section of the same article provides that—

"The Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments. When sitting for that purpose they shall be on oath or affirmation. When the President of the United States is tried the Chief Justice shall preside; and no person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two thirds of the members present."

It also provides that—

"Judgment in case of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office and disqualification to hold or enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States; but the party convicted shall, nevertheless, be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment according to law."

The second section of article two vests in the President the—"Power to grant reprieves and pardons for offenders against the United States, except in cases of impeachment."

The fourth section of the second article defines the persons amenable to impeachment, and the cases to which that remedy is applicable:

"The President, Vice President, and all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors."

These are all the provisions in the Constitution of the United States upon the subject. They indicate that a resort to impeachment should be had only for the most grave and weighty causes, and especially in the case of the chief executive officer of the Government. Blackstone, in the fourth volume of his Commentaries, quoting from Hale's Pleas of the Crown, lays down that—

"An impeachment before the Lords by the Commons of Great Britain is a prosecution of known established law, and hath been frequently put in practice, being a presentment to the most high and supreme court of criminal jurisdiction, by the most solemn and grand inquest of the whole kingdom."

The power of impeachment is expressly limited to the cases of "treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors." No charge is preferred against the President other than the official act which is by a forced construction of the tenure-of-office law claimed to be a "high misdemeanor."

A remarkable fact, and one to which I desire to call the particular attention of the House, is that this new offense of exercising the constitutional power of removal of a Cabinet officer was actually created by Congress and named by the unusual and extraordinary term of a "high misdemeanor," while a movement for the impeachment of the President was in progress. The act was passed on the 2d of March, 1867, and in the month of January preceding the impeachment resolutions of the member from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] had been referred by the House to the Judiciary Committee, which was engaged in the investigation while this act was being passed into a law. Nothing could more clearly demonstrate the factious character of the prosecution. A "high misdemeanor" is manufactured while a proceeding is in progress the object of which is to impeach the President of "high crimes and misdemeanors," and that "high misdemeanor" is nothing more than the constitutional exercise of an executive power conceded since the foundation of the Government.

The Constitution, in the first section of article two, declares that—

"The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America."

The second section of the same article provides that—

"He shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate shall appoint, ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law; but the Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of Departments."

"Before he enters on the execution of his office he shall take the following oath or affirmation: 'I do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will faithfully execute the office of President of the United States, and will, to the best of my ability, preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States.'"—Art. 1, sec. 1.

The third section of the same article requires that—

"He shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed, and shall commission all the officers of the United States."

Not that he is to execute some one particular law, nor that he is to be confined to faithfully executing all the laws. He is to "take care"—that is the language—to "take care" that the laws—all the laws—be faithfully executed.

Now, in what way can the President take care that the laws be faithfully executed, except by supervision and control of the agents he must employ to execute them? Had he the hundred arms of Briareus he could not penetrate all the channels of public exigency which require the interposition of executive power. He must act through agents; he can act in no other way. Who are those agents? Primarily and chiefly the heads of the various Departments, among which, for convenience of public business, the functions of the executive branch of the Government are distributed. It is through them he acts; it is from them he receives information; it is with them, severally or jointly, that he advises; it is to them he looks to enable him to discharge his constitutional obligation to take care that the laws be faithfully executed. He, and not Congress, is responsible for their acts.

How can the President possibly discharge his exclusive constitutional duty when he has no confidence in the agents through whose interposition he is forced to act—when Congress has undertaken to devolve upon Mr. Stanton or anybody else the exclusive duty of taking care that the laws or any one of them be faithfully executed? And yet that is just what Congress has endeavored to accomplish in this tenure-of-office law, if the construction of it, which I contend against, be correct, by taking from the President the power of removal, which has been conceded to the Executive since 1789, and by making the exercise of that power dependent on the pleasure of the Senate.

The power of removal is an executive power, and the whole executive power is vested in the President. The power of removal is indispensable to full responsibility, and without it the injunction to take care that the laws be faithfully executed is a dead letter, and might as well be erased from the Constitution. The power of removal, especially of heads of Departments, is a power without which confusion and chaos would sooner or later overtake unity and efficiency of administration; without which, indeed, there would soon be no such thing as an executive administration possible.

Such considerations as these prevailed in the First Congress that assembled under our Constitution in 1789, and secured a contemporaneous exposition of that instrument from Madison and his associates in that body which has been recognized by concurrent authority and uniform practice from that early period down to the date of the passage of this act. Never, since the year that the Constitution went into effect, has it been doubted that the President's right of removal as to all officers except judges was absolute, without consent of the Senate, as a part of his constitutional executive power, until the tenure-of-office bill became a law over the President's veto on the 2d March, 1867.

Here, then, is a case of plain usurpation of executive power, in clear violation of the organic law, and in a point vitally touching the faithful discharge of executive duty. The President is sworn to "preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution." Such is the oath. Congress cannot take from it nor superadd to it. Congress can pass no dispensing act to discharge the President, in whole or in part, from its obligation. It is the President's oath, and his only. It is neither imposed upon nor is it allowed to any other officer, executive, legislative, or judicial. We swear to "support" the Constitution. Senators swear to support it. Members of State Legislatures swear to support it. Every other officer, civil or military, executive or judicial, State or Federal, throughout the country, swears to support it. But, sir, the President of the United States, and the President alone, is, by the express command of the Constitution itself, solemnly sworn, not to support, not to obey, but "to preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States."

Mr. Speaker, it is not necessary for the purposes of this argument to claim, nor would I claim, even if it were, that the President has judicial power to pass upon the constitutionality of an act of Congress as a general proposition. As a general proposition I concede that his constitutional prerogative is exhausted with the exercise of the veto power. As a general proposition I hold that an act of Congress constitutionally passed over the President's veto is binding upon him as it is upon the people, and becomes, to all intents and purposes, a law, until annulled by the judicial power.

But, sir, this is no ordinary case. We are dealing now with high crimes and with high misdemeanors. We are dealing with a legislative enactment altogether sui generis, exceptional in its character, without precedent, without parallel, and, it is to be hoped, without imitation. The question is not one simply of the doubtful exercise of undelegated powers. It is not only whether Congress has undertaken to assume a legislative power not granted by the charter. It is not a question of the imposition of an unequal tax, of a disputed appropriation, of an ex post facto law, of a law impairing the obligation of contracts, of tariffs, banks, or internal improvements.

The truth is, Mr. Speaker, that the tenure-of-office act is more than a mere assumption of power. It is a usurpation of power at the expense of a coördinate department of the Government; it is an invasion of the province of the Executive; it establishes a precedent which, if followed, would lead to the practical abolition of that department. The abolition of the executive department would in turn involve the overthrow of the judiciary. The absorption of the powers of those departments in Congress would be the end of the experiment of free government on this continent. We would have the vilest and the meanest form of despotism—the tyranny of a mob of politicians.

What, then, is the President to do? How is he to meet the obligation of his oath, his personal, exclusive oath, to "preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution?" Is he to stand tamely passive while the Constitution is being mutilated and the powers of the Executive are being one after another stripped and absorbed by the legislative branch? If there is no constitutional, peaceful remedy provided for the emergency he must do so, or risk the existence of the nation on an appeal to arms. Such a peaceful and legal remedy does exist, and to that remedy he has resorted in the present case.

By the first and second sections of the third article of the Constitution "the judicial power of the United States is vested in one Supreme Court, &c., and shall extend to all cases in law and equity arising under this Constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties." A tribunal exists competent to decide this question of conflicting opinion and contested prerogative upon a proper case being made and submitted to its jurisdiction. That tribunal cannot interpose as an umpire of its own mere motion. It can only exercise its judicial power when a "case" is brought before it involving the question at issue.

Such a case must have parties as well as a subject-matter, and one of those parties must be the actor and the other the defendant. It was to make those parties and that case that the action was taken which, and which alone, forms the basis of the proposed impeachment. In no other conceivable mode could the arbitrament of the judiciary have been invoked upon this grave question of controverted power between two coördinate departments of the Government, involving in its issues no less than the very existence of one of them and the preservation of the Government itself.
